The scarcity of provisions, and the depression of trade were still continual sources of disturbance and complaint; and so far from abating, the evil had been considerably aggravated from December to February. The fear of violence and pillage, the repugnance of the agriculturists to accept paper, and the enhancement of value arising from the surplusage of fictitious money, were, as we have previously stated, the causes which prevented the free course of trade in corn, and produced the scarcity. Nevertheless, the administrative efforts of the several communes compensated, to a certain extent, the inertness of trade; and supplies never absolutely failed in the markets, but they were held at exorbitant prices. The value of assignats falling every day in the ratio of their increase, a greater amount of them was always becoming necessary to purchase the same quantity of produce, and it was thus that prices were driven to such an excessive pitch. The labouring classes, receiving the same nominal value for their industry, were unable to obtain articles of necessity, and naturally broke into impatient murmurs and threats. Bread was not the only substance which increased progressively in cost; sugar, coffee, candles, and soap, likewise had doubled in value. The laundresses appeared at the bar of the convention to remonstrate against the charge of thirty sous for soap, which had formerly been purchasable at fourteen. It was in vain that the people were told to raise the price of their labour so as to restore the proportion between their wages and their consumption; they were incapable of effecting the requisite combination for that object, and only the more vehemently exclaimed against the rich, against monopolisers, and against the trading aristocracy, concluding with a demand for the simple expedient of a fixed price or maximum. The Jacobins and the members of the commune, who belonged to a lower grade in the social order than the National Convention, but were nevertheless almost enlightened assemblies when compared with the bulk of the populace, were sensible of the inconveniences attending forced contracts. Although more inclined to support the popular clamour than the convention, they offered a steady resistance; and at the Jacobin Club, Dubois de Crancé, the two Robespierres, Thuriot, and other Mountaineers, were daily heard inveighing against the proposal of a maximum. Chaumette and Hébert pursued the same course at the commune; but the galleries murmured impatiently, and often retorted upon them with groans and howls. Deputations from the sections frequently presented themselves before the commune, to upbraid it with moderation and connivance in the practices of forestallers. It was in these assemblies of sections that were gathered together the lowest classes of agitators, and within them reigned a revolutionary fanaticism far surpassing in blind ignorance and fury that predominant at the commune and the Jacobin Club. In strict coalition with the Cordeliers, where all the men of physical action congregated, the sections provoked all the troubles of the capital. Their inferiority and obscurity, exposing them more readily to agitation, likewise left them open to instigations of opposite tendencies; and accordingly we find that it was in them the remnants of aristocracy ventured to emerge and attempt movements of resistance. The old dependants of the nobility, the servants of the emigrants, and all those turbulent idlers who, between the two antagonist causes, had preferred the aristocratic, frequented the sections, in which an honest trading class persevered in favour of the Girondists, and cloaked themselves behind that rational and prudent opposition, to combat the Mountaineers and labour in behalf of the foreigner and the ancient system. In these contests, the honest middle-men for the most part retired, and the two extreme orders of agitators remained face to face, and contended on this inferior stage with desperate violence. Almost every day terrific scenes occurred on petitions to the commune, the Jacobin Club, or the assembly. According to the issue of the combat, from these tempestuous regions issued forth addresses against September and the maximum, or against appellants,* aristocrats, and forestallers.

The commune rejected the inflammatory petitions of the sections, and exhorted them to beware of the furtive agitators who were striving to introduce discord and confusion amongst them. In this instance it performed the part, with reference to the sections, which the convention assumed in dealing with itself.

* [Alluding to those who advocated the appeal to the people on the king's sentence.]

The Jacobin Club, not having determinate functions to exercise like the commune, but in lieu thereof discussing and arguing all definable subjects, boasted great philosophical acquirements, and pretended to a much more profound insight into social economy than the sections and the Cordelier Club. They accordingly affected upon various points to contemn the vulgar passions of these subaltern assemblies, and in particular condemned the fixed price as dangerous to freedom of commerce. But, as a substitute for the measure they thus repudiated, they proposed to make assignats be taken at par, and to punish with death whomsoever should refuse to accept them according to the value they expressed to bear, as if this were not merely a different mode of infringing the freedom of trade. They also recommended a general pledge to abstain from using sugar or coffee, in order to drive down the price of those articles; and, finally, they upheld the expediency of stopping the issue of assignats, and supplying their place by loans from the rich, in the nature of forced loans, assessed upon the basis of establishments in servants, horses, &c. All these propositions, however, tended not to alleviate the evil or to avert an inevitable crisis. Meanwhile, until it should actually explode, the public misfortunes afforded grounds for mutual recriminations to the two parties. The Girondists were accused of conspiring with the rich and the monopolisers to starve the people, to drive them into disturbances, and to avail themselves of that pretence to enact fresh martial laws; they were even charged with designing to favour the approach of foreign armies, by multiplying disorder—an absurd reproach, but one which proved mortal. The Girondists retorted by similar accusations. They upbraided their adversaries with causing the scarcity and the troubles by the alarms they excited amongst the trading community, and of scheming to promote anarchy by the national disasters, to grasp power by the spread of anarchy, and perhaps eventually to bring about foreign subjection.

Towards the end of February, the difficulty of procuring subsistence had carried the exasperation of the people to the highest pitch. The women, apparently more moved than men by this species of suffering, were roused to an extraordinary ferment. They presented themselves at the Jacobin Club on the 22d, to request that it would lend them the hall, as they wished to deliberate on the dearness of provisions, and to prepare a petition to the National Convention. It was known that the purport of this petition would be the imposition of the maximum, and the demand was refused. The galleries thereupon assailed the Jacobins with the disapprobation they were occasionally wont to manifest towards the assembly: "Down with the forestallers!" "Down with the rich!" were the general cries. The president was obliged to put on his hat to calm the tumult; and it was subsequently explained that so flagrant a want of respect was owing to disguised aristocrats in the hall. Robespierre and Dubois de Crancé took the opportunity of again denouncing the proposal of a fixed price, and exhorted the people to remain quiet, in order to deprive their adversaries of all pretext for calumniating them, and avoid furnishing them with an occasion to pass sanguinary laws.

Marat, who arrogated the faculty of always devising the most simple, prompt, and efficacious remedies, published in his journal, on the morning of the 25th, that forestalling would never cease unless much surer means were employed than any that had been as yet proposed. Inveighing against monopolisers, dealers in luxury, fatteners on chicanery, pettifoggers, ex-nobles, whom the faithless mandatories of the people encouraged to crime by impunity, he added, "In every country where the rights of the people are not vain titles, pompously set forth in an idle declaration, the pillage of a few magazines, with the engrossers hanged at their doors, would soon put an end to these malversations, which reduce five millions of men to despair, and cause thousands to perish from want. Will the deputies of the people, then, never learn more than merely to prate about their grievances instead of redressing them?"*

It was on the morning of the 25th that this inflated madman wrote these words. Whether they had really operated on the populace, or the irritation, having reached its height, could be no longer kept within bounds, it is certain a crowd of women assembled tumultuously around the shops of the grocers. At first they confined themselves to complaints concerning the dearness of all articles, and to a somewhat vociferous demand for a reduction of price. The commune had had no previous warning; the commander Santerre had gone to Versailles with the view of organising a body of cavalry; and no order was given to put the public force in motion. Thus the rioters met with no obstacle, and speedily passed from complaints and menaces to violence and pillage. The principal gatherings took place in the streets called Vieille-Monnaie, Cinq-Diamants, and Lombard. The terms insisted upon were, that all articles should be lowered to half price: soap to sixteen sous, sugar to twenty-five, molasses to fifteen, and candles to thirteen per pound. A considerable quantity of goods were forcibly carried away at these rates, and the value was faithfully paid by the abductors to the shopkeepers. But in a short time the multitude conceived it useless to pay any more, and the stores were appropriated without a particle of consideration being tendered in return. An armed detachment hastening to the thickest of the fray was repulsed, and tremendous shouts of "Down with the bayonets!" arose from all quarters. The assembly, the commune, and the Jacobin Club, were sitting in their respective halls. The assembly gave ear to a report upon the subject, in which the minister of the interior demonstrated that articles of consumption were plentiful in Paris, but that the distress arose from the disproportion between the value of the current money and that of all produce. Thereupon the assembly, anxious to parry the difficulties for the moment, assigned additional funds to the commune, in order that it might procure a distribution of provisions at a lower rate. At the same moment, the commune, actuated by similar sentiments and zeal, dispatched persons to collect reports of the circumstances, and issued orders for measures of police. At every new outrage denounced before it, the galleries cried, "Bravo! so much the better!" At every proposition of preventive means, they cried, "Bah! away with it!" Chaumette and Hébert were hooted for having suggested the expediency of beating the alarum and ordering out the armed force. However, it was resolved that two strong patrols, preceded by two municipal officers, should be sent to restore order; and that twenty-seven other municipal officers should proceed to read proclamations in the sections.

The riot gradually extended its locality: the mob plundered in different streets, and even manifested an intention of transferring its ravages from the grocers to other dealers. Meanwhile, men of all parties seized the occasion to charge the disturbance, and the evils which occasioned it, upon each other. "When you had a king," said the partisans of downcast royalty in the public thoroughfares, "you were not compelled to pay so dearly for things, nor were exposed to pillage." "Behold," said the partisans of the Girondists, "whither the system of violence and impunity to revolutionary excesses is conducting us!"

The Mountaineers were thrown into the greatest distress by this outbreak, and were reduced to maintain that it was disguised aristocrats, Lafayettists, Rolandists, Brissotins, who, mingled in the groups, instigated the people to plunder. They asserted having descried in the crowd women of high rank, powdered gentry, and great mens' lacqueys, distributing assignats, in order to induce the people to enter the shops. At length, after the tumult had continued for several hours, the armed force was collected in sufficient number; Santerre returned from Versailles, and the necessary orders were given; the battalion from Brest, then at Paris, displayed infinite zeal and perseverance, and the plunderers were finally dispersed.

In the evening, the Jacobin Club was the scene of an animated debate. The disorders just suppressed were descanted upon and generally deplored, in spite of the howls and denials of the galleries. Collot-d'Herbois, Thuriot, and Robespierre, all agreed in recommending tranquillity, and attributing the excesses to the aristocrats and Girondists. Robespierre delivered a long oration upon the matter, in which he maintained that the people were impeccable; that they could never do wrong; and that, unless when artfully misled, they never committed any error. He insisted that amidst those groups of pillagers voices were raised bewailing the deceased king, and lauding the right side of the assembly; that he himself had heard them, and consequently there could not remain any doubt as to the real instigators who had prompted all the mischief. Even Marat came forward to advocate peace and order, to condemn the pillage he had invoked that very morning in his journal, and to throw the odium upon the Girondists and royalists.

On the morrow, the usual bootless complaints rang in the assembly. Barrère inveighed with energy against the crimes of the preceding day. He animadverted especially upon the tardiness wherewith the authorities had acted in repressing the riot. The mob had begun to pillage about ten in the forenoon, and at five in the afternoon the armed force was not collected. He accordingly moved that the mayor and the commander-in-chief should be called to the bar, to explain the causes of such delay. A deputation from the section of Bon-Conseil appeared in support of this motion. Salles then ascended the tribune: he proposed a decree of impeachment against the instigator of robberies—against Marat, and read the article inserted in his journal of yesterday. Often had impeachment been urged against the provokers to crime, and in particular against Marat; no occasion could be more favourable for this design than the present, for never had outrage followed so quickly upon the accents of incitement. Marat, without being in the least disconcerted, upheld in the tribune that it was quite natural for the people to do themselves justice on the forestallers, since the laws were insufficient, and that "those who proposed to impeach him ought to be sent to bedlam." Buzot moved the order of the day on the proposition to impeach Monsieur Marat. "The law is emphatic," said he; "but Monsieur Marat will quibble on his expressions, the jury will be confused, and it will be better not to prepare a triumph for Monsieur Marat, in the very presence of justice herself." A member suggested that the convention should proclaim to the republic that in the morning Marat had counselled pillage, and in the afternoon Paris was a prey to pillage. Several motions were successively submitted; the convention finally paused on that which proposed to remit all the authors of disturbances, without distinction, to the ordinary tribunals. Marat thereupon exclaimed, "Nay, rather pass a decree of impeachment against me alone, that you may show how utterly you are lost to all sense of shame." At these words a tumult arose, and the convention forthwith committed to the tribunals Marat and all the authors of the crimes perpetrated in the course of the 25th February. The motion of Barrère was likewise adopted, and Santerre and Pache were ordered to the bar. Additional precautions were taken against the supposed agents of foreign powers and the emigrants. At the moment, the belief in a foreign influence was universally entertained. The day before, general domiciliary visits had been ordered throughout the whole of France, with the view of apprehending emigrants and suspicious travellers; this day the convention revived the necessity for passports, and strictly enjoined all hotel and lodging-house keepers to specify the strangers sojourning in their establishments, ordering, moreover, a new registration of all the citizens by sections..

Marat, then, was to be prosecuted at last; and the next morning he published the following passages in his paper:—

"Indignant at beholding the enemies of the public welfare eternally manœuvring against the people; shocked at viewing the monopolisers of all kinds coalescing to reduce them to despair by misery and famine; distressed at perceiving that the measures taken by the convention to prevent these conspiracies failed to effect their object; stung by the groans of the unfortunate coming every morning to ask bread from me, whilst accusing the convention of leaving them to perish from want, I took up my pen to canvass the best means of finally terminating the conspiracies of the public enemies and the sufferings of the people. The simplest ideas are those which first present themselves to a well-constituted mind, which desires only the general happiness without any selfish considerations; accordingly, I asked myself why we should not turn against public brigands the expedients they pursue to ruin the people and destroy liberty. In accordance with this idea, I observed that in a country where the rights of the people were not vain titles, pompously set forth in an idle declaration, the pillage of a few magazines, with the engrossers hanged at their doors, would soon put an end to their malversations. What do the drivers of the faction of statesmen do? They seize with avidity upon this phrase, hasten to send emissaries amongst the women assembled before the bakers' shops, inciting them to bear away, at reasonable prices, soap, candles, and sugar, from the shops of retail grocers, whilst those emissaries themselves plunder the stores of poor patriot grocers. Then those miscreants keep silence all the day, concert together at night in a secret conclave, held in the Rue de Rohan, at the house of the caitiff counter-revolutionist Valazé, and come the next day to denounce me from the tribune as the instigator of excesses which are exclusively owing to themselves!"

The breach became every day wider and more incurable. Already threats were openly exchanged; several deputies never appeared without arms, and again the cry was raised, with the same energy as had marked it in the months of July and August of the preceding year, that it behoved the patriots to save themselves by insurrection, and to cut off the gangrened part of the national representation. The Girondists met in the evenings at the house of a member of their party, Valazé, where great uncertainty prevailed amongst them as to the course expedient to be pursued. Some believed, others denied, the danger to be imminent. Certain of their number, such as Salles and Louvet, conceived imaginary conspiracies, and by directing attention to chimeras, turned it from veritable perils. Tossed thus uneasily from project to project, fixed in the midst of Paris without any force at their disposition, and resting for support merely on opinion in the departments—a vast resource, doubtless, but perfectly inert—some sudden onslaught might, upon any given day, deliver them into the power of their adversaries and accomplish their annihilation. They had been unsuccessful in their attempts to form a departmental guard; the bands of federalists, congregated in the metropolis since the meeting of the convention, were partly gained over and partly draughted into the armies, so that their only reliance was somewhat doubtingly placed on 400 men of Brest, the same whose resolute conduct had stopped the recent pillage. Failing the departmental guard, they had vainly essayed to transfer the direction of the public force from the commune to the minister of the interior. The Mountain, by furious clamours, intimidated the majority, and prevented the adoption of such a measure. The number of members upon whom the Girondists could count as uninfluenced by fear, and firm in critical discussions, scarcely amounted to eighty. In this precarious state of matters, there remained to the Girondists but one expedient, as impracticable in execution as all the others—that of dissolving the convention. Upon this point, also, the outrageous vehemence of the Mountaineers extinguished all hope of obtaining a majority. Amidst these tormenting uncertainties, proceeding not from weakness but from sheer want of power, they were fain to turn their desponding hopes towards the constitution, flattering themselves that the yoke of laws would prove a restraint on passions and put an end to all convulsions. The more speculative minds, in particular, fondly clung to this idea. Condorcet had presented a report in the name of the committee on the constitution, which had excited a general clamour. Condorcet, Pétion, and Sièyes, were held up to the public execration at the Jacobin Club. Their republic was deemed to be but an aristocracy ingeniously framed for certain overbearing and despotic men of talent. Consequently, the Mountaineers deprecated its further consideration; and several members of convention, by this time sensible that their business was not to constitute, but to defend the revolution, spoke out boldly, and said, that it was necessary to postpone the constitution until the following year, and in the interim devote exclusive attention to the cares of governing and fighting. Thus the long sway of that stormy assembly began to be distinctly intimated; it had ceased to believe in the brevity of its legislative mission; and the Girondists saw their last hope vanish—the expectation of speedily curbing the violence of faction by laws.

At the same time, their adversaries were not less embarrassed. Doubtless, they had in their favour exalted passions; they had the Jacobin Club, the commune, and the majority of the sections; but they did not command the ministers, and they dreaded the departments, where the two opinions were struggling in most rancorous contest, in which theirs had evidently the disadvantage; furthermore, they looked with alarm to the efforts of foreign powers; and although the ordinary rules of revolutions assure victory to the most violent, those laws, being to them unknown, could afford no encouragement. Their projects were as vague as those of their adversaries. To attack the national representation was an act of desperate audacity, from which they as yet recoiled in idea. There were assuredly agitators in the sections, who were ready to brave and to propose any measures; but their schemes were discountenanced by the Jacobin Club, the commune, and the Mountain, for they, who were daily accused of conspiring and daily justifying themselves, felt that proposals of this nature would compromise them in the eyes of their adversaries and of the departments. Danton, who had taken but a moderate share in the party quarrels, was regardful only of two things—to guarantee himself from all prosecution on account of his revolutionary acts, and to prevent the revolution from retrograding and succumbing beneath the assaults of the public enemy. Marat himself, so reckless and atrocious when it concerned means, even Marat hesitated; and Robespierre, notwithstanding his inveteracy against the Girondists, against Brissot, Roland, Guadet, and Vergniaud, dared not think of an attack upon the national representation; he knew not upon what expedient to determine, but sunk into dejection, doubted of the stability of the revolution, and told Garat he feared plots of destruction were laid for all the defenders of the republic.*

During the heated controversies between the two parties at Marseilles, Lyons, and Bordeaux, a proposition for getting rid of the appellants, and excluding

* I subjoin an extract from the Memoirs of Garat, not less curious than the one already quoted, and which contains by far the most adequate representation that has been given of Robespierre, and of the suspicions which haunted his mind. It is in the form of a conversation:—

"Scarcely had Robespierre understood that I intended speaking to him concerning the quarrels in the convention, than he said, 'All those deputies of the Gironde, that Brissot, Louvet, Barbaroux, are counter revolutionists, conspirators.' I could not avoid laughing, and my merriment very speedily soured his visage. 'You were always that way. In the Constituent Assembly, you were disposed to believe that the aristocrats were attached to the revolution.' 'I was very far from being always that way. I might have believed at the most that certain nobles were not aristocrats. I judged so indeed of several, and you yourself think so still of some. I may have likewise been of opinion that we would have made some conversions even amongst the aristocrats, if of the two means which were at our disposition, reason and force, we had more frequently employed reason, which was altogether on our side, and less frequently force, which might have been on the side of the tyrants. Trust me, we should forget the dangers we have passed through, which have nothing in common with those that now threaten us. War then raged between the friends and the enemies of liberty; it rages at present between the friends and the enemies of the republic. If an opportunity should offer, I will tell Louvet he errs too egregiously when he deems you a royalist; but to you, I consider myself bound to declare that Louvet is no more a royalist than yourself. In your quarrels you resemble the Molinists and the Jansenists, the entire dispute between whom turned on the manner in which divine grace operates within our souls, and who furiously charged each other with disbelieving in God.' 'If they be not royalists, why, pray, did they labour so strenuously to save the life of a king? I'll wager, now, that you also were for pardon, for clemency—— Why, what signifies the principle which rendered the death of the tyrant just and necessary? Your Brissot and your appellants to the people were against it. Would they then have left to tyranny the means of rearing its head again?' 'I am not aware whether the intention of the appellants to the people was to spare the life of Capet; the appeal to the people always appeared to me imprudent and dangerous; but I can easily conceive how those who voted for it may have believed the life of Capet in captivity might be more useful, in the course of events, than his death; I can imagine how they may have thought the appeal to the people a signal mode of honouring a republican nation in the eyes of the whole world, by giving it the opportunity of exercising a great act of sovereignty generously and magnanimously.' 'You certainly attribute fine motives for measures of which you disapprove, and to men who are conspiring in all quarters.' 'And where, then, are they conspiring?' 'Every where—in Paris, in all France, in all Europe. At Paris, Gensonné conspires in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, by going from shop to shop persuading the dealers that we patriots wish to pillage their stores; the Gironde has long since formed the design of separating from France to unite with England; and the leaders of its deputation are themselves the authors of that plan, which they are determined upon executing at all hazards. Gensonné makes no secret of it; he tells all who are disposed to listen to him, that they are not here as representatives of the nation, but as plenipotentiaries of the Gironde. Brissot conspires in his journal, which is a tocsin of civil war; it is well known that he has gone to England, and also the motives of his going there; we are not ignorant of his intimate connexion with the minister of foreign affairs, with that Lebrun, who is a native of Liege, and a creature of the house of Austria. The best friend of Brissot is Clavière, and Clavière has conspired wherever he has breathed. Rabaut, a traitor, philosopher and Protestant as he is, has not been deep enough to conceal from us his correspondence with the courtier and traitor Montesquiou; for the last six months they have been working in concert to open Savoy and France to the Piedmontese. Servan has been named general of the army of the Pyrenees only to deliver the keys of France to the Spaniards. In fine, look at Dumouriez, who no longer threatens Holland but Paris; and when that charlatan of a hero came here, where I wished to have him arrested, it was not with the Mountain he dined every day, but with the ministers and the Girondists.' 'Three or four times with me, for example.' 'I am sick of the revolution—I am ill; never was the country in greater danger, and I doubt whether it can extricate itself. And now, are you still disposed to laugh, and to believe that they are honest men—good republicans?' 'No, I am not tempted to laugh, but I can scarcely retain the tears I ought to shed for my country, when I see its legislators a prey to suspicions so dreadful upon grounds so insignificant. I am convinced that nothing of what you suspect is real; but I am still more convinced that your suspicions involve a very real and them from the convention, originated with the Jacobins of Marseilles, in the rage of contention with the partisans of the Girondists. This proposition, being laid before the Jacobins of Paris, was discussed in their club. Desfieux argued, that the demand in question was advanced by a sufficient number of affiliated flagrant danger. Almost all those men are your enemies, but not one, except Dumouriez, is the enemy of the republic; and if you could stifle your hatreds on all sides, the republic would be beyond all peril.' 'Are you not going to ask me to revive the motion of Bishop Lamourette?' 'No; I have at least so far profited by the lessons you have given me, and the three national assemblies have taken the pains to teach me, that the best patriots hate their enemies much more cordially than they love their country. But I have one question to ask you, and I beg you to reflect before answering it, Have you no doubts concerning what you have just told me?' 'None.'

I quitted him, and fell into a long reverie of astonishment and terror at what I had heard.

A few days afterwards, as I was leaving the executive council, I met Salles, who was coming out of the National Convention. Affairs were hourly wearing a more menacing aspect. All who entertained mutual sentiments of esteem could not see each other without feeling impelled by a necessity to converse upon the state of the commonwealth.

'Well,' said I to Salles, as I accosted him, 'are there no means of terminating these horrible quarrels?' 'Oh! yes, I hope so; I expect I shall shortly tear away the veil that still covers those detestable miscreants and their frightful conspiracies. But as to you, I know that you always indulge in blind confidence; I know that your mania is to believe nothing.' 'You are quite mistaken; I believe as well as others, but upon deductions, not upon bare suspicions—on accredited facts, not on imaginary creations. Why do you suppose me so incredulous? Is it because, in 1789, I would not believe you, when you assured me that Necker was plundering the treasury, and that people had seen mules loaded with gold and silver bearing his millions to Geneva. This incredulity, I confess, remains quite incorrigible; for even at this day I am persuaded Necker left here more millions of his own than he took millions of ours to Geneva.' 'Necker was a knave, but nothing compared to the wretches by whom we are now encompassed; and it is of those I wish to speak with you if you will listen to me. I will tell you all, for I know all; I have fathomed all their plots. The schemes and crimes of the Mountain commenced with the revolution; Orleans is the chief of this band of brigands, and it was the author of the infernal romance of "Dangerous Connexions" who drew out the plan of all the abominations they have committed for the last five years. The traitor Lafayette was their accomplice; and it was he who, pretending to crush the conspiracy in the bud, sent Orleans into England to arrange matters with Pitt, the Prince of Wales, and the cabinet of St James's. Mirabeau was likewise implicated; he received money from the king to conceal his connexion with Orleans, but he received still more from Orleans in expectation of his services. The great point for the Orleans party was to draw the Jacobins into its designs. They dared not attempt it directly; therefore to the Cordeliers they first addressed themselves. In the Cordeliers, all was immediately sold to them and placed at their disposal. Observe, now, that the Cordeliers have always been less numerous than the Jacobins, have always made less noise; and this because they are willing enough that every body should be their instrument, but not so that every body should be in their secrets. The Cordeliers have always been the nursery of conspirators; there the most formidable of all, Danton, moulds and incites them to audacity and falsehood, whilst Marat fashions them for murder and massacre; it is there they rehearse the part they are afterwards to enact in the Jacobins; and the Jacobins, who appear to lead France, are themselves led, without suspecting it, by the Cordeliers. The Cordeliers, who seem to be ensconced in a hole in Paris, negotiate with the whole of Europe, and have envoys in all the courts who have sworn the ruin of our liberty: the fact is certain; I have proofs of it. Finally, who but the Cordeliers have engulfed a throne in a sea of blood to draw forth a new throne instead? They are well aware that the right side, which contains all the virtue, likewise counts in its ranks all the true republicans in the convention; and if they accuse us of royalism, it is because that charge is necessary to pour upon us the fury of the multitude—because, in short, daggers are more easily found against us than arguments. In a single conspiracy, three or four others are involved. When the right side shall be entirely extirpated, the Duke of York will arrive to occupy the throne, and Orleans, who has promised it to him, will assassinate him; Orleans, in his turn, will be assassinated by Marat, Danton, and Robespierre, who have made him the like promise, and the triumvirs will divide France, covered with ashes and blood, until the ablest of them, and that will be Danton, assassinates the two others and reigns alone, at first under the title of dictator, afterwards, without disguise, under that of king. Such is their plan, you may be assured. By dint of constant reflection I have discovered it; every thing proves and renders it evident. See how circumstances hang and hold together; there is not a fact in the revolution which is not a part and a proof of these horrible plots. You are astonished, I see; will you still be incredulous?' 'I am indeed astonished; but tell me, are there many amongst you, that is, on your side, who think like you on all these things?' 'All, or almost all. Condorcet made a few objections once; Sièyes holds little intercourse with us; Rabaut has another plan, which sometimes tallies, sometimes clashes with mine; but all the others entertain no more doubts than I myself upon what I have just related to you: all feel the necessity of acting promptly, of putting the irons to the fire without delay, to prevent the occurrence of so many crimes and misfortunes, and to avoid losing the fruit of a revolution which has cost us so dearly. In the right side are numbers who have not sufficient confidence in you; but I, who have been your colleague, who know you to be an honest man, and a staunch friend to liberty—I assure them that you will be for us, that you will aid us with all the means your office puts in your power. Can the slightest doubt still linger in your mind as to the truth of what I have told you respecting those wretches?' 'I should be too unworthy of the esteem you express for me, were I to leave you under the persuasion that I believe in the fact of the plan you judge that of your enemies. The more you adduce men and things, the more probable it seems to you and the less so to me. The greater part of the facts wherewith you weave the web of your plot have had a definite object, which it needed no ingenuity to carve for them, since it spoke for itself; but you assign them an object which is very far from naturally presenting itself, and which must therefore be laboriously attributed to them. Now, in the first place, you will allow it requires proofs to justify the casting aside a simple and natural explanation; and, in the next, additional proofs to induce the adoption of an explanation which does not occur to the mind thus simply and naturally. For example, all the world believes that Lafayette and Orleans were enemies, and that it was to deliver the National Assembly, Paris, and France, from a multitude of anxieties, that Orleans was persuaded or compelled by Lafayette to withdraw for a time from France; therefore, it must be established, not by assertion but by proof—1st, that they were not enemies; 2d, that they were accomplices; 3d, that the object of Orleans's journey to England was the execution of their schemes. I am aware that by so rigorous a mode of reasoning, a risk is incurred of affording play to crimes and disasters by relaxing foresight to meet and suppress them; but I am also aware that by yielding blindly to the imagination, systems are conjured up on events past and on events to come; the faculty of justly discerning and appreciating contemporary events is lost; and whilst dreaming of thousands of delinquencies which never entered the head of mortal, an utter incapacity ensues to perceive those which actually impend and menace; whilst, moreover, enemies, who are not over-scrupulous, are driven to the temptation of committing crimes they never would have otherwise thought of. I do not doubt that there are around us a multitude of miscreants; the unbridled state of passions arouses them abundantly, and the gold of the stranger supports them. But, be assured, if their projects be desperate, they are neither so vast nor so complicated, nor formed and directed so remotely. In all you state there is much more to bespeak robbers and assassins than profound conspirators. The veritable conspirators against the republic are the sovereigns of Europe and the passions of the republicans. To repel the kings of Europe and their regiments, our armies are sufficient and to boot; to prevent our being devoured by our own passions, there is a mode, but it is unique—hasten to organise a government which shall have strength, and will merit confidence. In the state to which our quarrels reduce the government, a democracy of even twenty-five millions of angels would speedily become a prey to all the dissensions of ambitious pride; as Jean-Jacques says, twenty-five millions of gods would be needed, and into no imagination has so huge a conception entered. My dear Salles, men and large assemblies are not so constituted as that on one side shall be found only gods, and on the other only devils. Every where are men in a conflict of interests and opinions, wherein even the best have evil passions, and even the worst, if we studiously and dispassionately seek to learn their inward thoughts, are susceptible of upright and virtuous impressions. I find in the recesses of my own mind a clear and unanswerable voucher for the half at least of this societies to be converted into a petition and presented to the National Convention. Robespierre, who was apprehensive that such a project might lead to the total reconstruction of the assembly, and that in the electional struggle the Mountain might be discomfited, strongly opposed the suggestion, and succeeded in getting rid of it by the arguments usually adduced in deprecation of premature dissolutions.

Military reverses added their influence to precipitate events. We left Dumouriez encamped on the shores of the Bielbos, and preparing a hazardous but feasible embarkment in Holland. Whilst he was engaged in making the dispositions for his enterprise, 260,000 soldiers were marching against France, ranging from the Upper Rhine to Holland. Fifty-six thousand Prussians, 24,000 Austrians, and 25,000 Hessians, Saxons and Bavarians, threatened the Rhine from Basle as far as Mayence and Coblentz. From that point to the Meuse, 30,000 men occupied Luxumbourg. Sixty thousand Austrians and 10,000 Prussians marched upon the French quarters on the Meuse, to interrupt the sieges of Maestricht and Venloo. Lastly, 40,000 English, Hanoverians, and Dutch, as yet remaining in the background, were emerging from the extremity of Holland upon the French line of operations. The project of the enemy was to drive the French out of Holland upon the Scheldt, to make them repass the Meuse, and then halt upon that river until the fortress of Mayence should be recaptured. Thus his plan was to march gradually forward, and upon all points at once, not penetrating too eagerly upon any, lest he should expose his flanks. This timid and methodical plan would have permitted the French to push much farther and more actively the offensive expedition against Holland, if blunders or unlucky accidents, or too much hurry in taking alarm, had not obliged them to renounce it. The Prince of Cobourg, who had distinguished himself against the Turks in the last campaign, commanded the Austrians, who were proceeding towards the Meuse. The French quarters, dispersed between Maestricht, Aix-la-Chapelle, Liege, and Tongres, were thrown into the greatest disorder. During the first days of March, the Prince of Cobourg passed the Roer, and advanced by Duren and Aldenhoven upon Aix-la-Chapelle. The French troops being suddenly attacked, retired in confusion into Aix-la-Chapelle, and even abandoned its gates to the enemy. Miaczinski stood his ground for some time; but after a sanguinary conflict in the streets of the city, he was obliged to yield and retreat towards Liege. At the same time, Stengel and Neuilly, separated by this movement, were driven back into Limbourg. Miranda, who was besieging Maestricht, and might be isolated from the main body in retreat upon Liege, also abandoned the left bank and retired upon Tongres. The imperialists immediately entered Maestricht, and the Archduke Charles, boldly pushing his advantage beyond the Meuse, proceeded even to Tongres, and gained a brilliant action. Thereupon Valence, Dampierre, and Miaczinski, united at Liege, judged that all speed should be used in rejoining Miranda, and with that view marched upon Saint-Trond, whither Miranda proceeded on his part. The retreat was so precipitate, that a part of the munitions was lost. However, after great dangers, they succeeded in effecting a junction at Saint-Trond. Lamarlière and Champmorin, stationed at Ruremonde, had time to reach the same point by Diest. Stengel and Neuilly, completely separated from the army and thrown back into Limbourg, were sheltered at Namur by the division of General d'Harville. Ultimately, the French, rallying at Tirlemont, resumed a degree of calmness and assurance, and awaited the arrival of Dumouriez, whose presence the whole army invoked in general and impatient cries.

When that commander had been apprised of the first repulse, he had ordered Miranda to rally all the divisions at Maestricht, and tranquilly to continue the siege with 70,000 men. He was convinced that the Austrians would not venture to force a battle, and that the invasion of Holland would speedily induce them to retrograde. This was a sound conclusion, and founded upon the unfailing principle, that, in case of a reciprocal offensive warfare, the advantage will remain with the party which can hold out the longest. The timorous plan of the imperialists, restraining them from penetrating upon any point, fully justified this deduction; but the negligence of the generals, who failed to concentrate their respective divisions with sufficient promptitude, their confusion after the attack, the impossibility in which they found themselves of rallying in presence of the enemy, and, above all, the absence of a man of superior influence and authority, rendered the execution of the order transmitted by Dumouriez impracticable. Consequently, letter upon letter was dispatched to him, urging his return from Holland. A general panic was rapidly spreading; upwards of ten thousand deserters had already abandoned the army, and scattered themselves towards the interior. The commissioners of the convention hastened to Paris, and procured an order for Dumouriez to leave in the hands of another the expedition undertaken against Holland, and to return with all speed to put himself at the head of the grand army of the Meuse. He received this order on the 8th March, and departed on the 9th, with the vexatious reflection that all his projects were counteracted. He came back more disposed than ever to condemn the proceedings in the revolutionary system introduced into Belgium, and to charge upon the Jacobins the bad success of his plans for the campaign. He found, in fact, ample matter for complaint and censure. The agents of the executive power exercised a despotic authority in Belgium, after a most outrageous fashion. They had every where stirred up the populace, and invariably used violence in the assemblies where a union with France was decided upon. They had seized upon the plate in the churches, sequestrated the revenues of the clergy, confiscated the possessions of the nobles, and provoked the liveliest indignation amongst all classes of the Belgic nation. An insurrection against the French was already beginning to explode on the side of Grammont.

Delinquencies of so grave a character were scarcely needed to incline the mind of Dumouriez to view the commissioners of the government with horror and repugnance. He began by arresting two of them, and dismissing them under escort to Paris. He addressed the others in a tone of high command, and restricted them thenceforth to their functions, prohibiting them from interposing in the military dispositions of the generals, or giving orders to the troops stationed within the limits of their commissariat divisions. He deprived General Moreton of his command, on account of his having made common cause with these disorganisers. He shut up the clubs, restored to the Bel-axiom: I am fair and open, assuredly quite as much so as any of you; but when, instead of refuting my opinions logically and temperately, they are repudiated with distrust and contumely, I am ready to throw aside argument, and to look if my pistols be well loaded. You have twice made me a minister, and twice have rendered me a signal disservice; the dangers which encompass us, and which encompass me, are the considerations that alone induce me to remain at the post I occupy. A brave man does not ask leave of absence on the eve of battle. The battle, I see, is not far distant; and, foreseeing that from both sides you will assail me, I am determined to remain. I will be ever ready to declare what I believe true according to my reason and conscience; but I now warn you that I will take for my guides my own conscience and reason, and not those of any man on the face of the earth. I have not laboured thirty years of my life to make a lantern for myself, in order afterwards to light my path by the lantern of others.

Salles and I separated, cordially pressing each other's hand and embracing, as if we had still been colleagues in the Constituent Assembly."

gians a part of the property taken from the churches, and joined with these measures a proclamation disavowing, in the name of France, the enormities that had been recently committed. He stigmatised with the name of brigands those who were their authors; and in his whole conduct assumed a dictatorial supremacy, which, although grateful in its exercise to the Belgians, and securing to the French troops a safer sojourn in the country, excited the rage of the Jacobins to a frantic pitch. He had on the subject a very angry discussion with Camus, the deputy, in which he expressed great contempt for the government of the day; and, forgetting the fate of Lafayette, relying too readily on military power, he comported himself as a general certain of his ability, if he chose, to make the revolution retrograde, and quite prepared to choose it if he were provoked. The same spirit had crept into his staff; the officers composing it spoke with scorn of that populace which governed Paris, and of the imbecile conventionalists who allowed themselves to be oppressed by it; they insulted and drove away all who were suspected of Jacobinism; and the soldiers, also, overjoyed at beholding their general again in the midst of them, affected, in the presence of the commissioners of the convention, to stop his horse and kiss his boots, saluting him as their father.

These tidings threw Paris into tumultuous agitation, and stimulated renewed vociferations against traitors and counter-revolutionists. The deputy Choudieu promptly seized the occasion to demand, as had been often done before, the dismissal of the federalists loitering in Paris. It was usual to raise this clamour at every disastrous intelligence from the armies. Barbaroux essayed to speak upon the question, but his presence occasioned an uproar of surpassing violence. Buzot laboured in vain to extol the firmness of the men of Brest during the last riot; Boyer-Fonfrède merely obtained, by a species of compromise, that the federalists of the maritime departments should be draughted into the army, still deficient in force, destined for the coasts of the ocean. The others retained the privilege of remaining at Paris.

The next day, being the 8th March, the convention ordered all officers to rejoin their regiments without delay. Danton proposed to afford the Parisians a fresh opportunity of saving France. "Ask them for thirty thousand men," said he; "send them to Dumouriez, and Belgium is assured to us, Holland conquered." There was, doubtless, little difficulty in finding thirty thousand men in Paris, whilst such a reinforcement would be of infinite service to the army of the north, and the capital would, by so seasonable an aid, acquire even additional importance. Moreover, Danton proposed to depute commissioners from the convention to the departments and the sections, with the view of accelerating the levies by all possible means. All his suggestions were adopted. The sections had injunctions to assemble in the evening; commissioners were named to attend their meetings; the theatres were closed to remove all distraction; and the black flag was displayed at the town-hall as a signal of distress.

In accordance with the will of the convention, the sections met in the evening, and extended the warmest reception to the commissioners. The imaginations of men were vividly elated, and the proposition to resort in a mass and on the moment to the armies was every where enthusiastically hailed. But there happened in this instance what had previously occurred on the 2d and 3d of September: before departing, it was insisted that the traitors should be punished. Since that dismal epoch, in fact, the ready-made phrase had passed into constant use—"We will not leave behind us conspirators prepared to massacre the families of the absent." Hence it became necessary, if it were wished to avoid fresh popular executions, to organise legal and inexorable executions, which swiftly and without appeal should embrace the counter-revolutionists—the concealed conspirators, who menaced the revolution within, already so grievously jeopardised from without. It was held indispensable to suspend the sword over the heads of generals, ministers, and faithless deputies, who compromised the public safety. Furthermore, it was deemed inconsistent with justice that the selfish wealthy, who abhorred the system of equality, stood indifferent to the national struggles, and consequently refrained from coming forward to fill the ranks of the army, should remain unaffected by the public exigencies, and do nothing for their alleviation. Accordingly, all those who had above 1500 livres (£65) a-year, ought to pay a tax proportioned to their means, and sufficient to compensate those who took upon themselves all the costs and risks of service. Such were the sentiments almost universally upheld in the sections, resolving into the twofold desire of a new tribunal erected against the hostile party, and of a contribution wrung from the rich in favour of the poor departing to combat. Several amongst them appeared to impress their wishes upon the commune; the Jacobins promulgated the like doctrines on their part; and the following day the convention found itself breasted by a general and irresistible opinion.

On that morning (the 9th March), all the Mountaineer deputies were early in their places. The galleries were filled with Jacobins. They had turned out all the females, because, as they said, an expedition was to be undertaken. Several of them exhibited pistols. The deputy Gamon rose to remonstrate against the outrage, but he was unheeded. The Mountain and the galleries, firmly bent on their purpose, intimidated the majority, and gave palpable token of a determination to suffer no resistance. The mayor appeared with the council of the commune, confirmed the report of the commissioners of the convention upon the zeal of the sections, and submitted their prayer for an extraordinary tribunal, and a tax upon the rich. Divers sections followed the commune, and repeated the demand for the tribunal and the tax. Some insisted, moreover, upon a law against forestallers, upon a maximum in the price of commodities, and upon the abrogation of a decree which declared metallic moneys merchandise, and permitted their circulation at a different standard than paper. After the presentation of all these petitions, it was proposed to put the measures recommended to the vote. In the first place, the immediate adoption of the principle of an extraordinary tribunal was insisted upon. Certain deputies, however, opposed this precipitancy. Lanjuinais rose, and begged that, if it were absolutely determined to sanction the iniquity of a tribunal without appeal, the calamity might be at least restricted to the single department of Paris. Guadet and Valazé made fruitless attempts to support Lanjuinais; they were assailed with brutal interruptions by the Mountain. Some deputies even demanded that the tribunal should bear the title of Revolutionary. But the convention, putting an end to all further discus on, decreed "the establishment of an Extraordinary Criminal Tribunal, to judge without appeal, and without recourse to the tribunal of Cassation, conspirators and counter-revolutionists," and charged its committee of legislation to present to-morrow a project of organisation.

Immediately following this decree, it passed a second, which imposed upon the rich an extraordinary war tax; and a third, instituting forty-one commissions, of two deputies each, to be sent into the departments to accelerate the levies by all possible means, to disarm those who lingered behind, to arrest the suspected, to seize upon horses kept for pleasure and convenience, in short, to exercise an uncontrolled despotism. To these measures were added others. The bursaries in colleges were for the future to be restricted to the sons of those who joined the armies; all bachelors employed in the public offices were to be replaced by fathers of families; imprisonment for debt was abolished. The right of testamentary disposition had met that fate a few days previously. All these resolutions were adopted on the motion of Danton, who perfectly understood the art of attaching interests to the cause of the revolution.

The Jacobins, well contented with this day, rushed eagerly to their club to indulge in self-congratulations upon the zeal they had manifested, the foresight wherewith they had usurped the galleries, and the imposing front presented by the serried ranks of the Mountain. They exhorted each other to persevere, and to be all present at the next day's sitting, when the extraordinary tribunal was to be organised. "Robespierre," said they, "has strongly recommended it." Still they were not fully satisfied with what they had obtained: one of the club proposed the framing of a petition, in which they should demand the reconstruction of the committees and of the ministry, the arrest of all functionaries at the moment of their dismissal, as also that of all postmasters and counter-revolutionary journalists. A general desire was evinced in favour of the instant adoption of such a petition, but the president objected that the society could not perform any act in its collective capacity, and the members consequently agreed to go in quest of another locality wherein they might assemble simply as petitioners. They subsequently dispersed into the different quarters of Paris. The din of tumult pervaded its atmosphere. Some hundred or more of rioters, the ordinary promoters of all disturbances, led on by Lasouski, had stormed the premises of the journalist Gorsas, armed with pistols and swords, and broken his presses. Gorsas had taken to flight, and only succeeded in saving his life by an admirable display of courage and presence of mind. They had afterwards visited the editor of the Chronicle, and likewise destroyed his printing machinery.

The succeeding day (the 10th) threatened to be still more stormy. It was Sunday, and an entertainment was prepared in the section of the Halle-aux-Blés, in honour of the recruits about to depart for the army; so that the idleness of the people, united with the excitement of a public feast, might be readily adapted to criminal projects. The hall of the convention was as crowded as on the preceding day. In the galleries and on the Mountain the muster was equally strong and menacing. The debate opened upon several matters of detail. A letter of Dumouriez was taken into consideration. Robespierre supported the propositions of the general, and moved a decree of impeachment against Lanoue and Stengel, both commanding the advanced guard during the last repulse. The impeachment was immediately voted. Then the departure of the commissioners for hastening the levies was broached; but their votes being necessary to ensure the establishment of the extraordinary tribunal, it was decided that the institution should be organised before the sitting ended, and the deputies dispatched the next day. Cambacérès thereupon urged not only the organisation of the extraordinary tribunal, but also that of the ministry. Buzot sprang up the tribune, and encountered a storm of murmurs. "These murmurs," he exclaimed, "teach me what I already knew, that there is courage in opposing the despotism preparing for us." The uproar augmented. He continued: "I give you up my life; but I will save my memory from dishonour by opposing the despotism of the National Convention. You are incited to arrogate all powers into your own hands." "We must act and not prate," cried a voice. "You are right," retorted Buzot; "the publicists of monarchy likewise say that action is necessary, and that, consequently, the despotic government of one will is the best"——A fresh clamour interrupted the speaker, and general confusion prevailed in the assembly. It was eventually agreed to adjourn the re-organisation of the ministry, and attend at present simply to the extraordinary tribunal. The report of the committee was called for. The report was not digested, but in lieu thereof the project on which the committee had agreed was demanded. Robert Lindet rose to lay it before the convention, deeply deploring its severity. The following was the proposition he submitted, in an accent of profound emotion: The tribunal to be composed of nine judges, nominated by the convention, superior to all forms, acquiring information by any modes; divided into two sections, always permanent; arraigning at the instance of the convention, or directly, those who, by their conduct or the manifestation of their opinions, should have endeavoured to mislead the people, and those who, by the stations they filled under the old system, recalled to memory prerogatives usurped by despots.

On hearing this frightful scheme propounded, loud cheers broke from the left, and violent agitation was evinced on the right. "Rather die!" exclaimed Vergniaud, "than consent to the establishment of this Venitian inquisition!" "The people must have either this measure or an insurrection," replied Amar. "My feeling for revolutionary power is well known," said Cambon; "but if the people have been deceived in the elections, we also may be misled in the choice of these nine judges; and they may be insupportable tyrants, whom we are thus voluntarily imposing upon ourselves." "This tribunal," cried Duhem, "is far too good for villains and counter-revolutionists!" The tumult grew every moment greater; the time was consumed in menaces, abusive epithets, shouts and yells of all descriptions. "We will have it!" exclaimed the one side; "We will not have it!" retorted the other. Barrère moved the addition of juries, and forcibly urged their necessity. Turreau insisted that they should be struck in Paris, Boyer Fonfrède in the whole republic, because the new tribunal would have to judge crimes committed in the departments, the armies, and every where. Thus the day waned, and the shades of evening began to fall. The president Gensonné summed up the various propositions, and prepared to put them to the vote. The assembly, overpowered with exhaustion, seemed ready to yield to the determined violence. The members of the Plain began to retire, and the Mountain, in order to complete their terror, demanded that the votes should be given aloud. "Yes!" exclaimed Faraud, with indignation—"yes, let us vote aloud, so that the world may know the men who wish to assassinate innocence under shelter of the law!" This vehement apostrophe reanimated the right side and the centre, and, contrary to all expectation, the majority declared: 1st, that there should be juries; 2d, that those juries should be taken in equal numbers from the departments; 3d, that they should be nominated by the convention.

After the adoption of these three propositions, Gensonné deemed it expedient to give an hour's respite to the assembly, which was fatigued and worn to lassitude. The deputies rose to retire. "I call upon good citizens to remain in their places!" shouted Danton. Every one resumed his seat at the vibrations of that terrific voice. "What!" he resumed, "is it at the moment that Miranda may be vanquished, and Dumouriez, taken in the rear, obliged to lay down his arms,* that you think of forsaking your posts? It behoves you to conclude the enactment of these extraordinary laws, destined to strike terror into your domestic foes! They require to be arbitrary, because it is impossible to render them precise; because, terrible though they be, they are surely preferable to popular executions, which, now as in September, would be the consequence of delays in justice. After settling this tribunal, it will be incumbent on you to organise an energetic executive power, to be in immediate relation with yourselves, and capable of putting in motion all your resources of men and money. To-day, then, the extraordinary tribunal; to-morrow, the executive power; and after to-morrow, the departure if your commissioners for the departments. Let calumnies be heaped upon my head, let my very memory perish, but let the republic be saved!"

Notwithstanding this impetuous exhortation, the suspension of an hour was carried, and the deputies proceeded to snatch a few moments of indispensable repose. It was about seven in the evening. The idleness of the Sunday, the entertainments given in the course of the day, and the questions agitated in the assembly, all contributed to stimulate popular excitation. Without any plot being formed beforehand, as the Girondists believed, but simply by concurrent causes of incitement acting upon previous dispositions, the people were led to a deplorable scene of commotion. The Jacobin Club was sitting; Bentabole had hastened thither to report what had passed in the convention, and to complain that the patriots had not been so energetic as on the day preceding. The council-general of the commune was likewise assembled. The sections, forsaken by the peaceable citizens, were abandoned to a few furious men, who passed the most inflammatory resolutions. In that of the Quatre-Nations, eighteen frantic bawlers had decided that the department of the Seine ought at the moment to be invested with the sovereignty, and that the electoral body of Paris ought immediately to assemble for the purpose of lopping off the unfaithful members of the National Convention, who were in confederacy with the enemies of the revolution. The same resolution had been adopted by the Cordelier Club; and a joint deputation from the section and the club was at this particular instant haranguing the commune in communication of these resolves. According to the usual custom in all disturbances, certain of the more froward ran to make fast the barriers.

At this very time, the shouts of an infuriated mob resounded in the streets; the recruits who had dined at the Halle-aux-Blés, foaming with rage and debauchery, brandishing swords and pistols, advanced towards the hall of the Jacobin Club, filling the air with excruciating yells. They arrived there precisely as Bentabole finished his report upon the day's proceedings in the convention. Congregated at the doorway, they demanded leave to defile through the hall. They crossed it amidst deafening cheers. One of them essayed to speak, and articulated: "Citizens, in the danger of the country, the conquerors of the 10th August are arisen to exterminate the enemies at home and abroad." "Yes!" responded the president Collot-D'Herbois, "in spite of intriguers, we will save liberty with you." Desfieux then spoke, saying that Miranda was the creature of Pétion, and a traitor; that Brissot had provoked the declaration of war against England in order to ruin France. "There is only one mode," added he, "of saving ourselves, and that is by getting rid of all these traitors, by placing all the appellants under arrest at their own houses, and having other deputies nominated by the people." A man attired in military garb, issuing from the crowd which had just defiled through the hall, vociferated that arrest was far from being sufficient, that vengeance was needed. "What is inviolability?" said he: "I trample it under my feet!" At this moment, Dubois de Crancé arrived, and attempted to repudiate these instigations. His resistance provoked a tempestuous scene. It was finally proposed to divide into two columns, one to go in quest of their brethren the Cordeliers, and the other to visit the convention, with the view of defiling through its hall, and making known to it all that was demanded at its hands. The leaders hesitated to sanction the departure; but the galleries pressed into the hall, the lights were extinguished, the agitators gained their point, and the multitude divided into two bodies to proceed to the convention and the Cordeliers.

It so happened that the wife of Louvet, who resided with him in the Rue Saint-Honoré, near the Jacobin Club, had heard the tumultuous din proceeding from that locality, and had repaired thither to learn what might be its cause. She was present at the scene we have just related; she hastened to apprize Louvet, who, with several other members of the right side, had quitted the sitting of the convention, where it was rumoured they were marked out for assassination. Louvet, armed as was then universally the custom, profited by the obscurity of the night, ran from door to door advertising his friends of their danger, and appointing for them a rendezvous in a secluded spot, where they might shelter themselves from the blows of the assassins. He found several of them at the house of Pétion, calmly deliberating upon decrees to be passed. He endeavoured to inspire them with his own alarms, but failed to disturb the impassible Pétion, who, looking up at the sky, and seeing the rain pouring down, said coolly, "There will be nothing to-night." However, a rendezvous was fixed, and one of them, Kervélégan by name, repaired in all haste to the barrack of the Brest battalion, in order to put it under arms. In the mean time, the ministers assembled at the house of Lebrun, and, being utterly powerless from the want of an armed force, knew not what means to take in defence of the convention and of themselves, for they also were threatened. The assembly itself, struck with consternation, sat in anticipation of some terrible catastrophe, deeming at every noise, at every reverberating shout, that the next moment would bring the assassins into its precincts. Only forty members remained on the benches of the right side, in full expectation of an attack upon their lives; they all had arms, and held their pistols ready for service. They had agreed amongst themselves to rush upon the Mountain at the first commotion, and cut down as many of its members as they could. The galleries and the Mountain maintained a similar attitude of preparation, and on both sides a sanguinary and desperate encounter was thus defyingly awaited.

But audacity had not reached the pitch necessary for the perpetration of a 10th of August against the convention; this was but a preliminary scene—a 20th of June. The commune shrunk from encouraging a movement for which opinion was not yet prepared—nay, reprobated it with all sincerity. The mayor, when the deputations from the Cordeliers and the Quatre-Nations presented themselves, rebuked them without allowing them to conclude. A fawner upon the Jacobins, Pache was doubtless inimical to the Girondists; it is probable he even desired their fall; but he might judge a demonstration premature and dangerous; moreover, like Pétion on the 20th June and the 10th August, he was restrained by a sense of illegality, and waited for a show of coercion to yield. Consequently, he repelled the joint deputation. Hebert and Chaumette, procurators of the commune, supported him. Orders were sent to throw open the barriers, and addresses were framed to the sections and the Jacobins, recalling them to the observance of order. Santerre delivered a highly energetic discourse before the commune, in denunciation of those who clamoured for a fresh insurrection. He said that the tyrant being cast down, a second insurrection could only be directed against the people, who actually reigned alone; that if there were evil deputies, they must be endured, as Maury and Cazalès had been endured; that Paris was not all France, and was bound to accept the deputies of the departments; and that as to the complaints against the minister of war, if he had displaced several persons in his department, he was perfectly justified, since he was responsible for his agents. He added, that certain misguided and empty-headed persons in Paris had an idea they were fit to govern, whilst they did but disorganise; but that in a twinkling he would call out the armed force and reduce the malignants to order.

In the interim, Beurnonville, minister at war, whose mansion was beset, cleared the walls of his garden, collected all the adherents he could muster, put himself at the head of the battalion of Brest, and kept the agitators in awe. The section Quatre-Nations, the Cordeliers, and the Jacobins, retreated to their respective localities. Thus the resistance of the commune, the conduct of Santerre, the courage of Beurnonville and the Brest battalion, perhaps also the rain, which fell abundantly, arrested the progress of the insurrection. Furthermore, passion was not yet sufficiently inordinate against all that was most noble and generous in the new-born republic. Pétion, Condorcet, and Vergniaud, were still destined to manifest for some time longer their fortitude, their talents, and their commanding eloquence, in the convention. All gradually subsided into calmness. The mayor, summoned to the bar of the convention, gave the most satisfactory assurances; and that very night it tranquilly concluded the decree organising the revolutionary tribunal. This tribunal, as thus finally constituted, was composed of a jury, five judges, a public accuser, and two associates, all named by the convention. The jurymen were to be chosen before the month of May, and provisionally they might be taken from the department of Paris and the four adjoining departments. Each juryman was to pronounce his opinion in open court.

The immediate consequence of the 10th March was to rekindle the indignation of the members of the right side, and somewhat to perplex those of the left side, who were compromised by these precipitate demonstrations. On all sides, however, the movement was deprecated as illegal, and as an outrage on the national representation. Those even who were not hostile to the idea of a fresh insurrection, condemned the recent attempt as ill conducted, and warned the people to beware of disorganisers, subsidised by the emigrants and England to provoke disturbances. The two sides of the assembly seemed to emulate each other in strengthening this latter opinion; both in fact presumed a secret influence at work, and upbraided each other with being in confederacy therewith. An extraordinary scene that occurred in the assembly still further confirmed this general conviction. The section Poissonnière, in presenting some volunteers, demanded an act of impeachment against Dumouriez, the general upon whom the entire hopes of the French army at that time reposed. This petition, read at the bar by the president of the section, excited a general burst of indignation. "He is an aristocrat," exclaimed several voices, "in the pay of England!" At this instant, curious eyes were directed towards the banner borne by the section, and the astounding fact was discerned that its streamer was white, and that fleurs-de-lis decorated its summit. Shouts of wrath broke forth at this discovery; the fleurs-de-lis and the streamer were torn to shreds, and replaced by a tricoloured ribbon thrown down by a female in the galleries. Isnard immediately rose to move a decree of impeachment against the president of the section. More than a hundred voices seconded the motion, and in the number, that which attracted most attention was the voice of Marat.

"This petition," said he, "is a foul plot, and ought to be read to the end; it will be seen that it contains a demand for the heads of Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, and others. You feel what a triumph such a massacre would be for our enemies! it would prove the desolation of the convention"—— Here universal cheers interrupted Marat. He resumed; himself denounced one of the chief agitators, named Fournier, and moved his arrest. It was instantly ordered; the whole affair was remitted to the committee of general safety; and a copy of the minutes was directed to be transmitted to Dumouriez, in order that he might perceive how the assembly spurned the insinuations of his calumniators.

Varlet, the young friend and companion of Fournier, flew to the Jacobin Club, claiming vengeance for his arrest, and aid for his rescue. "Fournier," said he, "is not the only one menaced: Lasouski, Desfieux, myself, in fine, are so likewise. The revolutionary tribunal, just established, is to be turned against the patriots like that of the 10th August, and the brethren who hear me are not true Jacobins unless they follow me." He then proceeded to inveigh against Dumouriez, and urge his impeachment; upon which a terrible tumult ensued in the society; the president put on his hat, and declared that a design clearly existed for ruining the Jacobins. Billaud-Varennes himself appeared in the tribune to denounce these inflammatory diatribes and justify Dumouriez, to whom he was not partial, he said, but who was then discharging his duty, and had proved that he was prepared to combat vigorously. He complained, also, of a project formed to disorganise the convention by violent attacks on its members; he pronounced Varlet, Fournier, and Desfieux, open to grave suspicions; and recommended the plan of a purifying scrutiny, to relieve the society from all secret enemies plotting to compromise it. The opinions of Billaud-Varennes were listened to with attention; and satisfactory tidings arriving at the moment, to wit, the rallying of the army by Dumouriez, and the recognition of the republic by the Ottoman Porte, tranquillity was in the end fully restored.

Thus Marat, Billaud-Varennes, and Robespierre (the latter having also spoken in the same spirit), all declared against the agitators, and affected to believe that they were subsidised by the enemy. Hence, an incontestible proof is afforded that no secretly concerted plot existed, as the Girondists were prone to surmise. If any such confederacy had been planned, Billaud-Varennes, Marat, and Robespierre, would unquestionably have been more or less implicated; they would have felt it incumbent on them to observe silence, as did the left side of the Legislative Assembly after the analogous outrage of the 20th June; and assuredly could not have ventured to demand the arrest of one of their own accomplices. But in this instance the movement was simply the effect of sudden popular ferment, and could be safely disavowed if it proved too premature, or were ill-arranged. Moreover, Marat, Robespierre, and Billaud-Varennes, albeit desiderating the fall of the Girondists, were sincere in their dread of foreign intrigues, and of disorganisation in presence of a victorious enemy; especially apprehensive of opinion in the departments, seriously embarrassed by the accusations to which such movements exposed them, and probably as yet looking forward merely to monopolise all the ministries and all the committees, and so effecting the exclusion of the Girondists from any influential participation in the government, but not violently expelling them from the legislature.

One man only, Danton, might be justly viewed with suspicion, although he was the least inveterate amongst the enemies of the Girondists. He possessed unlimited influence over the Cordeliers, the authors of the movement; he was not hostile to the members of the right side, but to their system of moderation, which in his judgment relaxed the action of government; he insisted at all hazards upon an extraordinary tribunal and a supreme committee, invested with an irresistible dictatorship, because his paramount object, superior to all other considerations, was the success of the revolution; and it is possible that he had secretly instigated the agitators of the 10th March, with the view of intimidating the Girondists and subduing their resistance. It is at all events certain that he evinced no eagerness to disavow the authors of the commotion, but on the contrary reiterated his exhortations for the organisation of the government upon more energetic and inexorable principles.

Be the conjecture correct or erroneous, it was decided that the aristocrats were the hidden movers of these disturbances; every one believed or affected to believe so. Vergniaud, in a speech of captivating eloquence, devoted to an exposure of the whole conspiracy, upheld this supposition; he was blamed, it is true, by Louvet, who was desirous that the Jacobins should be more directly attacked; but he gained the point, that the first task of the extraordinary tribunal should be to pursue the authors of the 10th March. The minister of justice, who had been instructed to present a report upon the events of that day, declared that in his researches he had not found the least trace of the revolutionary committee, to whom they were sometimes attributed, but had simply discovered hasty ebullitions in clubs, and impetuous suggestions offered under the influence of excitement. All that he had ascertained of a more precise nature was the fact of meetings being held at the Café Corrazza by certain members of the Cordelier Club. These persons were Lasouski, Fournier, Gusman, Desfieux, and Varlet, the usual agitators of the sections. They were accustomed to meet after the sittings to discuss political subjects. No importance was attached to this revelation: and, as much deeper schemes had been presumed, the conclave of a few individuals, so subordinate in station, at the Café Corrazza, was treated with derision.

CHAPTER XX.

MILITARY REVERSES, AND THEIR CONSEQUENCES.—BEGINNING OF THE TROUBLES IN LA VENDÉE.—REVOLUTIONARY DECREES.—ARREST OF THE DUKE OF ORLEANS AND HIS FAMILY.—TREASON AND FLIGHT OF DUMOURIEZ.

In the preceding chapter we have seen to what a pitch of exasperation the feuds of parties had mounted in France, and the extraordinary measures taken by the revolutionary government to withstand the foreign coalition and domestic factions. It was in this state of things, with all its lowering portents, that Dumouriez returned from Holland and joined the army at Louvain. We have already described him employing his authority against the commissioners of the executive power, and repelling with all his might the Jacobinism attempted to be ingrafted on Belgium. To these steps he added one still more daring, calculated to involve him in a fate similar to that of Lafayette. On the 12th March he addressed a letter to the convention, in which, reverting to the disorganisation of the armies effectuated by Pache and the Jacobins, to the decree of the 15th December, and to the vexations inflicted upon the Belgians, he imputed all the existing evils to the disorganising spirit communicated from Paris to France, and from France to the countries enfranchised by her armies. This letter, full of rash expressions, and even of remonstrances, such as it became no general to make, reached the committee of general safety at the very moment so many accusing voices were raised against Dumouriez, and when constant efforts were making to prop him in popular estimation, as well as to attach him personally to the republic. This letter was kept secret, and Danton was forthwith dispatched to induce him to recall it.

Dumouriez rallied his army in advance of Louvain, collected his scattered columns, and pushed a corps towards the right, both to defend the Compine and connect his operations with the rear of the army entangled in Holland. Immediately afterwards he determined upon resuming the offensive, in order to restore confidence to his soldiers. The Prince of Cobourg, after seizing upon the course of the Meuse from Liege to Maestricht, and advancing beyond it as far as Saint-Trond, had caused Tirlemont to be occupied by an advanced corps. Dumouriez retook that town; and perceiving that his enemy had neglected to guard the important post of Goidsenhoven, which commands the whole country between the two Gettes, he ordered a few battalions to the spot, which established themselves without difficulty. The next day, the 16th March, the enemy attempted to recover this lost position, and assaulted it with great vigour. Dumouriez, who was prepared for this attack, took care to have it well sustained, trusting to encourage his troops by the result of this contest. The imperialists were repulsed, with the loss of from 700 to 800 men; and repassing the little Gette, proceeded to station themselves in and amongst the villages of Neerwinden, Landen, Neerlanden, Overwinden, and Racour. The French, exhilarated by their recent advantage, planted themselves in front of Tirlemont, and in several villages situated on the left of the little Gette, which had become the line of separation between the two armies.

In this position, Dumouriez resolved to risk a general engagement; and this determination was equally bold and prudent. A methodical war of tactics was unsuited to his troops, still but partially disciplined. He felt the necessity of restoring the lustre of French prowess, calming the apprehensions of the convention, securing the fidelity of the Belgians, driving the enemy beyond the Meuse, there fixing him for a time, then darting off once more to Holland, marching with flying colours into a capital of the coalesced powers, and establishing the revolution in that central point. To these projects Dumouriez further added, according to his own statement, the re-establishment of the constitution of 1791 and the overthrow of demagogues, to be accomplished by the aid of the Dutch and of his own army. But this addition was as absurd at this moment as when he was upon the Moerdyk; wherein all that was sagacious, practicable, and essential in his plan, consisted in the purpose of regaining his influence, recovering the reputation of the French arms, and being enabled to resume his military projects by a decisive victory. The reviving ardour of his troops, and the position he occupied, gave him well-grounded hopes of success; moreover, he was in a situation that imperiously called upon him to incur great hazards, and banish hesitation from his mind.

The French army extended along a front of two leagues, skirting the little Gette from Neer-Heylissem to Leaw. Dumouriez resolved upon a converting movement, intended to drive the enemy between Leaw and Saint-Trond. His left being planted at Leaw as on a pivot, his right would turn by Neer-Heylissem, Racour, and Landen, and oblige the Austrians to recede before it as far as Saint-Trond. For that purpose, it was necessary to pass the little Gette, scale its precipitate banks, carry Leaw, Orsmael, Neerwinden, Overwinden, and Racour. These three last-named villages, fronting the right flank, which would have to traverse them in its converting movement, formed the principal objects of attack. Dumouriez, dividing his right into three columns, under the orders of Valence, commanded them to pass the Gette at the bridge of Neer-Heylissem; the first was directed to distract the attention of the enemy; the second, to seize briskly upon the elevated cemetery of Middelwinden, thunder upon the village of Overwinden from that height, and capture it; the third, to attack the village of Neerwinden from the right. The centre, intrusted to the Duke of Chartres, and composed of two columns, had orders to pass by the bridge of Esemael, move through Laer, and attack Neerwinden in front, already menaced on its first flank by the third column. Lastly, the left, under the command of Miranda, was to be divided into two and three columns, occupy Leaw and Orsmael, and there maintain itself; whilst the centre and the right, marching forward after the victory, would accomplish the converting movement which was the aim of the battle.

These dispositions were fixed on the 17th March, at night. The next day, the 18th, by nine in the morning, the whole army was in motion, all alacrity and order. The Gette was passed at all points. Miranda occupied Leaw by his lieutenant Champmorin, carried Orsmäel in person, and opened a cannonade upon the enemy, who had retired to the heights of Halle, and there strongly intrenched himself. The object was attained in this quarter.

In the centre and on the right, the movements took place at the same hour; those two divisions of the army traversed Elissem, Esemaël, and Neer-Heylissem, and, in spite of a murderous fire, cleared in gallant style the steep heights bordering on the Gette. The column on the extreme right passed through Racour, poured into the plain, and instead of expanding itself, as it was ordered, committed the error of contracting upon Overwinden in quest of the enemy. The second column of the right, after being retarded in its march, charged with heroic impetuosity the elevated cemetery of Middelwinden, and drove out the imperialists; but instead of establishing itself firmly in that position, it merely traversed it, and took possession of Overwinden. The third column entered Neerwinden, and also committed a blunder in consequence of a misconception, by spreading too early out of the village, and thereby exposing itself to be dislodged by a return of the imperialists. The French army, however, had almost attained its object; but the Prince of Cobourg, having originally erred in not attacking the French forces when engaged in passing the Gette, and climbing its steep banks, now repaired his fault by giving a general order to retake the abandoned positions. A superior force was brought against the right flank under Miranda. Clairfayt, profiting by the first column not having persisted in turning him, by the second not having established itself on the cemetery of Middelwinden, and by the third and the two composing the centre, having gathered confusedly in Neerwinden, crossed the plain of Landen, retook Racour, the cemetery of Middelwinden, Overwinden, and Neerwinden. At this instant, the French were in a precarious predicament. Driven from all the points they had occupied, forced back on the declivities of the heights, turned on their right, cannonaded on their front by a superior artillery, menaced by two corps of cavalry, and having a river at their back, they might be utterly cut off, and would assuredly have been so, if the enemy, instead of directing his main force against their left, had pushed with more vigour their centre and right. Dumouriez, flying to the threatened point, rallied his columns, recaptured by a detachment the cemetery of Middelwinden, and marched in person upon Neerwinden, already twice taken by the French, and as many times retaken by the imperialists. Dumouriez re-entered it for the third time, after a frightful carnage. This unlucky village was choked with the bodies of men and horses; and, in the confusion of the attack, the French troops were both unduly heaped and scattered. Dumouriez, perceiving the danger, abandoned a position so encumbered with human fragments, and reformed his columns at some distance from the village. There he surrounded himself with artillery, and prepared to maintain himself on the field of battle. At this moment, two squadrons of cavalry plunged upon him, the one from Neerwinden, the other from Overwinden. Valence anticipated the first, at the head of the French cavalry, made an impetuous charge upon it, repulsed it, and, covered with wounds, reluctantly yielded his command to the Duke of Chartres. General Thouvenot received the second with calm intrepidity, permitted it to get entangled in the midst of his infantry, whose ranks he had ordered to open, then suddenly gave the word for a double discharge of grape and musketry, which being made at close aim, overwhelmed the imperial cavalry, and almost entirely destroyed it. Dumouriez thus remained master of the field of battle, and established himself thereon with the view of completing the next day his converting movement.

The day had been sanguinary, but the most difficult task seemed accomplished. The left, planted since the morning at Leaw and Orsmaël, was deemed to have been unmolested, since the fire had ceased at two o'clock in the afternoon. Dumouriez, therefore, concluded that it had retained its acquisition. He looked upon himself as victor, inasmuch as he occupied the field of battle. In the mean time, night approached, the right and the centre had lighted their fires, but no officer had arrived to apprise Dumouriez, on the part of Miranda, of what had occurred on his left flank. He began to entertain doubts, which soon increased to anxiety. He set off on horseback with two officers and two servants, and found the village of Laer abandoned by Dampierre, who commanded one of the two centre columns under the Duke of Chartres. Dumouriez there learnt that the left, entirely broken, had repassed the Gette and fled to Tirlemont; and that Dampierre, finding himself, from that cause, uncovered, had moved backward to the post he occupied in the morning before the battle. He instantly departed at full gallop, followed by his two officers and two servants, narrowly escaped capture by the Austrian hulans, reached Tirlemont at midnight, and came up with Miranda, who had retrograded two leagues from the field of battle, and whom Valence, transported to the rear on account of his wounds, was vainly urging to retrace his ground. Miranda, fixed at Orsmael from the morning, had been attacked at the moment the imperialists retook all their positions. The greater part of the opposing forces had borne on his wing, which, being partly composed of national volunteers, had forthwith broken rank, and fled to Tirlemont. Miranda, hurried along with the fugitives, had not had either time or vigour sufficient to rally his soldiers, although Miaczinski had come to his succour with a corps of fresh troops; he even forgot to let the general-in-chief be informed of his disaster. On the other hand, Champmorin, who had occupied Leaw with the last column, had maintained himself there until evening, without thinking of retreating to Bingen, his point of departure in the morning, until the close of day,

The French army was thus divided, part being behind and part in front of the Gette; and if the enemy had been less intimidated by so obstinate an action, and pushed his advantages to their practicable extent, he might have sliced the French line, annihilated the right, encamped at Neerwinden, and put to flight the left, which had already so precipitately recoiled. Dumouriez, cool and collected, forthwith decided upon a retreat, and the following morning prepared to execute it. He took the command of Miranda's division, endeavoured to impart fresh courage to the soldiers, and ordered a movement in advance, so as to stop the enemy on the left of the line, whilst the centre and right, prosecuting their retreat, should be engaged in repassing the Gette. But this portion of the army, disheartened by its defeat of the preceding day, advanced reluctantly. Fortunately Dampierre, who had recrossed the Gette the same day with a column of the centre, supported the movement of Dumouriez, and displayed equal intelligence and courage. Dumouriez, constantly in the midst of his battalions, cheered their drooping spirits, and prepared to lead them up the heights of Wommersem, which they had occupied the day before the battle. The Austrians had already planted batteries on this eminence, from which they kept up a murderous fire. Dumouriez came in front of his dejected troops, and pointed out to them that it was better to risk the assault than receive an unintermitting fire, and that they would escape it for a single charge, infinitely less destructive to them than a dead inertness before a sweeping artillery. Twice he stirred them into motion, and twice, as if paralysed by the remembrance of yesterday, they came to a stand-still; and whilst they supported, with heroic constancy, the cannonade from the heights of Wommersem, they could not muster the easier courage to charge with fixed bayonets. During this critical pause, a ball struck the horse rode by Dumouriez; he was thrown to the earth, and covered with mud. His panic-struck soldiers were on the point of flight at this spectacle; but the general sprang on his feet with youthful agility, remounted on horseback, and continued to uphold them on the field of battle.

During this interval, the Duke of Chartres conducted the retreat of the right and half of the centre. Directing his four columns with infinite judgment and intrepidity, he tranquilly retired in presence of a formidable array, and crossed the three bridges of the Gette without being incommoded. Dumouriez thereupon withdrew his left wing, as well as the column under Dampierre, and re-assumed his positions held previous to the battle, in presence of an enemy struck with admiration at his dexterous retreat. On the 19th, the army found itself, as on the 17th, between Hackendoven and Goidsenhoven, but weakened by a loss of 4000 dead, by a desertion of more than 10,000 fugitives, who were scampering in all directions towards the interior, and by the depression of a lost battle.

Dumouriez, deeply chagrined, and agitated by contending emotions, was sometimes moved to rush desperately upon the Austrians and fight them to the last extremity, and at other times to exterminate the faction of Jacobins, to whom he attributed the disorganisation and the discomfiture of his troops. In his fits of wrath, he loudly execrated the tyranny of Paris, and his words, repeated by his staff, were circulated throughout the army. Nevertheless, although a prey to singular exasperation of mind, he lost not the coolness necessary in a retreat, but made the best dispositions for securing a long occupancy of Belgium by means of the fortresses, if he should be obliged to evacuate it with his armies. Thus he ordered General d'Harville to throw a strong garrison into the castle of Namur, and make a stand there with a division. He dispatched General Ruault to Antwerp, in order to collect the 20,000 men engaged in the expedition to Holland, and guard the Scheldt, whilst sufficient garrisons occupied Breda and Gertruydenberg. His object was to form a semicircle of fortresses, described by Namur, Mons, Tournay, Courtray, Antwerp, Breda, and Gertruydenberg, and to fix himself in the centre of this semicircle, and await the reinforcements necessary to act with renewed energy. On the 22d, he sustained an action of position with the imperialists before Louvain, an engagement almost equal in importance with that of Goidsenhoven, and costing as many men. The same evening he had an interview with Colonel Mack, an officer who exercised great influence over the operations of the allies, on account of the reputation he enjoyed in Germany. They agreed to abstain from provoking pitched battles, to proceed consecutively, with leisure and in good order, so as to spare the blood of the soldiers and the countries which formed the theatre of war. This species of armistice, signally favourable to the French, who would have disbanded if they had been warmly attacked, likewise perfectly suited the timid system of the coalition, which, after having recovered the Meuse, was unwilling to attempt any further decisive operations until the capture of Mayence.

This was the first negotiation of Dumouriez with the enemy. The politeness of Colonel Mack, and his engaging manners, were calculated to suggest to the agitated mind of the general the idea of appealing to foreign aid. He began to lose sight of any brilliant future in the career to which he was now bound: if a few months previously he contemplated gaining success, glory, influence, by commanding the French armies, and if this anticipation had rendered him more indulgent towards revolutionary violence, at present vanquished, odious in popular estimation, and attributing the disorganisation of his army to that very violence, he looked with unmitigated disgust upon disorders he had hitherto viewed with apathy and indifference. Reared in courts, and from personal observation well convinced how strongly framed a machine was needed to secure durability to a state, it was to him inconceivable that insurgent burghers should be equal to an operation so complicated as that of government. Under such circumstances, if a general, at once a warrior and administrator, holds force in his hands, he is easily tempted to indulge the idea of employing it to terminate disorders which afflict his mind and even menace his life. Dumouriez was sufficiently daring to form such an idea; and no longer perceiving any signal inducement to serve the revolution by victories, he determined to carve out a fresh prospect for himself, by making that revolution retrograde to the constitution of 1791, and reconciling it at that cost to all Europe. In this plan he required a king, and men mattered so little to Dumouriez, that the choice was not likely to incommode him greatly. He was charged at the time with a design to place the house of Orleans on the throne. What induced this belief was his affection for the Duke of Chartres, for whom he had reserved the most brilliant services in the army. But this was a very insignificant proof, for the young duke had merited all the distinction he had obtained, and moreover, there was nothing in his conduct to show any concert with Dumouriez. But another consideration effectually persuaded all minds, namely, that at the moment there was no other selection possible, if a new dynasty were intended to be created. The son of the deceased king was too young, and, besides, regicide does not admit so prompt a reconciliation with the dynasty smitten. The uncles were in a state of hostility; and there only remained the Orleans branch, as much compromised in the revolution as the Jacobins themselves, and alone capable of obviating the fears of revolutionists. If the excited mind of Dumouriez ever seriously pondered upon a preference, he could not then assign it elsewhere; and it was upon this necessity the accusation was grounded, that he designed to place the house of Orleans upon the throne. He denied the imputation when an emigrant; but that interested repudiation proves nothing; and he is entitled to no greater credence upon that point than upon the anterior date to which he pretended to carry back his counter-revolutionary projects. He has laboured to enforce the impression that his plan of resistance against the Jacobins was of older digestion; but the fact was not so. It was only when the career of success was closed for him, that he dreamt of opening for himself another. His project largely partook of personal resentment, chagrin at defeat, and a sincere though tardy abhorrence for endless disorders, to which he became acutely sensible when the film of illusion had been finally dispelled.

On the 22d, he found at Louvain Danton and Lacroix, who had arrived to remonstrate with him touching the letter written on the 12th to the convention, and kept secret by the committee of public safety. Danton, with whom he had many sympathies in common, hoped to win him back to calmer sentiments and to the general cause. But Dumouriez treated the commissioners, and Danton himself, with infinite moroseness, and took little pains to conceal from them the most untoward inclinations. He broke out into fresh complaints against the convention and the Jacobins, and refused to retract his letter. He merely consented to write a couple of lines, saying that he would explain his meaning at a future date. Danton and Lacroix departed without obtaining any satisfaction, and leaving him in a state of most irritable agitation.

On the 23d, after maintaining a stout resistance during the day, several corps abandoned their posts, and he was obliged to quit Louvain in confusion. Fortunately, the enemy was blind to this movement, and took no advantage of it to throw the whole army into irremediable confusion by a close pursuit. Dumouriez, after this last event, separated the troops of the line from the volunteers, united them with the artillery and composed by the junction a chosen body of 15,000 men, with which he placed himself in the rearguard There, ever visible amongst his soldiers, and daily skirmishing at their head, he succeeded in imparting to his retreat a firmer aspect. He caused Brussels to be evacuated with great order, passed through that city on the 25th, and pitched his tents at Ath on the 27th. Here he had renewed conferences with Colonel Mack who treated him with distinguished regard and delicacy; and an interview, intended simply to regulate the details of the armistice, speedily changed into an important negotiation. Dumouriez confided all his wrongs to the foreign colonel, and avowed to him his projects for overthrowing the National Convention And here, blinded by resentment, incensed to fury at the idea of a general disorganisation, the saviour of France in the Argonne obscured his glory by treating with an enemy whose ambition ought to have rendered all his intentions suspected, and whose power was then directly endangering the integrity of the country. As we have upon a former occasion been called upon to remark, there is only one alternative for a man of genius in such situations—either to retire and abdicate all influence, so as to avoid being the accomplice of a system which he disapproves, or to keep aloof from the evil he cannot obviate, and pursue one course, perform one part, always virtuous, always glorious—to labour zealously in defence of his country.

Dumouriez agreed with Colonel Mack that there should be a suspension of hostilities between the two armies; that the imperialists should not advance upon Paris, whilst he should march thither himself; and that the evacuation of Belgium should be the reward of this concession. It was likewise stipulated that the fastness of Condé should be provisionally surrendered as a guarantee, and that in case Dumouriez should stand in need of the Austrians, they were to be at his disposal. The fortresses were to receive mixed garrisons of imperialists and French in equal proportions, but to be under the command of French governors; and at the peace all places were to be restored. Such was the criminal convention concluded by Dumouriez with the Prince of Cobourg, through the medium of Colonel Mack.

The defeat of Neerwinden, and the progressive evacuation of Belgium, formed the extent of the disaster as yet known in Paris. But the loss of a great battle and a precipitate retreat, occurring simultaneously with gloomy tidings from the west, sufficed to occasion an alarming agitation. A plot had been discovered at Rennes, hatched according to all appearances by England, the Breton gentry, and the nonjuring priests. Commotions had previously broken out in the west, on account of the dearness of provisions and the threat to withhold pecuniary support from the state religion; but now the flag of insurrection was unfurled, with the avowed design of defending the cause of absolute monarchy. Gatherings of peasants, demanding the re-establishment of the clergy and the Bourbons, had appeared in the vicinity of Rennes and Nantes. Orleans was in open insurgency, and the representative Bourdon had narrowly escaped assassination. The rebels already amounted to several thousands—in sufficient force to require armies and generals to reduce them. The large towns were dispatching their national guards, General Labourdonnaye was advancing with his corps, and all things announced a civil war of the most implacable character. Thus, on the one hand, were the armies retreating before the coalition, and, on the other, La Vendée was up in arms: never had the ferment usually produced by impending danger had fiercer stimulants at any period of the revolution.

A short while previously, immediately after the 10th March, an attempt had been made to bring the leaders of the two parties together in the committee of general safety, with the view of enabling them to come to an understanding upon the causes of their differences. Danton was mainly instrumental in promoting this congress. The daily conflicts satisfied no hatreds of his, exposed him to discussions which he dreaded, and stayed the action of the revolution, an object so dear to his heart. He was therefore extremely solicitous to have them terminated. In the different interviews that were held, he evinced great candour and tolerance; and if he took the initiative, if he accused the Girondists, it was chiefly to ward off the reproaches that might have been so easily preferred against himself. The Girondists, Buzot, Guadet, Vergniaud, and Gensonné, with their accustomed sensitiveness, justified themselves as if the accusation had been serious, and their arguments found Danton by no means steeled against conviction. It was far otherwise with Robespierre; they irritated him whilst striving to convince him, and then endeavoured to show him how wrong he was to lose his temper, as if such a demonstration were likely to sweeten it. As for Marat, who had deemed himself essential to these conferences, none deigned to offer him the least explanation; and even his friends, fearful lest the alliance should be hereafter urged upbraidingly against them, refrained from exchanging a single word with him. Such meetings were calculated rather to aggravate than mitigate existing enmities: even had the leaders succeeded in demonstrating to each other their mutual wrongs, it is more than doubtful whether the persuasion would have cemented a reconciliation.

Affairs were in this state when the events in Belgium were made known at Paris. The tidings became the signal for immediate recriminations: on one side it was maintained that the public disasters were solely owing to the disorganisation introduced into the government, and on the other to the slackened action impeding it. Explanations were demanded touching the conduct of Dumouriez. His letter of the 12th March was read, which had been hitherto suppressed, and on its perusal exclamations arose that Dumouriez was tending to traitorous practices, that he was clearly pursuing the same course as Lafayette, and, following his example, commencing his treachery by insolent letters to the assembly. A second letter, dated the 27th March, which was even more bold in its expressions than that of the 12th, excited such suspicions still more strongly. On all sides Danton was pressed to disclose what he knew of Dumouriez. Every one was well aware that these two personages were united by a certain sympathy, that Danton had insisted upon the letter of the 12th March being suppressed, and that he had visited him to procure its recall. It was even bruited that they had jobbed in copartnery in affluent Belgium. Alike in the Jacobin Club, the committee of general defence, and the assembly, Danton was importuned for explanations. He, embarrassed by the suspicions of the Girondists, and the doubts of the Mountaineers themselves, for the first time in his life felt some difficulty in replying. He said that the great talents of Dumouriez had seemed worthy of the highest consideration; that it had been accordingly judged essential to see him before denouncing him, in order to impress upon him the errors he had been led into, and win him back, if it were possible, to better sentiments; that hitherto the commissioners had discerned in his conduct merely the effect of evil suggestions, and especially chagrin at his late reverses; but that they had deemed, and still adhered to the opinion, that his talents might be advantageously preserved to the republic.

Robespierre said that if such were the state of the case, it was quite unnecessary to humour his caprices, and in fact preposterous to observe such excessive delicacy towards him. He then proceeded to renew the motion formerly made by Louvet against the Bourbons remaining in France, that is to say, against the members of the Orleans family; thus greatly surprising all men that he, Robespierre, who in January had so energetically defended them when assailed by the Girondists, should now attack them with such fury. But his distrustful mind had been suddenly charged with sinister forebodings. Thus had he reasoned with himself: "A former prince of the blood cannot resign himself to his new condition, and although he may call himself Egalité, it is impossible that his sacrifice can be sincere; therefore he is conspiring, and in fact all our generals belong to him. Biron, who commands in the Alps, is his intimate friend; Valence, general of the army of the Ardennes, is son-in-law to his confidant Sillery; his two sons occupy distinguished stations in the army of Belgium, Dumouriez is openly devoted to them, and watches over their advancement with marked solicitude. The Girondists certainly attacked the family of Orleans in January last, but it was a feint on their part, simply designed to stifle suspicions of confederacy. Brissot, the friend of Sillery, is the intermediate agent of the conspiracy; the plot is palpable; the throne is reared again in France, and the country consigned to perdition, unless unwonted diligence be used in proscribing the implicated."

Such were the conclusions of Robespierre; and what rendered his peculiar logic the more formidable, was the fact that he, absorbed in hatred, implicitly believed in his own aspersions. The Mountain, in the greatest amazement, repudiated his proposition. "Adduce some proofs at least," said those who were seated near him. "Proofs!" retorted he; "of proofs I have none, but I have a moral conviction!"

The first impulse of opinion was, as usual in all moments of danger, to accelerate the action of the executive power and of the tribunals, at once to guard against what were called the external and internal enemies.

The commissioners named for the several departments were immediately dispatched, and the question was seriously canvassed whether the convention ought not to take a greater share in the execution of the laws. The manner in which the executive power was organised appeared inefficient. Ministerial officers, planted beyond the walls of the assembly, acting apart from their superior, and under his too slender and distant supervision, and committees enjoined to make reports upon all matters affecting the general safety—these various authorities clashing with each other, perpetually deliberating without acting, seemed decisively incompetent to the prodigious task intrusted to them. Besides, this ministry and these committees were composed of members suspected because they were moderate; and at that period, when promptitude and vigour were indispensable conditions of success, all tardiness, all moderation, was viewed as conspiracy. It was resolved, therefore, to establish a committee which should unite the functions of the diplomatic committee, the military committee, and the committee of general safety, with powers to order and act on emergency independently of its institutor, and arrest or supply ministerial action. Various projects of organisation were submitted to effect this purpose, and were eventually referred to a commission charged with their examination. Immediately subsequent to the disposal of this subject, the attention of the convention was claimed to the means available for reaching the internal enemy, that is to say, aristocrats and traitors, by whom it was said to be encompassed. France, exclaimed many voices, was full of refractory priests, of nobles, of their former dependants and of their former domestics; and this collection, still considerable, surrounded them, betrayed them, and menaced them as formidably as the foreign bayonets. These persons, therefore, it was necessary to ferret out, mark, and expose to the light, so that they might be prevented from pursuing their machinations. The Jacobins had consequently proposed, and the convention decreed, that, adopting a custom borrowed from China, the names of all the persons inhabiting a house should be inscribed on the doors.* It thereafter enjoined the disarming of all suspected citizens, and designated such to be nonjuring priests, nobles, seigneurs under the old feudal system, superseded functionaries, &c. &c. The disarming was to be effected by the mode of domiciliary visits, and the only alleviation introduced into the measure consisted in forbidding the visits to be made at night. After having thus ensured the means of pursuing and grasping all those who gave the least umbrage, it finally added a mode of smiting them with the utmost dispatch, by installing the revolutionary tribunal. It was on the proposition of Danton that this terrible instrument of revolutionary distrust and jealousy was brought into play. That redoubtable person had fully comprehended its possible abuse, but he sacrificed all considerations to the one great object. He was quite aware that to smite swiftly meant to investigate imperfectly; that to investigate imperfectly involved the chance of error, especially in times of party rage; and that to commit error was to commit atrocious injustice. But, in his eyes, the revolution was society accelerating its movement in all things, in matters of justice, administration, and war. "In periods of tranquillity," said he, "society prefers allowing the escape of the guilty to punishing the innocent, because the guilty is scarcely dangerous; but in proportion as he becomes so, it increases its vigilance to seize him; and when he becomes so dangerous as to place its very existence in jeopardy, or at least when it thus imagines, it smites all that excite its suspicions, and then prefers injuring an innocent person to allowing the escape of one guilty. Such is a dictatorship—that is to say, violent action in threatened societies—it is swift, arbitrary, faulty, but irresistible."

Thus the concentration of powers in the convention, the installation of the revolutionary tribunal, the commencement of the inquisition against the suspected, and a duplication of hatred against the deputies who resisted these extraordinary measures, were the consequences of the battle of Neerwinden, the retreat from Belgium, the threats of Dumouriez, and the commotions in La Vendée.

The splenetic humour of Dumouriez was further ruffled by additional disappointments. He speedily learnt that the army of Holland was retiring in disorder, abandoning Antwerp and the Scheldt, and leaving merely the two French garrisons in Breda and Gertruydenberg; that D'Harville had been unable to hold the castle of Namur, and was falling back on Givet and Maubeuge; and, lastly, that Neuilly, far from being in a capacity to maintain himself at Mons, had felt himself obliged to retire upon Condé and Valenciennes, because his division, instead of taking position on the heights of Nimy, had pillaged the magazines and taken to flight. Thus, in consequence of the vicious condition of this army, he saw his project vanish for forming a semicircle of fortresses in Belgium, which would have passed from Namur into Flanders and Holland, and in the centre whereof he would himself have taken post, as the most advantageous for action. He had soon nothing to offer in exchange to the imperialists; and in proportion as he became weaker, he fell more and more in dependence upon them. His irritation augmented as he drew nigh to France, having then an opportunity of seeing more nearly the prevailing disorders, and hearing the cries raised against himself. He began to throw off all disguise in conversation, and his words, gathered by his staff and repeated in the army, proclaimed the projects fermenting in his brain. The sister of the Duke of Orleans and Madame de Sillery, flying from the proscriptions with which they were menaced, had repaired to Belgium in quest of protection from their kinsmen. They were at Ath, and the fact gave a fresh stimulus to suspicion.

Three Jacobin envoys, named respectively Dubuisson, a refugee from Brussels, Proly, a natural son of Kaunitz, and Pereyra, a Portuguese Jew, made their appearance at Ath, under the real or false pretence of having a mission from Lebrun. They visited the quarters of the general as emissaries of the government, and experienced no difficulty in ascertaining projects which Dumouriez no longer concealed. They found him accompanied by Valence and the two sons of Orleans, encountered a very unfavourable reception, and heard expressions by no means flattering to the Jacobins and the convention. However, they returned the next day, and obtained a secret interview. Upon this occasion Dumouriez was perfectly explicit and frank. He began by informing them that he was sufficiently strong to combat both in front and in rear; that the convention was composed of two hundred brigands and six hundred imbeciles, and that he despised its decrees, which would speedily lose all efficacy except in the precincts of Paris itself. "As to the revolutionary tribunal," he added, with increasing indignation, "I shall know how to suppress it; and so long as I have three inches of steel in my belt, that abomination shall never subsist." He subsequently inveighed against the volunteers, whom he stigmatised as cowards, saying, that for the future he would only have troops of the line, and that with them he would put an end to all the disorders in Paris.

* Decree of the 29th March.

"You do not wish a constitution, then?" observed the three dialogists. "The new constitution imagined by Condorcet is too preposterous." "And what will you substitute?" "The old one of 1791, bad as it is." "But you will need a king; and the name of Louis excites horror." "It matters little whether his name be Louis or Jacques." "Or Philip?" suggested one of the envoys: "but how will you replace the existing assembly?"

Dumouriez reflected for a moment, and then replied: —"There are local administrations, all nominated by the confidence of the nation; and the five hundred presidents of districts will be the five hundred representatives." "But before they can be assembled, who will take the initiative in this revolution?" "The Mamelukes, or, in other words, my army. It will express the wish, the presidents of districts will confirm that expression, and I will make peace with the coalition, which, if I offer no opposition, is at Paris in a fortnight."

The three dialogists, either because they had come to sound him in the interest of the Jacobins, as Dumouriez himself thought, or because they were anxious to lead him into still more precise revelations, hereupon threw in a suggestion. "Why," they asked, "would he not put the Jacobin Club, a ready-formed deliberative body, into the place of the convention?" A flush of indignation, mingled with scorn, spread over the countenance of the general at these words, and they withdrew their proposition. They then reminded him of the danger to which his scheme would expose the Bourbons detained in the Temple, and in whose fate he had betokened great interest. He replied quickly, that should they perish to the last scion, at Paris and at Coblentz, France would still find a chief and be saved; that for the rest, if Paris committed fresh barbarities on the unfortunate prisoners in the Temple, he would be speedily on the spot, and with 12,000 men obtain the mastery. He would not imitate the imbecility of Broglie, he said, who, with 30,000 men, had permitted the capture of the Bastille; but with two posts, Nogent and Pont-Saint-Maxence, he would starve the Parisians to death. "At the same time," he subjoined, "your Jacobins may expiate all their crimes; let them save the unfortunate prisoners, and expel the seven hundred and fifty-five tyrants of the convention, and their sins are forgiven."

His interlocutors finally spoke to him of his own dangers. "There will be always time for a gallop to the Austrians," said he. "Do you desire, then, to partake the fate of Lafayette?" they asked. "I will go to the enemy somewhat differently from him," he replied; "besides, the powers have another opinion of my talents, and do not reproach me with the 5th and 6th October."

Dumouriez had good reason for not fearing the fate of Lafayette. The coalition esteemed his talents too highly, the firmness of his principles too lightly, to incarcerate him at Olmütz. The three envoys quitted his presence, saying they would sound Paris and the Jacobins on the hints he had thrown out.

Although firmly assured that his visiters were pure Jacobins, Dumouriez had expressed himself with unreserved boldness. At this instant, in fact, his projects were notorious; the troops of the line and the volunteers observed each other with distrust, and all announced that the flag of revolt was about to be unfurled.

The executive power had received alarming reports, and the committee of general safety had proposed and procured a decree by which Dumouriez was ordered to the bar. Four commissioners, accompanied by the minister of war, were directed to proceed to the army, signify the decree, and bring the general to Paris. These four commissioners were Bancal, Quinette, Camus, and Lamarque. Beurnonville's nomination to this mission imposed upon him a difficult part, on account of the friendship which existed between him and Dumouriez.

This commission departed on the 30th March. On the same day, Dumouriez moved to the camp of Bruille, whence he threatened equally the three important strongholds of Lille, Condé, and Valenciennes. He was very uncertain as to the part he ought to take, for his army was divided in sentiment. The artillery, the troops of the line, the cavalry, all the organised corps, seemed devoted to him; but the national volunteers began to murmur and to separate from the others. In this situation, only one expedient was left him, namely, to disarm the volunteers. But he thereby ran the risk of provoking a combat, and the experiment was full of danger, inasmuch as the troops of the line might probably feel repugnance at slaughtering their comrades. Moreover, amongst those volunteers themselves were some who had fought admirably, and who manifested an attachment to his person. Hesitating, therefore, on so rigorous a measure, he turned his attention to the seizure of the three fortified towns into whose vicinity he had moved. By occupying them, he ensured supplies of provisions, and a supporting basis against the enemy, of whom he was still distrustful. But opinions were divided in those towns. The popular societies, aided by the volunteers, had openly declared against him, and indulged in threats against the troops of the line. At Valenciennes and Lille, the commissioners of the convention inflamed the zeal of the republicans, and in Condé his partisans had the advantage solely through the influence of the Neuilly division. Amongst the generals of division, Dampierre pursued a line of conduct towards him such as he himself had observed with respect to Lafayette after the 10th August; and several others, without distinctly announcing their intentions, were prepared to abandon him.

On the 31st, six volunteers, bearing on their caps the words written with chalk, "The republic or death," advanced up to him in his camp, and seemed disposed to seize upon his person. Assisted by his faithful Baptiste, he drove them off, and consigned them to his hussars. This occurrence gave rise to a considerable excitement in the army, and the various corps presented addresses to him during the day, which greatly cheered his hopes. He forthwith raised his standard, and detached Miaczinski with a few thousand men to occupy Lille. Miaczinski, advancing to execute his orders, intrusted Saint-Georges, the mulatto, who commanded one of the regiments in garrison, with the secret of his enterprise. The latter deceitfully urged Miaczinski to enter the place with a slight escort. The unsuspecting general allowed himself to be persuaded, and once within the walls, he was surrounded and delivered up to the authorities. The gates were closed, and the division wandered without a commander on the glacis of the fortification. Dumouriez instantly dispatched an aid-de-camp to rally it; but the aid-de-camp was likewise taken, and the division, being finally dispersed, was lost to him. After this unlucky attempt, he tried a similar one on Valenciennes, where General Ferrand commanded, whom he deemed perfectly disposed in his favour. But the officer charged to surprise the place betrayed his projects, joined Ferrand and the commissioners of the convention, and thus counteracted his designs on Valenciennes likewise. Condé, therefore, alone remained to him. Placed as he was between France and the enemy, he had but this solitary possession as a basis. If that were lost to him, he had no alternative but to submit to the imperialists, surrender himself entirely into their hands, and in all probability arouse the wrath of his army by forcing it to march in concert with them.

He transferred his head-quarters, on the 1st of April, to the flats of Saint-Amand, in order to be nearer Condé. He caused the son of Lecointre, member for Versailles, to be arrested, and sent him as a hostage to Tournay, requesting the Austrian Clairfayt to keep him shut up in the citadel. On the evening of the 2d, the four deputies of the convention, preceded by Beurnonville, arrived at Dumouriez's quarters. The hussars of Berchiny were drawn up before his door, and the whole of his staff was around him. Dumouriez in the first place cordially greeted his friend Beurnonville, and then asked the deputies the object of their mission. They refused to enter into explanations before the crowd of officers, whose dispositions appeared to them unfriendly, and desired to retire into an adjoining apartment. Dumouriez acceded to their wish, but the officers insisted that the door should remain open. Camus thereupon read him the decree, and called upon him to submit to its terms. The general replied that the state of his army required his presence; but that when it should be re-organised, he would see how it behoved him to act. Camus pressed him still more emphatically; but Dumouriez observed in answer, that he was not quite fool enough to trust himself in Paris, or within the fangs of the revolutionary tribunal; that tigers were howling for his head, but it was not his intention to gratify their craving. The four commissioners vainly assured him that no sinister purpose was formed against his personal safety, that they themselves were ready to answer for him, that his acquiescence would satisfy the convention, and that he would be speedily restored to his army. He refused to listen to their assurances, entreated them not to drive him to extremity, and told them their more advisable course was to adopt the moderate expedient of declaring by a resolution, that Dumouriez had appeared to them too indispensable to the army to warrant their separating him at so critical a moment. As he concluded this intimation he left them, enjoining them at the same time to hasten their decision. He returned with Beurnonville into the room where his staff was assembled, and awaited the determination of the commissioners amidst his officers. The deputies followed him in a few seconds, and with undaunted firmness reiterated their summons. "Will you obey the convention?" said Camus to him. "No," replied the general. "In that case," resumed Camus, "you are suspended from your functions; your papers will be seized, and your person arrested." "This is too much," exclaimed Dumouriez; "here, hussars!" The hussars flew to the call. "Arrest these persons," said he to them in German; "but do them no injury." Beurnonville entreated him to let him share their fate. "Very well," replied he; "I dare say I shall render you a real service, for I doubtless save you from the revolutionary tribunal."

Dumouriez ordered them refreshments, and then dismissed them to Tournay, in order to be kept as hostages by the Austrians. Early the following morning he mounted his horse, published a proclamation to the army and to France, and found in his soldiers, especially those of the line, dispositions to all appearance such as he could desire.

Intelligence of these various circumstances had been successively conveyed to Paris. The interview of Dumouriez with Proly, Dubuisson, and Pereyra, his attempts on Lille and Valenciennes, and lastly, the arrest of the four commissioners, were made known in that city in the order of their occurrence. The convention, the municipal assemblies, and the popular societies, had forthwith declared themselves permanent, a price had been set on the head of Dumouriez, and all the relatives of the officers in his army put under arrest in the character of hostages. A levy of 40,000 men was ordered in Paris and the neighbouring towns to cover the capital, and Dampierre received the command-in-chief of the army of Belgium. These measures of emergency were, as usual, accompanied by calumnious invectives. On all sides, Dumouriez, Orleans, and the Girondists, were ranked together and denounced as accomplices. Dumouriez, as the clamour rung, was one of those military aristocrats, a member of those old staffs, whose evil principles had been perpetually unmasking; Orleans was the first of those magnates who had assumed a false attachment to liberty, and whose deceit was unfolded after an hypocrisy of many years; finally, the Girondists were deputies become unfaithful like the members of all the right sides, and who abused their powers to destroy liberty. Dumouriez was only doing a little later what Bouillé and Lafayette had done somewhat earlier; Orleans was pursuing the same conduct as the other members of the house of Bourbon, and had merely adhered to the revolution a little longer than the Count de Provence; and the Girondists, like Maury and Cazalès in the Constituent, like Vaublanc and Pastoret in the Legislative Assembly, were betraying their country quite as palpably, but simply at a different period. Consequently, Dumouriez, Orleans, Brissot, Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, &c., all accomplices, were the traitors of this year.

The Girondists retorted by asserting that they had always been opposed to Orleans, whilst the Mountaineers were the very parties who had defended him; that they had quarrelled with Dumouriez, and held no relation with him; but that, on the other hand, those who had been sent to him in Belgium, those who had followed him in all his expeditions, those who had always shown themselves his friends, and even palliated his conduct, were Mountaineers. Lasource, carrying the recrimination still farther, had the imprudence to single out Lacroix and Danton, and accuse them of having neutralised the zeal of the convention by disguising the misdeeds of Dumouriez. This reproach of Lasource revived suspicions previously entertained as to the behaviour of Lacroix and Danton in Belgium. It was alleged, in fact, that they had reciprocated favours with Dumouriez; or, in other words, he had aided their rapine, they had winked at his defection. Danton, who only asked silence from the Girondists, was filled with rage, and darting to the tribune, proclaimed war to the death against them. "No more peace or truce," he exclaimed, "between you and us!" Contorting his terrific countenance, menacing the right side as he pointed his finger upon it, he cried—"I have intrenched myself in the citadel of reason, whence I will come forth with the cannon of truth, and pulverise the miscreants who have dared to accuse me."

The result of these mutual charges was—

1st, The nomination of a committee empowered to investigate the conduct of the commissioners sent into Belgium.

2d, The adoption of a decree destined to have fatal consequences, purporting that, without regard to the inviolability of the representatives, they should be put under impeachment the instant they were strongly presumed to be in confederacy with the enemies of the state.

3d, The arrest and translation to the prisons of Marseilles of Philip of Orleans and all his family.*

Thus, the fate of this prince, the sport of all parties, alternately suspected by the Jacobins and the Girondists, and accused of conspiring with all, because, in truth, he conspired with none, afforded a proof that no past grandeur could be endured in the present state of the revolution, and that the deepest self-abasement could neither allay distrust nor slip the scaffold.

Dumouriez, in the interim, judged that he had no time to lose. Seeing Dampierre and several generals of division abandon him, others merely awaiting the favourable moment, and a multitude of emissaries besieging his troops, he concluded it was essential to put them in motion, so as to impart the wished-for impetus to both officers and soldiers, and withdraw them from any other influence than his own. Consequently, he fixed a meeting with the Prince of Cobourg for the 4th April, in order to arrange definitively with him and Colonel Mack the operations he had in view. The meeting was appointed to take place near Condé. His design was to enter the place afterwards, purge the garrison of its doubtful members, and moving with all his army on Orchies, menace Lille, and attempt to awe it into surrender by deploying his entire strength.

On the morning of the 4th, he prepared to keep his appointment, and thence to proceed to Condé. He had merely ordered an escort of fifty troopers, and as their arrival was delayed, he rode on, directing they should be sent after him. Thouvenot, the sons of Orleans, a few officers, and some attendants, accompanied him. As soon as he reached the highway to Condé, he encountered two battalions of volunteers, whose appearance at that point greatly surprised him. Not having issued any commands for their removal, he was intending to dismount near a house to write out an order for their return, when he heard shouts and the firing of muskets. The battalions had in fact divided; and whilst one portion pursued him with cries to stop, the other endeavoured to cut off his escape towards a moat. He thereupon sprang forward with those that accompanied him, and anticipated the volunteers running to intercept his retreat. Reaching the edge of the moat, and his horse refusing the leap, he threw himself into it, climbed up the opposite bank amidst a shower of bullets, and, taking the horse of a servant, fled at full gallop towards Bury. After riding the whole day, he arrived there in the evening, and was joined by Colonel Mack, who had been apprised of what had passed. He sat up all night, writing and settling with Colonel Mack and the Prince of Cobourg all the conditions of their alliance, and somewhat amazed them by intimating his purpose to return amidst his army after the occurrences of the morning.

He mounted his horse, in fact, at dawn, and, followed by some imperial horse, returned by Maulde into the midst of his army. A few troops of the line surrounded him, and testified a continued attachment towards him, but the majority of countenances wore a gloomy frown. The news of his flight to Bury, in the centre of the hostile army, and the sight of the imperial dragoons, produced an impression at once fatal to Dumouriez, honourable to the French soldiers, and auspicious to the fortune of France. He soon learnt that the artillery, on the rumour of his having passed over to the Austrians, had quitted the camp, and that the retreat of so influential a portion of the army had discouraged the rest. Whole divisions were in the act of withdrawing to Valenciennes, to place themselves under Dampierre. He then saw that an absolute necessity had arisen for his definitively quitting the army and repassing to the imperialists. He was accompanied by a numerous staff, in which were included the two sons of Orleans and Thouvenot, and by the hussars of Berchiny, the whole of which regiment was eager to follow his fortunes.

The Prince of Cobourg and Colonel Mack, whose friend he had become, treated him with distinguished regard, and desired to renew with him the projects of the previous night, by constituting him the leader of a new emigration, distinct in its features from that of Coblentz. But after a lapse of two days, he told the German prince that he had always intended to execute his designs against Paris with French soldiers, accepting imperialists simply as auxiliaries; and that his character of a Frenchman debarred him from marching at the head of foreigners. He accordingly demanded passports for Switzerland, which were instantly granted him. The high value put upon his talents, and the slight estimation in which his political principles were held, procured him a consideration denied to Lafayette, who, at that very moment, was expiating his heroic constancy in the dungeons of Olmutz.

Thus finished the career of this superior man, who had displayed talents of every order—those of the diplomatist, the administrator, and the captain; and all grades of courage—that of the civilian, who withstands the storms of the tribune; that of the soldier, imperturbable amidst flying balls; and that of the general, who grapples with desperate positions, and faces the hazards of the most daring enterprises; but who, without principles, without the moral ascendancy they confer, without other influence than that of genius, speedily attenuated in a rapid succession of events and persons, vigorously essayed to struggle with the revolution, and demonstrated by a signal example that an individual can prevail against a national passion only when it is emasculated. In deserting to the enemy, Dumouriez had not the excuse of the aristocratic prejudices of Bouillé or the delicacy of principle of Lafayette, for he had tolerated all disorders until they happened to thwart his views. By his defection he might charge himself with having accelerated the fall of the Girondists and the great revolutionary crisis. Still it must not be forgotten that this man, unattached to any cause, had a preference for liberty grounded on reason; nor must it be forgotten that he loved his country; that when none believed in the possibility of resisting foreign aggression, he attempted it, and relied upon Frenchmen more than they upon themselves; that at Sainte-Ménéhould he taught them to view the enemy with composure; that at Jemappes he infused into them the heroic spirit, and restored France to the rank of a first-rate power: it must never be forgotten, in short, that if he abandoned France, he had likewise saved her. Moreover, old age crept upon him far from his native soil; and it is impossible to avoid a sigh of deep regret at the contemplation of a man, fifty years of whose life were consumed in the intrigues of a court, thirty in exile, and only three employed on a theatre worthy of his genius.

Dampierre received the command-in-chief of the army of the north, and intrenched his troops in the camp of Famars, in a situation to succour such of the fortresses as might be attacked. The strength of this position, and the plan of campaign laid down by the allies, according to which they were not to penetrate farther until Mayence was retaken, necessarily retarded the events of the war in that quarter. Custine, who, in order to excuse his own faults, had never ceased censuring his colleagues and the ministers, was favourably heard when inveighing against Beurnonville, who was regarded as an accomplice of Dumouriez, although delivered by him to the Austrians; and he accordingly obtained the entire command of the Rhine, from the Vosges and the Moselle to Huninguen. As the defection of Dumouriez had commenced with negotiations, the penalty of death was decreed against any general who should entertain propositions from the enemy, unless the sovereignty of the people and the republic were preliminarily recognised. Bouchotte was subsequently named minister of war, and Monge, though agreeable to the Jacobins from his complaisance, was superseded as unequal to all the details of his immense department. It was furthermore determined that three commissioners of the convention should constantly remain with the armies, one of whom should be renewed every month.

* Decree of the 6th April.

CHAPTER XXI.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE.—RENEWAL OF THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN THE TWO PARTIES IN THE CONVENTION.—IMPEACHMENT OF MARAT.—HIS ACQUITTAL AND TRIUMPH.—STATE OF OPINION IN THE CHIEF TOWNS.—SKETCH OF BRITTANY AND LA VENDÉE AND THE CAUSES OF THE CIVIL WAR.

THE defection of Dumouriez, the disastrous condition of the armies, and the imminent dangers to which both the revolution and the territory were exposed, had provoked all the violent measures of which we have immediately spoken, and finally drove the convention to devote serious attention to the often-suggested project of imparting greater energy to the government by concentrating its action within itself. After various propositions, it adopted the plan of a committee designated that of public welfare, and composed of nine members. This committee was to carry on its deliberations in secret. Its functions consisted in superintending and accelerating the action of the executive power, with authority even to suspend its resolutions when it deemed them injurious to the general welfare, on condition merely of notifying such interference to the convention. It was empowered to take, in urgent circumstances, measures of internal and external defence; and orders signed by the majority of its members were to be immediately executed by the executive power. It was instituted only for a month, and could not issue its warrants against any but the agents of administration.*

The members nominated to compose this committee were Barrère, Delmas, Bréard, Cambon, Jean Debry, Danton, Guithon-Morveaux, Treilhard, and Lacroix d'Eure-et-Loir.† Although not yet invested with an unlimited range of authority, it nevertheless acquired a prodigious influence; it corresponded with the commissioners of the convention, gave them their instructions, and exercised the license of substituting for the measures of the ministers such as seemed fitting to its own pleasure. Through Cambon it controlled the finances, and with Danton for a component part, it could scarcely fail to gain all the sway and daring of that redoubtable party leader. Thus, by the accumulation of perils, the country was progressing towards a dictatorship.

Recovering from the consternation occasioned by Dumouriez's desertion, party-spirit sought to turn it to account by imputations of confederacy, in which emulous recrimination the stronger faction was sure to overwhelm the weaker. The sections and the popular societies, through whom all agitation had its usual commencement, took the initiative, and denounced the Girondists in petitions and addresses.

A new congregation, still more violent than any of the others, had been recently formed, in accordance with a doctrine of Marat. That person had stated that the sovereignty of the people had been hitherto a mere subject of "babble;" that according to the true interpretation of the principle, each section was supreme in its own limits, and was entitled at any moment to revoke the powers it had delegated. The most desperate agitators, availing themselves of this hypothesis, had actually pretended to be deputed by the sections to ascertain the use made of their authority, and to consult on the safety of the commonwealth. They had assembled at the Evêché, and asserted their right to correspond with all the municipalities of the republic Consequently, they styled themselves the Central Committee of Public Safety. From this hotbed of passion the most inflammatory propositions henceforth sprung. A resolution was there passed to proceed in a body to the convention, and demand from it whether or not it possessed the means of saving the state. This congregation, which had already attracted the notice of the assembly, speedily drew the attention of the commûne and the Jacobin Club likewise. Robespierre, who unquestionably desired the result of an insurrection, but dreaded the employment of such a means, and always shook with fear on the eve of every movement, raised his voice against the violent motions discussed in those inferior meetings, adhering to his favourite policy of reviling the deputies stigmatised as unfaithful, and ruining them in public estimation before adopting any ulterior steps against them. Relishing the mode of invective and accusation, he shrunk from the exhibition of pure force, and preferred to insurrections the contests of the tribune, which were unattended with danger, and whereof he exclusively reaped all the honour. Marat, who had at intervals the vanity of moderation, like his fellows, denounced the congregation of the Evêché, although he had supplied the dogmas on which it was founded. Envoys were sent to ascertain whether the persons composing it were in reality patriots of an extreme character, or, as was suspected, hireling agitators. After duly verifying the fact that they were simply men of too burning a zeal, the society of Jacobins, loath to expel them from its fold, as had been proposed, directed a list of their names to be made out, in order that a watch might be set upon them; and it passed a public censure on their conduct, because, as it alleged, there could be no other centre of public safety than itself. After the like fashion had been prepared and preliminarily condemned the insurrection of the 10th August. All who lack the fortitude to act, all who are mortified at seeing themselves outstripped, disapprove of first attempts, though passionately longing for the result they promise. Danton alone kept profound silence as to these movements, neither disavowing nor blaming the subordinate agitators. Tedious accusations in the tribune were not such triumphs as satisfied him; the ways of action were his, and mighty did they become in his hands, for he had at his beck all that Paris contained of the idle, immoral, and turbulent. Nevertheless, it cannot be truly averred that he was secretly manœuvring; only he preserved a menacing silence.

Several of the sections repudiated the congregation of the Evêché, and that of Mail even presented an energetic petition on the subject to the convention. That of Bonne-Nouvelle, on the contrary, read an address at the bar, in which it denounced Brissot, Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, &c., as friends and accomplices of Dumouriez, and prayed they might be struck with the sword of justice. After an uproarious contest, these petitioners received the honours of the sitting; but it was at the same time declared that for the future the assembly would not entertain accusations against its members, and that all such denunciations must be lodged with the committee of public safety.

The section of the Halle-aux-Blés, one of the most outrageous in Paris, drew up a fresh petition under the presidency of Marat, and sent it to the Jacobins, the sections, and the commune, for their approbation, in order that, being thus sanctioned by all the authori-presented by the mayor Pache to the National Convention. In this petition, hawked about from place to place, and notorious as the day, it was proclaimed that a portion of the convention was corrupted, in confederacy with forestallers and with Dumouriez, and ought to be replaced by substitutes. On the 10th April, whilst this petition was circulating from section to section, Pétion rose indignantly, and demanded attention on a point of order. He inveighed, with an energy most unusual with him, against the calumnies directed towards a part of the convention, and urged immediate measures of repression. Danton, on the other hand, claimed honourable mention for the petition in the course of signature. Pétion, thoroughly incensed, maintained that its authors should be sent before the revolutionary tribunal. Danton retorted, with a sneer, that honest representatives, strong in their purity of conscience, could have nothing to fear from calumny, which was inseparable from republican freedom; and that, as the convention had neither repulsed the Austrians nor framed a constitution, its title to eulogy was rather dubious. He concluded by insisting that the national assembly should not be made the arena for private contentions, but that those who deemed themselves traduced should apply for redress to the tribunals. The question was thus evaded; but Fonfrède revived it, and again it met the same fate. Robespierre, luxuriating in such a scene of personal discord, once more renewed the topic, and asked leave to tear aside the veil of iniquity. The tribune was accorded him, and he forthwith commenced the most venomous, the most atrocious of all the defamatory harangues that had been hitherto permitted. It behoves us to pause on this speech, pourtraying as it does how the conduct of his enemies was interpreted in that gloomy imagination.*

The articles of his belief were, concisely, that beneath the high aristocracy dislodged in 1789, there existed a burgher aristocracy, as presumptuous and overbearing as the preceding, whose treasons had succeeded those of the nobility. A genuine revolution was distasteful to this class; and it wanted a king, with the constitution of 1791, in order to ensure its supremacy. The Girondists were its leaders. Under the Legislative Assembly, they had usurped the ministries in the persons of Roland, Clavière, and Servan; after dismissal from office, they had sought revenge by the 20th June; and on the eve of the 10th August, they treated with the court, and offered peace on condition of their restoration to power. On the 10th August itself, they contented themselves with suspending the king, instead of abolishing royalty, and nominated a governor for the prince-royal. After the 10th August, they again appropriated the ministries, and calumniated the commune, with the view of undermining its influence and securing an exclusive domination. The convention being constituted, they engrossed the committees, continued to slander Paris, to represent that city as the nursery of all crimes; and perverted public opinion by the agency of their journals, and of the enormous sums devoted by Roland to aid the distribution of perfidious writings. Finally, in January, they opposed the death of the tyrant, not from sympathy for his person, but from sympathy for royalty.

"This faction," proceeded Robespierre, "is the sole cause of the disastrous war we are now waging. It resolved upon it in order to expose us to the invasion of Austria, who promised a congress, with the burgher constitution of 1791. It has directed this war with treachery; and after using the traitor Lafayette, it afterwards employed the traitor Dumouriez, to attain the object it had so long pursued. At first, it pretended to quarrel with Dumouriez, but the rupture was never serious, for, a short while before, it had elevated him to the ministry through his friend Gensonné, and granted him an allowance of six millions for secret expenses. Dumouriez, in confederacy with the faction, saved the Prussians in the Argonne, when he might have annihilated them. In Belgium, it is true, he gained a great victory; but some signal exploit was necessary to gain the public confidence, and so soon as he had secured that confidence, he abused it in all possible forms. He did not invade Holland, which he had it in his power to occupy during the first campaign; he prevented the union of the conquered countries with France; and the diplomatic committee, in concert with him, neglected no expedient to delude the Belgian deputies who sought the junction. Those envoys of the executive power, whom Dumouriez maltreated because they vexed the Belgians, were all selected by the Girondists, who had agreed to send disorganisers, against whom public vengeance might be roused, so as to bring discredit on the republican cause. Dumouriez, after tardily invading Holland, returned to Belgium, lost the battle of Neerwinden; and it was Miranda, the friend and creature of Pétion, who, by his retreat, decided the fate of the battle. Dumouriez then fell back, and raised the standard of revolt, at the very moment the faction was exciting royalist outbreaks in the west. All, therefore, was prepared for this critical moment. A perfidious minister had been placed in the war department for so important a juncture; the committee of general safety, composed of Girondists, except seven or eight faithful deputies who never attended, that committee did nothing to avert the public dangers. Thus nothing had been omitted to ensure the success of the conspiracy. A king was required, and the generals all adhered to Egalité. The family of Egalité was clustered around Dumouriez; his sons, his daughter, even to the intriguer Sillery, were with him. Dumouriez began by manifestos; and what does he say? Every thing that the orators and writers of the faction say from the tribune and in the newspapers - that the convention is composed of miscreants, setting aside a trifling sound portion; that Paris is the hotbed of crimes; that the Jacobins are disorganisers, who instigate troubles and civil war, &c."

Such was the manner in which Robespierre explained both the defection of Dumouriez and the opposition of the Girondists. After minutely developing his fantastic series of calumnies, he proposed to send before the revolutionary tribunal the accomplices of Dumouriez, all upholders of Orleans and their friends. "As to the deputies Guadet, Gensonné, Vergniaud, &c.," said he, with vicious irony, "it would be pure sacrilege to accuse such honest personages; and feeling my incapacity in that respect, I leave them to the wisdom of the assembly."

The galleries and the Mountain loudly applauded their virtuous orator. The Girondists were filled with indignation at so atrocious a category, in which subtle malice played a part quite as perceptible as a natural distrustfulness of character; for in the discourse was exhibited singular cunning in combining circumstances and forestalling objections; in truth, Robespierre had shown in this villainous accusation much more talent than usually marked his declamations. Vergniaud mounted the tribune, his breast struggling with emotions, and claimed to speak with so much earnestness, vivacity, and determination, that he obtained the leave he sought, and the Mountain and galleries eventually refrained from interrupting him. He opposed to the studied harangue of Robespierre an extempore speech, delivered with all the noble warmth of genuine eloquence and integrity.

"He would venture," he said, "to answer Monsieur Robespierre, and at no great cost of either time or art, for he merely needed to lay bare his soul. He would not speak for himself, for he knew that in times of revolution the dregs of nations fermented and rose for a moment above the sound and honest, but for the purpose of enlightening France. His voice, which more than once had carried terror into that palace, whence it had concurred in expelling tyranny, would likewise carry it into the hearts of wretches who were labouring to substitute their own tyranny for that of royalty."

He proceeded to refute each inculpation of Robespierre by arguments such as any might have used who had but a simple knowledge of the facts. He had provoked the dethronement by his speech in July. A little before the 10th August, when doubtful of the success of the insurrection, ignorant even whether it would take place, he had pointed out to an agent of the court what it ought to do, in order to reconcile itself with the nation and to save the country. On the 10th August, he had occupied his seat amidst the roar of cannon, whilst "Monsieur" Robespierre was skulking in a cellar. He had not supported an immediate declaration of forfeiture, because the issue was doubtful; and he had proposed to nominate a governor for the dauphin, because, in case royalty were retained, a good education secured to the young prince was a guarantee for the future welfare of France. He and his friends had supported the proclamation of war, because it already existed in fact; and it was more advisable to declare it openly, and repel force by force, than suffer its evils without striking in return. He and his friends had been borne to the ministries and the committees by the public voice. In the committee of twenty-one, in the Legislative Assembly, they had opposed all projects for quitting Paris, and had prepared the resources which France deployed in the Argonne. In the committee of general safety, in the convention, they had assiduously exerted themselves, and in presence of their colleagues, who were always entitled to witness their labours. He (Robespierre) had deserted the committee, and never gave his attendance at its sittings. They had not calumniated Paris, but opposed assassins who usurped the title of Parisians, and disgraced both Paris and the republic. They had not perverted public opinion, for, so far as he was concerned, he had not written a single word, and what Roland had circulated was known to the whole of France. He and his friends had demanded an appeal to the people on the judgment of Louis XVI., because they held that upon so important a question the national sanction could not be dispensed with. For himself personally, he was scarcely acquainted with Dumouriez, having only met him twice, the first time on his return from the Argonne, the second and last time on his return from Belgium; but Danton and Santerre saw him, congratulated him, loaded him with blandishments, and made him feast with them every day. As to Egalité, he knew equally little of him. The Mountaineers alone were intimate with him, and frequenters of his house; and when the Girondists attacked him, the Mountaineers had been his most resolute advocates. With what, therefore, could he and his friends be reproached? With being manœuvrers, intriguers? But they did not scour the sections to agitate; they did not fill the galleries in order to wrest decrees by terror; they had never desired that the ministers should be taken from assemblies in which they held seats as deputies. With being moderates? But they were not so on the 10th August, when Marat and Robespierre hid themselves; they were so in September, when prisoners were assassinated and the Garde-Meuble was plundered.

Vergniaud wound up his masterly vindication in the following words:—"You can testify whether I have allowed the wrongs so plentifully visited on me during the last six months to corrode in secret; whether I have sacrificed to the good of my country the justest resentments; you can testify whether, under taunts of cowardice, under imputations of avowing guilt, under the risk of foregoing the little good still permitted to my exertions, I have abstained from exposing in all their hideousness the impostures and wickedness of Robespierre. May this day be the last we shall waste in scandalous debates!"

He concluded by moving that the section of the Halle-aux-Blés be called to the bar, and ordered to produce its registers.

The talent displayed by Vergniaud had captivated even his enemies. His evident sincerity and touching eloquence had moved and won over the great majority of the assembly, and unequivocal testimonies of the warmest regard were showered upon him from all sides. Guadet next ascended the tribune; but upon his appearance, the dumb-struck Mountain began to heave, and speedily emitted appalling sounds. The sitting was suspended; and it was not until the 12th that Guadet obtained in his turn the right to answer Robespierre, and he did so in a manner calculated to arouse passions much more fiercely than Vergniaud. None had conspired, according to his views; but appearances, such as did exist, were rather against the Mountaineers and Jacobins, who had maintained relations with Dumouriez and Egalité, than against the Girondists, who had quarrelled with both. "Who," exclaimed he, "was with Dumouriez at the Jacobin Club, at the theatres? Your own Danton!" "Ah! thou accusest me," roared Danton; "thou knowest not my strength!"

The conclusion of Guadet's speech was deferred to the morrow. Resuming, he continued to throw all conspiracy, if any there were, upon the Mountaineers. As he finished, he read an address, which, like that of the Halle-aux-Blés, was signed by Marat. It proceeded from the Jacobins, and Marat had affixed his name as president of the society. It contained these words, which Guadet read to the assembly:—"Citizens, let us arm! The counter-revolution is in the government, in the heart of the convention. Citizens, let us march thither—ay, let us march!"

"Ay!" exclaimed Marat from his seat—"ay, let us march!" At these words, the assembly rose with one impulse, and demanded a decree of impeachment against Marat. Danton started up to oppose, alleging that on both sides of the assembly the same wish prevailed for impeaching the family of Orleans, which ought consequently to be sent before the tribunals; but that it was preposterous to impeach Marat for a shout uttered in the excitement of a stormy debate. Danton was answered that the family of Orleans was not to be tried at Paris but at Marseilles. He attempted to rejoin; but, without hearing him, precedence was given to the decree of impeachment against Marat; and Lacroix moved in addition that he should be immediately put under arrest. "Since my enemies," cried Marat, "have lost all shame, I only ask one thing: the decree is calculated to excite a commotion; therefore let me go to the Jacobin Club, accompanied by two gendarmes, in order that I may recommend tranquillity." Without heeding such ridiculous inanities, he was placed under arrest; and the articles of impeachment were directed to be framed by noon the following day.

Robespierre flew to the club of Jacobins to vent his ire, to celebrate the energy of Danton, to extol the moderation of Marat, and to exhort them to be calm, so that no reproach might go forth that Paris had risen in insurrection to deliver a Jacobin.

On the morrow, the articles of arraignment were read and approved by the assembly; and the impeachment, so repeatedly proposed against Marat, was at length seriously prosecuted before the revolutionary tribunal.

The project of a petition against the Girondists had been the original provocative to these violent discussions between the two sides of the convention; but nothing had been decided upon that subject, and, in fact, nothing could be decided, since the assembly had no physical means of arresting the movements which stimulated the petitions. Accordingly, the plan of combining a general address from all the sections was pursued with activity, and an uniform document was agreed upon; out of forty-three sections, thirty-fiv adopted it; the council-general of the commune sanc tioned it; and on the 15th April the deputies from th thirty-five sections, with the mayor Pache at the head, presented themselves at the bar. To a certai extent the address might be deemed the manifesto by which the commune of Paris announced its intentions and threatened insurrection in case of refusal. It wa thus it had acted before the 10th August, and thus i was acting on the eve of the 31st May. The orato of the deputation, Rousselin, performed the part o reading the petition aloud. After adverting to the criminal conduct of certain members, the documen demanded their expulsion from the convention, and enumerated them one after the other. They were twenty-two in number: Brissot, Guadet, Vergniaud Gensonné, Grangeneuve, Buzot, Barbaroux, Salles, Biroteau, Pontécoulant, Pétion, Lanjuinais, Valazé Hardy, Louvet, Lehardy, Gorsas, Fauchet, Lanthenais, Lasource, Valady, and Chambon.

The galleries loudly applauded as the names were read. The president informed the petitioners that the law obliged them to sign their petition. They all pressed forward to do so, except Pache, who, desirous of preserving his neutrality yet awhile, kept in the background. His signature, however, was claimed; he objected that he was not of the number of the petitioners, and had been merely instructed by the council-general to accompany them. But finding that all evasion was useless, he advanced and signed the petition. The galleries rewarded him with vociferous cheers.

Boyer-Fonfrède presently appeared in the tribune, and said, that if modesty were not a duty, he would ask to be added to the glorious list of twenty-two. The majority of the assembly, impelled by a generous emotion, responded in applauding exclamations. "Let all our names be inscribed—all!" they cried. Then they crowded round the twenty-two deputies, and lavished on them the most expressive marks of attachment and interest: the debate, interrupted by this scene, was adjourned to the succeeding day.

The sittings were resumed at the appointed period. Charges and counter-charges recommenced between the two sides of the assembly. Certain deputies of the centre, taking advantage of letters received on the state of the armies, besought attention to the general interests of the republic, and oblivion to individual quarrels. They were heeded for the moment, but on the 18th, a fresh petition against the right side revived the exasperation caused by that of the thirty-five sections. The occasion seemed favourable to denounce various acts of the commune, by one of which it had declared itself in a continued state of revolution, and by another had established out of its own members a committee of correspondence with all the municipalities in the kingdom. Long ago, it had sought to give its purely local authority a character of generality, which would permit it to speak in the name of France, and support a rivalry for power with the convention. The committee of the Evêché, dissolved by the advice of the Jacobins, had likewise been designed to place Paris in communication with the other towns; and at present the commune had resolved to supply its deficiency by organising such a correspondence within its own body. Vergniaud was selected to speak upon the occasion; and assailing at once the petition of the thirty-five sections, the acts imputed to the commune, and the schemes its proceedings betrayed, moved that the petition be declared calumnious, and the municipality enjoined to bring its registers to the assembly, in order that the resolutions it had taken might be ascertained. These motions were carried, in spite of the galleries and the left side. At this moment, the right side, supported by the Plain, began to sway all the decisions. It had procured the nomination of Lasource, one of its most zealous members, as president; and it had again the majority, or in other words, right and law—but a feeble guarantee against force, and only serving to infuriate it the more.

The municipal officers, thus ordered to the bar, came with the coolest effrontery to submit the records of their deliberations, and stood in apparent confidence that their resolutions would meet the warmest approval. The registers were found to commemorate the following facts: 1st, That the council-general declared itself in a state of revolution, so long as the scarcity of provisions was not obviated; 2d, That the committee of correspondence with the 44,000 municipalities should be composed of nine members, and kept in constant activity; 3d, That 12,000 copies of the petition against the twenty-two should be printed and distributed by the committee of correspondence; and, 4th, That the council-general would consider itself attacked when one of its members, or even a president or secretary of a section or club, should be molested on account of their opinions. This latter resolution had been taken to meet the case of Marat, accused of having signed, in the character of president of a section, a seditious address.

Thus the commune, as we see, resisted the assembly at every step, and took a decision of hostile tendency upon every important point of discussion. Upon the question of food, it constituted itself revolutionally, if violent measures were refused. With regard to Marat, it threw over him the shield of its protection. Touching the twenty-two deputies, it made an appeal to the 44,000 municipalities, and put itself in correspondence with them for the purpose of deriving, to a certain extent, general or national powers against the convention. Opposition was completely organised on all points, and, moreover, attended by the still more formidable preparatives of insurrection.

When the perusal of the registers was concluded, Robespierre the younger claimed the honours of the sitting for the municipal officers. The right side opposed the demand; the Plain hesitated, alleging that it might perhaps be dangerous to discredit the magistrates in the eyes of the people, by refusing them barren honour not withheld even from mere petitioners. Amidst tumultuous contention, the sitting was prolonged till eleven at night; the right side and the Plain at length retired, and a hundred and forty-three members alone remained on the Mountain to admit the Parisian municipality to the honours of the assembly. On that day, pronounced slanderous, repudiated by the majority, and ushered to the honours of the sitting by the Mountain and the galleries alone, could not fail to be deeply mortified, and henceforth more decisively to become the rallying point for all who wished to break the authority of the convention.

Marat had been at last consigned to the revolutionary tribunal. His impeachment had been exclusively owing to the energy of the right side, acting opportunely on the wavering tendencies of the Plain. Every act of energy honours a party struggling against a superior movement, but hastens its fall. The Girondists, in their courageous prosecution of Marat, had merely paved the way for his egregious triumph. The articles bore in substance, that Marat, having in his journal instigated murder, carnage, the degradation and dissolution of the convention, and the establishment of a power destructive to liberty, he had been decreed amenable to impeachment, and consigned to the revolutionary tribunal. The Jacobins, the Cordeliers, all the agitators of Paris, in short, were in active motion for behoof of "that austere philosopher, formed and chastened," as they said, "by adversity and meditation; combining, with a soul of fire, high sagacity and profound knowledge of the human heart; detecting traitors on their triumphant chariots at the moment the stupid vulgar still offer incense! The traitors," they exclaimed with fury—"the traitors will pass away, but the reputation of Marat only now blos-

Although the revolutionary tribunal was not then composed as at a subsequent period, Marat nevertheless was in no danger of condemnation. The deliberation scarcely lasted beyond a few seconds. The accused was absolved unanimously, amidst the plaudits of a numerous crowd assembled to witness his trial. The event occurred on the 24th April. He was immediately surrounded by a prodigious concourse of women, sans-culottes with pikes, and armed detachments from the sections. These seized upon him, and proceeded to the convention, in order to replace him on his seat as a deputy. Two municipal officers opened the march, heading the procession. Marat, elevated on the arms of some sappers, his brow encircled with a garland of oak, was borne in triumph to the door of the hall. A sapper, stepping out of the crowd, presented himself at the bar, and said: "Citizen president, we bring you the brave Marat. Marat has always been the friend of the people, and the people will always be the friends of Marat! If the head of Marat must fall, the head of the sapper will fall before his!" Whilst uttering these words, this uncouth petitioner kept brandishing his axe, and the galleries applauded with fearful tumult. He then asked leave for the procession to defile through the hall. "I will consult the assembly," replied the president Lasource, in consternation at the horrible scene. But the crowd would not wait until he had consulted the assembly, and the people rushed into the hall on all sides. Men and women thronged its circuit, penetrating into every part, and occupying the seats vacated by the retirement of the members, thoroughly disgusted at such a spectacle. Marat at last appeared, passed from arm to arm, and hailed with a frenzy of applause. From the arms of the petitioners he was transferred into those of his colleagues on the Mountain, who embraced him with the most ardent demonstrations of joy. He tore himself, after an interval, from the caresses of his colleagues, ran to the tribune, and declared to the assembled legislators that he came to offer them a pure heart and a vindicated name, and that he was ready to die in defending liberty and the rights of the people.

Additional honours awaited him at the Jacobin Club. The women had prepared a great quantity of garlands. The president offered him one. A child of four years of age, lifted on the table, placed another on his head. Marat threw aside the wreaths with insulting disdain. "Citizens," he exclaimed, "indignant at seeing a delinquent faction betray the republic, I determined to unmask it, and put the rope round its neck. It resisted me by launching a decree of impeachment against me. I have come forth victorious. The faction is humbled, but not crushed. Waste not your time in decerning triumphs; keep yourselves free from enthusiasm. I lay upon the table the two crowns just offered to me, and I beg my fellow-citizens to wait the conclusion of my career before they decide upon it."

Vociferous cheers greeted this arrogant modesty.

Robespierre was present at this triumph, and doubtless contemned it, as of too despicable and vulgar a character. Nevertheless, he was himself destined in his turn to undergo all the vanity of such empty ovations. The rejoicings concluded, the club relapsed into its ordinary topics, to wit, the means of purging the government, and eradicating traitors, Rolandists, Brissotins, &c. For these purposes it was proposed to frame a list of persons employed in all the administrations, and to mark such as had merited dismissal. "Assign me that list," said Marat; "I will make choice of those who ought to be superseded or retained, and I will notify the results to the ministers." Robespierre proffered a suggestion: he said that the ministers were almost all accomplices of the guilty, and would give no heed to the society; consequently, it would be more advisable to address the committee of public welfare, which was placed by its functions above the executive council; and that, moreover, the society could not, without compromising itself, hold communication with collusive ministers. "These arguments are frivolous," replied Marat, disdainfully; "so pure a patriot as I may hold communication with the devil. I will address the ministers, and summon them to satisfy us in the name of the society."

A respectful consideration always accompanied "the virtuous, the eloquent" Robespierre; but the matchless effrontery, the cynical flippancy of Marat, amazed and captivated all the more extravagant and hot-headed of the revolutionists. His disgusting familiarity attached to him certain attendants of the markets, who were flattered by such intimacy with "the friend of the people," and were ever ready to lend his insignificant person the aid of their brawny arms and of their influence in public places.

The extreme irritation of the Mountain at this period proceeded from the obstacles it encountered; but those obstacles were infinitely greater in the provinces than at Paris, and the rebuffs and disappointments experienced on their route by the commissioners dispatched to accelerate the recruitment of the armies, shortly afterwards drove them to the last pitch of exasperation. All the provinces had been perfectly inclined towards the revolution, but all had not embraced it with the same ardour, nor signalised themselves by such excesses, as the city of Paris. The first to embark in revolutions are the ambitious idle, the enthusiastic, and the highly talented; of such, a metropolis always contains a more plentiful store than provinces, because it is the resort of all, who, from the spirit of independence or ambition, abandon the locality, the calling, and the traditions of their forefathers. Paris, therefore, was sure to produce the greatest revolutionists. Moreover, situated at a trifling distance from the frontiers, and the aim of all the enemy's attacks, that city had incurred more danger than any other in France; whilst, as the seat of the national authorities, it had witnessed all the grand topics of discussion agitated and settled within its bosom. Thus physical danger and mental conflict had conspired to evoke within it high excitement and turbulence. The provinces, which were not influenced by the like causes of agitation, had beheld the excesses of Paris with consternation, and largely participated in the sentiments of the right side and the Plain. Discontented more especially with the treatment to which their deputies were exposed, they thought they discerned in the capital, besides its revolutionary exaggeration, a design to govern France, as Rome governed its conquered provinces. Such were the dispositions of the tranquil, industrious, and moderate mass with regard to the revolutionists of Paris. These dispositions, however, were more or less emphatic according to local circumstances. Each province, each town, had likewise its impassioned revolutionists, as adventurous minds and ardent characters are found in every locality under the sun. Almost all the men of this cast had possessed themselves of the municipalities, having profited for that purpose by the general renewal of the authorities, ordered by the Legislative Assembly after the 10th August. The easy and quiescent mass always yields to the more enterprising and eager; and it was only natural that the most violent should appropriate the municipal functions, being of all others the most difficult, and requiring an untiring zeal and activity. The peaceable, moderate citizens, forming the great majority, had withdrawn into the sections, which they occasionally visited to record their votes and exercise other civic rights. The departmental functions had been conferred on the most wealthy and considerable personages in each district, and as a necessary consequence, on the least active and energetic of mankind. Thus all the extreme revolutionists were intrenched in the municipalities, whilst the middle and affluent classes filled the sections and the departmental functions. The commune, sensible of this position of affairs, had long entertained the project of establishing a correspondence with all the municipalities, but had been prevented, as we have seen, by the convention. The parent society of the Jacobins had supplied the want by its peculiar intercourse with its branches; and the ramifications which could not yet be organised between municipality and municipality existed between club and club, which pretty nearly amounted to the same thing, for the men who carried on the deliberations in the Jacobin Clubs were the identical parties who afterwards sat in the councils of the communes. Thus the whole Jacobin party of France, gathered together in the municipalities and clubs, and corresponding from one extremity of the land to the other, found itself in array against the middle mass, an immense body, but divided into a multitude of sections, performing no active functions, maintaining no correspondence between town and town, forming here and there a few moderate clubs, and occasionally assembling in the sections or the departmental councils to exercise a timorous and hesitating suffrage.

This striking difference of position afforded the revolutionists their strongest hope of successfully rivetting their domination upon the bulk of the population. That bulk, be it remembered, admitted the republic, but desired it free from excesses; and at the period in question it had again asserted its importance in all the provinces. From the passing of the decree empowering the municipalities, armed with a terrible police, to make domiciliary visits, search out strangers, and disarm the suspected, whereby the comfort and privacy of peaceable citizens were subjected to irresponsible outrage, the sections had begun a system of reaction, and resolved into aggregate associations to keep the municipalities in awe. In almost all the towns of France, they had thus resumed courage, and were in arms, resisting the communes, inveighing against their inquisitorial police, encouraging the right side, and advocating with it order, peace, and respect for persons and property. The municipalities and Jacobin Clubs, on the contrary, clamoured for additional measures of police, and the extension of revolutionary tribunals into the departments. In particular towns the inhabitants were on the point of coming to actual warfare upon these questions. In the mean time, the sections were so influential in number, that they effectually curbed the violence of the communes. The Mountaineer deputies, commissioned to hasten the levies and stimulate revolutionary zeal, were thunderstruck at so unexpected a resistance, and filled Paris with their lamentations and alarms.

Such was the situation of nearly all France, and the manner in which it was divided. Contention was more or less strenuous, and parties more or less virulent, according to the position and dangers of each town. Wherever the revolution seemed greatly endangered, there the Jacobins were impelled to the use of violent measures, and consequently the moderate mass was most disposed to resist them. But, after all, what chiefly exasperated the revolutionary passions was not so much the perils of foreign war as those of domestic treason. Thus, on the northern frontier, which was peculiarly menaced by the hostile armies and but slightly molested by intrigue, an exemplary concord reigned; all joined in the one engrossing object of general defence, and the commissioners apportioned to the districts stretching from Lille to Lyons, had made satisfactory reports to the convention. But at Lyons, where secret manœuvres conspired with the geographical and military position of the town to augment distrust and aggravate the sense of danger, civil broils as terrible as those of Paris had prevailed. From its situation to the east, and its vicinity to Piedmont, Lyons had always attracted the attention of the counter-revolutionists. The first emigration of Turin had laboured to effect a movement there in 1790, and even determined to send a French prince to the locality. Mirabeau, also, had designed that town as the scene of his intended operations. After the main emigration was transferred to Coblentz, an agent had been left in Switzerland to correspond with Lyons, and through it with the camp of Jalles and the fanatics of the south. These intrigues provoked a reaction of Jacobinism, and the royalists at Lyons called up Mountaineers. These latter possessed a club called the Central Club composed of delegates from all the clubs in the district. At their head was a Piedmontese, whom an unsettled disposition had driven through various lands, and finally fixed at Lyons, where his revolutionary ardour had procured him the successive nominations of municipal officer and president of the civil tribunal. His name was Chalier, and in this same Central Club he held a language, which, if used amongst the Jacobins of Paris, would have induced even Marat to accuse him of aiming at a general chaos, and of being subsidised by foreigners. In addition to this club, the Lyonnese Mountaineers had the whole municipality, except the mayor Niviere, the friend and disciple of Roland, and head of the Girondist party at Lyons. Weary of the incessant commotion, Niviere had, like Pétion, resigned his office, and again, like that Parisian mayor, had been re-elected by the sections, which were more influential and energetic at Lyons than in all the rest of France. Out of eleven thousand voters, nine thousand had imposed on Niviere the obligation of resuming the mayoralty; but he had abdicated his functions once more, and then the Mountaineer municipality had succeeded in perfecting itself by carrying the election of a mayor favourable to its views. On that occasion an actual conflict had taken place. the youth of the sections had chased Chalier from the Central Club, and laid waste the hall in which he emitted his fanatical diatribes. The department, in great alarm, had called for commissioners from the convention, who, first pronouncing against the sections, and then against the excesses of the commune, displeased all parties, provoked a denunciation from the Jacobin Club, and were recalled by the convention. Their exertions had been limited to the reconstruction of the Central Club, its affiliation with the Jacobins, and its deliverance, with a due regard to its continued vigour, from certain impure members. By the month of May, irritation had reached its utmost bounds. On one side, the commune, entirely composed of Jacobins, and the Central Club, presided over by Chalier, demanded for Lyons a revolutionary tribunal, and paraded through the principal streets a guillotine sent from Paris, exposed to public observation, as they stated, in order to scare traitors, aristocrats, &c.; on the other side, the sections in arms were prepared to suppress the municipality, and prevent the establishment of that sanguinary tribunal the Girondists had been unable to avert from the capital. In this critical state of affairs, the secret agents of royalism, lurking in Lyons, awaited the favourable moment for turning to account the anticipated outburst of indignation amongst the inhabitants.

Throughout the rest of the south as far as Marseilles, the moderate republican spirit prevailed in a more uniform manner, and the Girondists possessed the general attachment of the country. Marseilles looked with jealousy on the supremacy of Paris, breathed vengeance for the outrages inflicted on its beloved deputy Barbaroux, and stood ready to rise against the convention, if the national representation were attacked. Although a wealthy town, it was not situated very favourably for the counter-revolutionists beyond the frontiers, inasmuch as it lay near Italy alone, where no plots were hatched, and its port was not so much an object of interest to the English as that of Toulon. Secret intrigues, therefore, had not stirred up rancour to such a pitch at Marseilles as at Lyons and Paris; and the municipality, feeble and overawed, was on the point of being superseded by the all-powerful sections. The deputy, Moses Bayle, to whom but an indifferent reception had been extended, found there an invincible ardour for recruiting the armies, but an absolute devotion to the Gironde.

Ranging from east to west, from the Rhone to the ocean, fifty or sixty departments manifested the same dispositions. At Bordeaux, indeed, the unanimity was perfect. The sections, the municipality, the principal club, all were in harmony to resist the Mountaineer violence, and support that glorious deputation of the Gironde, which was felt to reflect so much honour on its originators. The opposite party had found shelter in one section only, but every where else it was utterly powerless and reduced to silence. Bordeaux demanded neither maximum, nor supplies, nor revolutionary tribunal; and prepared at once petitions against the commune of Paris, and battalions for the service of the republic.

But along the shores of the ocean, stretching from the Gironde to the Loire, and from the Loire to the mouth of the Seine, very different opinions and much greater dangers presented themselves. In that district, the implacable Mountain encountered as formidable impediments not only the mild and generous republicanism of the Girondists, but also the constitutional royalism of 1789, which repudiated the republic as illegal, and the fanatical spirit of the feudal times, equally hostile to the revolution of '89 as to that of '93, and exclusively recognising in temporal matters the authority of their petty lords, and in spiritual affairs that of their priests.

In Normandy, and particularly at Rouen, its chief town, the inhabitants had formed a strong attachment to Louis XVI., and the constitution of 1790 had satisfied all the feelings entertained both in behalf of liberty and the throne. Since the abolition of royalty and the constitution of 1790, that is to say, since the 10th August, a sullen and threatening silence had pervaded Normandy. Brittany offered tendencies still more hostile, the people in that province being greatly under the influence of the priests and gentry. Nearer the banks of the Loire, that bias was ripening into insurrection; and, finally, on the left bank of that river, in the Bocage, the Loroux, and La Vendée, the insurrection was complete, and large armies of ten and twenty thousand men were in the field.

This is the proper time to describe that singular district, occupied by a population so obstinate, so heroic, so unfortunate, and so disastrous to France, which it nearly ruined by a lamentable diversion, and whose misfortunes it aggravated by infuriating to more desperate extremes the revolutionary dictatorship.

On both banks of the Loire, the people had retained a great attachment for their old form of existence, and especially for their priests and religious rites. When, by the effect of the civil constitution, the members of the clergy were divided, an actual schism ensued. The incumbents who refused to submit to the new distribution of benefices, and to take the oath, were preferred by the people; and when, dispossessed of their parishes, they were obliged to withdraw, the peasants followed them into the woods, and considered both themselves and their faith as grievously persecuted. They formed into small bands, attacked the constitutional incumbents as intruders, and committed deplorable excesses on their persons. In Brittany, around the town of Rennes, there were more general and imposing revolts, occasioned by the dearness of provisions, and the threat to destroy public worship, contained in those oft-repeated words of Cambon: "Those who may want mass can pay for it." However, the government had succeeded in repressing these commotions on the right bank of the Loire, and had merely to apprehend their revival from communication with the left bank, where the great insurrection was organised.

It was, in fact, on this left bank, in Anjou and the Lower and Upper Poitou, that the famous war of La Vendée had broken out. This was the part of France in which time had exerted the least influence, and the least altered ancient manners. The feudal system had there assumed a truly patriarchal character, and the revolution, far from promoting useful reforms in the country, had only disturbed its mild and primitive habits, and was universally regarded as a curse. The Bocage and the Marais formed a singular district, which will require description to render intelligible the state of manners and society within its compass. Departing from Nantes and Saumur, and advancing from the Loire to Sables d'Olonne, Luçon, Fontenay, and Niort, you find a country unequal, undulating, broken with ravines, and crossed by a multitude of hedges, serving as enclosures to the countless fields, and which have given the name of Bocage (thicket) to the whole region. As you approach the sea, the land sinks, terminates in salt marshes, and is every where intersected by a multitude of small canals, which render it almost inaccessible. This is the portion called the Marais (marsh). The only abundant production of the country is pasturage, and consequently cattle are plentiful. The peasants were accustomed merely to cultivate the quantity of corn necessary for their own consumption, and to use the produce of their flocks as the medium of exchange. It is well known that populations subsisting by this species of industry are remarkable for simplicity. No large cities had been formed in such a district; market-towns, with from two to three thousand inhabitants, only were met with. Between the two high roads, conducting, the one from Tours to Poitiers, and the other from Nantes to Rochelle, stretches a space of thirty leagues in breadth, throughout which, at that time, none but cross-roads existed, leading to villages and hamlets. The lands were divided into a multitude of small farms, of from five to six hundred francs' rental (£20 to £25), each apportioned to a single family, who divided with the owner of the soil the produce of the flocks. By this process of allotment, the landlords had to treat with each family, and thus maintained with all around them constant and familiar relations. The most simple course of life prevailed also in the mansions of the gentry; the chase was eagerly pursued, because game abounded; lords and vassals joined together in the sport, and gained celebrity by their address and energy in its prosecution. The priests, distinguished for singular purity of manners, exercised a genuine pastoral ministry. Wealth had neither corrupted their characters nor provoked remarks to their disparagement. The population submitted to the authority of the lord, and believed in the words of the priest, because in neither was there oppression or scandal. Before humanity adventures upon the course of civilisation, there exists an era of simplicity, ignorance, and repose, at which it would willingly pause, if its fate were not to struggle through difficulties to attain perfection in all things—"to be made perfect through suffering."

When the revolution, so beneficial in other quarters, reached this country with its levelling pressure, it caused great regret. To render it palatable it must have been modified, but that was impossible. Those who have accused it of not adapting itself to localities, and not varying with them, have not considered the impracticability of such exceptions, and the necessity of an uniform and inexorable rule in great social reformations. Scarcely any thing was known of the revolution in this secluded and rural region—only so much, indeed, as transpired through the half-suppressed murmurs and revilings of the landlords and parsons. Although the feudal rights were abolished, the peasants ceased not to pay them. It was incumbent upon them to assemble and nominate mayors; they entreated their lords to undertake the office. But when the dismissal of the nonjuring priests deprived them of the pastors who possessed their confidence, they were highly exasperated, and, like their brethren in Brittany, retreated to the woods, and traversed great distances, to witness, in their estimation, the ceremonie of the only true religion. From that moment violent hatred settled in their hearts, which the pries neglected no expedient to foster and inflame.

The 10th August drove some Poitevin nobles to their estates; the 21st January transported them wit rage, and they communicated their feelings to a around them. Still they did not actually conspire, a has been related; but the known dispositions of the country suggested projects of conspiracy to men wh were not connected with it. A conspiracy had bee formed in Brittany, but none in the Bocage; no plan had been there decided upon; they waited, apparently until driven to the last extremity. At length the levy of 300,000 men, ordered in the month of March, ex cited a general insurrection. Generally speaking, the peasants of Poitou were perfectly indifferent to wha was passing in France; but the dispersion of their clergy, and, above all, the obligation to serve in the armies, drove them to complete desperation. Unde the former system, the contingent of the province wa supplied by those whom a natural restlessness impelled to quit their native soil; but at present the law coerced all indiscriminately, whatever might be their persona predilections. Compelled to take up arms, they pre ferred fighting against rather than for the republic. The drawing for recruits was the occasion of revolts in the upper Bocage and the Marais almost simulta neously, that is to say, about the beginning of March On the 10th of that month, a drawing was appointed to take place at Saint-Florent, near Ancenis in Anjou, at which the young men refused to assist. The guard endeavoured to compel them, and the military com mander caused a piece of ordnance to be pointed on the mutineers; on which they forthwith made a spon taneous assault with their clubs, seized upon the gun, disarmed the guard, and then surveyed each other with amazement at their temerity. A carrier named Cathelineau, a man much esteemed through the coun try, brave, and persuasive in speech, quitted his farm upon learning these tidings, hastened to join the male contents, animated their courage, and gave some con sistency to the insurrection by understanding the art of keeping it alive. That very day he formed the design of attacking a republican post defended by eighty men. The peasants followed him with their clubs and rifles. After a general discharge, every shot of which told, as they were excellent marksmen, they rushed upon the position, disarmed its defenders, and established themselves as its possessors. The following day, Cathelineau proceeded to Chemillé, and carried it likewise, in spite of 200 republicans and three pieces of cannon. A gamekeeper on the domain of Maulevrier, named Stofflet, and a young peasant be longing to the village of Chanzeau, had also gathered a troop of insurgents. They shortly coalesced with Cathelineau, who conceived the daring project of attacking Chollet, the most considerable town in the country, the district-capital, and guarded by 500 re publicans. Their mode of fighting was the same as before. Taking advantage of hedges and inequalities of ground, they surrounded the hostile battalion, and commenced firing under shelter and at dead aim. After staggering the republicans by this terrible dis charge, they seized the first moment of hesitation that appeared amongst them, darted forward with loud shouts, overthrew their ranks, wrested away their arms, and broke their heads with bludgeons. Such was, in few words, their whole military strategy, then and thereafter, and it was the best adapted to the scene of warfare. The troops they assailed, drawn up in line and uncovered, received a fire they were unable to answer, because they could neither make use of their artillery nor advance with bayonets against ene mies hovering in dispersed bodies. In this predica ment, unless they were veterans in discipline, they could scarcely fail to be thrown into confusion by a fire so incessant, and so accurate too, that the regular discharges of troops of the line never could equal its precision. And especially when they beheld these furious men, uttering appalling howls, come rushing upon them, it was very difficult to avoid intimidation and to keep their ranks firm and unbroken. If they swerved, they were utterly lost, for flight, so easy to the people of the country, was impracticable for troops of the line. It would consequently have required the most intrepid soldiers to contend against so many difficulties, and those who were at first opposed to the rebels were national guards of the new levy, taken from the towns, almost all of them ardent republicans it is true, but qualified for combat exclusively by their zeal.

The victorious troop of Cathelineau therefore entered Chollet, appropriated all the arms found within it, and converted the ordnance primings into cartridges. It was in this manner the Vendéans invariably procured their munitions of war. Their defeats gave nothing to the enemy, because they had nothing but a musket or a club, which they easily carried across the fields, whilst each victory assured them a considerable booty in military stores. The triumphant insurgents cele brated their success with the money they obtained, and afterwards burnt all the papers of the administrations, which in their eyes were mere instruments of tyranny. They then returned to their villages and farms, which they always refused to quit again until after a long interval.

A much more general revolt had burst forth at the same time in the Marais and the department of La Vendée. At Machecoul and Challans, the conscrip tion was the cause of an universal rising. A certain Gaston, a hairdresser, killed an officer, borrowed his uniform, put himself at the head of the malecontents, and seized upon Challans and afterwards upon Mache coul, where his troop consigned to the flames all the papers of the administrations, and indulged in mas sacres from which their brethren in the Bocage had abstained. Three hundred republicans were shot in bands of twenty and thirty. The insurgents made them first of all confess, and then conducted them to the edge of a trench, where they picked them off in succession, so as to avoid the trouble of burying them. Nantes immediately dispatched several hundred men to Saint-Philbert; but ascertaining there was a move ment at Savenay, it recalled its troops, and the rebels of Machecoul remained in possession of their conquests.

In the department of La Vendée, that is to say, to the south of this theatre of war, the insurrection took still greater consistence.

The national guards of Fontenay having left that place for Chantonnay, were opposed and defeated. Chantonnay was pillaged. General Verteuil, who commanded the eleventh military division, being ap prised of this repulse, sent forward General Marcé with 1200 men, partly troops of the line, and partly national guards. This officer encountered the rebels at Saint-Vincent, and routed them. Augmenting his little army with an additional force of 1200 men and nine pieces of cannon, he marched upon Saint-Fulgent, and on the way again fell in with the Vendéans in a hollow, and halted to repair a bridge they had almost destroyed. About four in the afternoon of the 18th March, the Vendéans, taking the initiative, advanced to attack him. Profiting by the advantages of the ground, they began to shoot with their accustomed effect, and gradually closed in upon the republicans, who were startled at so well-directed and destructive fire, and utterly unable to retort upon an enemy concealed and dispersed in all the surrounding recesses. At length they charged the republican army, spread disorder in its ranks, and gained possession of the artillery, the ammunition, and the arms, which the soldiers threw away in retreating, to be less incom moded in their flight.

These successes, which were more decided in the department of La Vendée, properly so called, obtained for the insurgents the title of Vendéans, which they subsequently retained, although the war was much more active out of La Vendée. The robberies committed in the Marais procured for them also the appellation of Brigands, but that stigma justly belonged to the minority only. The insurrection extended in the Marais from the environs of Nantes to Sables, and in Anjou and Poitou to the neighbourhood of Vihiers and Parthenay. The secret of the Vendéans' victories was in the country, in its configuration, in the courage and address with which they availed themselves of those natural advantages, and lastly, in the inexperience and imprudent ardour of the republican soldiers, who, levied in haste, came to the scene of action rashly and unprepared, thus assuring to their opponents easy triumphs, and all the benefits that follow in their train —ample stores, confidence, and increased courage.

The Easter festival drew all the insurgents to their homes, whence they never consented to move until after a long leisure. War to them was a sort of hunting expedition for a few days; they carried with them sufficient bread for the time, and afterwards returned to inflame the minds of their neighbours with a recital of the deeds they had achieved. Appointments were fixed for the month of April, at which time the insurrection became general, and extended over the whole surface of the country. The theatre of war might be comprehended in a line drawn from Nantes, passing through Pornic, the Isle of Noirmoutiers, Sables, Luçon, Fontenay, Niort, Parthenay, and returning by Airvault, Thouars, Doué, and Saint-Florent, to the Loire. The revolt, commenced by men superior to the peasants they commanded only by their natural qualities, was soon continued by men of higher rank. The peasants beset the mansions of the nobles, and forced them to put themselves at their head. The whole Marais insisted upon being commanded by Charette. This individual belonged to a family at Nantes; engaged in privateering; he had served in the navy, and reached the rank of lieutenant, but at the peace had retired to a country-house, the property of his uncle, where he passed his time in the chase. Of a weak and delicate frame, he seemed but little adapted to the fatigues of war; but, living in the woods, where he consumed whole months, and sleeping on the ground with his comrades, he had invigorated his constitution, acquired a perfect knowledge of the country, and made himself known to all the peasants by his fortitude and address. At first, he hesitated to accept the command thus urged upon him, and forcibly represented to the insurgents the dangers of their enterprise. Ultimately, however, he acceded to their entreaties; and, allowing them to commit all sorts of excesses, he effectually compromised them, and thus bound them irrevocably to his service. Talented, subtle, harsh in character, and of unconquerable perseverance, he became the most formidable of the Vendéan chiefs. The whole Marais obeyed him; and with fifteen and sometimes twenty thousand men, he menaced the Sables and Nantes. Immediately after collecting all his forces, he seized upon the isle of Noirmoutiers, an important acquisition, which he might render his stronghold and point of communication with England.

In the Bocage, the peasants applied to Messieurs de Bonchamps, d'Elbée, and de Larochejacquelein, whom they tore from their homes to place at their head. M. de Bonchamps had formerly served under M. de Suffren, enjoyed the reputation of a skilful officer, and united a noble and elevated character to great intrepidity. He commanded all the rebels of Anjou and the banks of the Loire. M. d'Elbée had likewise served in the army, and was distinguished for excessive devotion, great obstinacy, and an excellent capacity for this kind of warfare. At the present time he was the most influential leader in that part of the Bocage. He commanded the parishes around Chollet and Beaupréau. Cathelineau and Stofflet retained their command also, owing to the confidence they had inspired, and formed a junction with Bonchamps and D'Elbée, for the purpose of marching on Bressuire, where General Quétineau was stationed. That officer had carried off from the mansion of Clisson the family of Lescure, which he suspected of conspiring, and detained it at Bressuire. Henri de Larochejacquelein, a young noble, formerly enrolled in the king's guard, and now residing in the Bocage, was on a visit at the time to his cousin Lescure at Clisson. He effected his escape, and stirred up the Aubiers, where he was born, and all the parishes around Châtillon. He then joined the other leaders, and with them forced General Quétineau to withdraw from Bressuire. Consequently, M. de Lescure was delivered, together with his family. He was a young man, about the age of Henri de Larochejacquelein. In character he was calm, prudent, of cold but unshaken courage, and endowed with a scrupulous regard for justice. Henri, his cousin, possessed an heroic and sometimes reckless gallantry; in disposition he was hasty and generous. M. de Lescure immediately put himself at the head of his peasants, who flocked around him; and the whole body congregated at Bressuire, with the design of advancing on Thouars. The wives of the chiefs distributed cockades and flags among the warriors, who sustained their enthusiasm with songs, and marched as if to a crusade. The army dragged no baggage-waggons with it; the peasants, who never would remain long absent, carried with them a supply of bread sufficient for the duration of each expedition; and in extraordinary cases, the parishes were called upon to provide food for those who wanted it. This army was composed of nearly 30,000 men, and was designated the grand royal and catholic army. It faced towards Angers, Saumur, Doué, Thouars, and Parthenay. Between it and the army in the Marais, commanded by Charette, were various intermediate assemblages, of which the principal, under the orders of M. de Royrand, might amount to ten or twelve thousand men.

The grand army, commanded by Messieurs de Bonchamps, d'Elbée, de Lescure, de Larochejacquelein, Cathelineau, and Stofflet, arrived before Thouars on the 3d May, and prepared to attack it the following morning. It was necessary to cross the Thoué, which nearly surrounds the town of Thouars on all sides. General Quétineau took the precaution of defending its passage. The Vendéans cannonaded for some time with the artillery they had taken from the republicans, and discharged their rifles from the banks with their accustomed precision. M. de Lescure, impatient to effect the passage, advanced amidst a shower of bullets, with which his clothes were riddled, but failed to draw above a single peasant after him. Larochejacquelein, however, hastened to the spot, followed by his men; they passed the bridge, and the republicans were beaten back into the town. But the walls exhibited no breach, and the assailants had no means of making one. Henri de Larochejacquelein raised himself on the shoulders of his followers and scaled the ramparts. M. d'Elbée pushed the attack vigorously on his side; and Quétineau, unable to offer an effectual resistance, consented to surrender in order to avert calamities from the town. Through the efforts of their leaders, the Vendéans conducted themselves with moderation; no outrage was committed on the inhabitants, and they contented themselves with burning the tree of liberty and the papers of the administrations. The generous Lescure repaid Quétineau the attentions he had received from him during his detention at Bressuire, and pressingly besought him to remain with the Vendéan army, so as to escape the severities of his own government, which, refusing him credit for the impracticability of resistance, might possibly punish him for having surrendered. Quétineau nobly repudiated the suggestion, and intimated his determination to return amongst the republicans, and demand inquiry into his conduct.

CHAPTER XXII.

LEVY OF A PARISIAN ARMY OF 12,000 MEN.—INCREASING FERMENT AMONGST THE REVOLUTIONISTS.—CONTEST BETWEEN THE COMMUNE AND THE CONVENTION.—PRINCIPAL EVENTS OF THE 28TH, 29TH, AND 30TH MAY 1793.—LAST STRUGGLE BETWEEN THE GIRONDISTS AND MOUNTAINEERS.—TWENTY-NINE GIRONDISTS ARRESTED.—GLANCE AT THE PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION.

INTELLIGENCE of the disasters in La Vendée, arriving concurrently with evil tidings from the north, announcing discomfitures on the part of Dampierre—from the south, importing that the Spaniards were assuming a threatening aspect on the Pyrenees—and from several provinces where the least favourable dispositions prevailed, diffused an extraordinary agitation. Some of the departments adjoining La Vendée, on being acquainted with the successes of the insurgents, deemed themselves authorised to send troops to oppose them. The department of L'Herault, in particular, raised six millions of francs and 6000 men, and forwarded an address to the people of Paris urging them to do the like. The convention, too happy to foster this enthusiasm, approved the conduct of the department of L'Herault, and thereby indirectly empowered all the communes in France to perform acts of sovereignty by levying men and money.

The commune of Paris allowed not the oversight to escape it. The Parisians, it pretended, held the mission to save France, and it eagerly seized the occasion to prove its zeal and display its authority by organising an army. It resolved that, in accordance with the solemn approbation expressed by the convention on the conduct of the department of L'Herault, there should be levied within the circuit of Paris an army of 12,000 men to march against La Vendée. After the example of the convention, the commune selected from the council-general commissioners to accompany this army. The 12,000 men in question were to be taken from the companies of the armed sections, and out of each company of 126, 14 were to depart for the scene of warfare. Following the revolutionary usage, a species of dictatorial power was left to the revolutionary committee of each section to mark out the men whose absence would occasion least inconvenience.

"In consequence," proceeded the ordinance of the commune, "all the unmarried clerks in all the public offices established in Paris, except the principals and sub-principals, the clerks of attorneys and barristers, the clerks of merchants and bankers, the apprentices to trades, to shopkeepers, &c., shall be exigible after the following proportions:—out of two, one shall march; out of three, two; out of four, two; out of five, three; out of six, three; out of seven, four; out of eight, four; and so on. Such of the clerks in the public offices as depart shall retain their places and the third of their salaries. No refusal will be held valid or entertained. The citizens under requisition will make known to the committee of their section what they need for equipment, and their wants will be immediately supplied. They will then assemble to nominate their officers, and forthwith place themselves under their orders."

But to ordain an army and levy it thus violently were insufficient, unless funds for its maintenance also could be exacted; and on that material point it was resolved to assail the rich. The rich, said the commune, would do positively nothing for the defence of the country and the revolution; they lived in a careless, happy idleness, and left to the people the burden of fighting for their native land; hence it became necessary to make them, at all events, contribute a part of their wealth to the common cause. For that purpose, the idea of a forced loan suggested itself, to be furnished by the citizens of Paris according to the amount of their incomes. From the revenue of a thousand francs to that of fifty thousand, their recipients were to pay a proportional sum, ranging from thirty francs to twenty thousand. All those whose income exceeded fifty thousand were to retain thirty thousand and give up the rest. The real and personal property of any recusants to this patriotic contribution was to be seized, and sold on the demand of the revolutionary committees, and their persons regarded as suspected.

Such measures, which affected so nearly all classes, either in their persons, by compelling them to take arms, or in their fortunes, by making them furnish contributions, were pretty sure to experience a stout resistance in the sections. We have already observed that divisions existed amongst those assemblies, and that they were more or less violent according to the proportion they respectively contained of the lower orders. In some, and especially those of the Quinze-Vingts, the Gravilliers, and the Halle-aux-Blés, resolutions were passed not to depart so long as federalists and paid troops remained at Paris, they serving, in the language of the malecontents, as body-guards to the convention. These sections resisted from a spirit of Jacobinism; but several others did so on different grounds. The whole community of clerks, apprentices, assistants in shops, &c., mustered in the sections, and offered a strenuous opposition to the two ordinances of the commune. The old servants of the scattered aristocracy, who performed no mean part in agitating Paris, hastened to unite with these parties; they gathered together in the streets and public places, and uttered cries of "Down with the Jacobins! down with the Mountain!" Thus the revolutionary system upon this occasion encountered obstacles in Paris itself, similar in nature to those which were impeding it in the provinces.

Then arose a general clamour against the aristocracy of the sections. Marat said that the "gentlemen" grocers, agents, and clerks, were conspiring with "gentlemen" on the right side, and with "gentlemen" who were rich, in order to overcome the revolution; that they ought all to be arrested as suspected, and reduced to the class of sans-culottes. "without leaving them a rag to cover their nakedness."

Chaumette, the procurator of the commune, delivered a long oration, in which he deplored the calamities of the country, accruing, as he alleged, from the perfidy of the government, the selfishness of the rich, the ignorance of the people, and the weariness and disgust of numerous citizens in their unavailing struggles for the common good. He therefore proposed and carried resolutions, that the convention should be addressed for measures of public enlightenment, of energy against the lazy egotism of the affluent, and of relief to the necessities of the poor; that an assembly should be formed, comprising the presidents of the sectional revolutionary committees and the members of all the administrative bodies, to meet every Sunday and Thursday at the commune to deliberate on the dangers of the commonwealth; and, lastly, that all good citizens should be solicited to attend the meetings of the sections, in order to ensure the preponderance to patriotism.

Danton, always prompt to devise expedients in moments of difficulty, propounded a scheme for composing two armies of sans-culottes, the one to march on La Vendée, and the other to remain in Paris as a check upon the aristocrats, and for furnishing pay to both from the resources of the rich. Moreover, he proposed, in order to secure a majority in the sections, to pay the citizens who should lose their time in attending the sittings. Robespierre, borrowing the ideas of Danton, developed them at the Jacobin Club, and improved them by additions of his own. He insisted upon the assignment of new classes of suspected, not limited as heretofore to nobles, priests, and financiers, but extended to all citizens who had in any respect given tokens of incivism—upon their incarceration until the peace—upon imparting increased stimulus to the action of the revolutionary tribunal, and counteracting by fresh modes of communication the effect of wicked journals. By the aid of all such guarantees, he said, the patriots would be able, without any illegal proceeding, without any infraction of the laws, to resist the right side and its machinations.

All ideas thus centred in one great design, which involved an armed levy of the people, one part to be detained at home, and the other to be sent abroad; its equipment at the expense of the rich, and additional contributions from the latter to enable the populace to attend and outvote them at the deliberative assemblies; the incarceration of all the enemies of the revolution under the name of suspected, a term much more widely defined than it had previously been; and the establishment of a closer intercourse between the commune and the sections, by the creation of a new revolutionary assembly calculated for extraordinary measures - that is to say, insurrection. The congregation of the Evêché, which had been formerly dissolved, was now revived on the motion of Chaumette, under much more imposing auspices, evidently for the purpose of effecting this latter object.

Tidings of an alarming nature came thickly pouring on each other between the 8th and 10th of May. Dampierre had been killed in command of the army of the north. In the interior, the provinces continued and extended their career of revolt. Normandy gave evidence of being about to declare common cause with Brittany. The insurgents of La Vendée had advanced from Thouars upon Loudun and Montreuil, captured those two towns, and thus nearly reached the banks of the Loire. The English were stated to be on the point of disembarking in Brittany, effecting a junction with the successful rebels, and attacking the republic in its centre. The citizens of Bordeaux, indignant at the accusations levelled against their deputies, were assuming a most threatening attitude, and had disarmed a section into which the Jacobins had retreated. At Marseilles the sections were in complete insurrection. Incensed at the excesses committed under pretext of disarming the suspected, they had gathered together, superseded the commune, transferred its powers to a committee, called the central committee of the sections, and instituted a popular court for discovering the authors of the various murders and robberies. After these precautions in their own city, they had sent deputies to the sections of the town of Aix, and otherwise taken steps to propagate their example in the whole department. Disregarding, also, the sacred character of the conventional commissioners, they had seized their papers and ordered them to retire. At Lyons the aspect of affairs was equally serious. The administrative bodies in unison with the Jacobins having ordained, in imitation of Paris, a levy of six millions and six thousand men, and furthermore attempted to execute the plan of disarming all they deemed suspected, and to institute a revolutionary tribunal, the sections had flown to arms, and stood ready to measure strength with the commune. Thus, whilst the enemy was advancing on the north, the insurrection, starting from Brittany and La Vendée, fostered and supported by the English, threatened to make the tour of France, through Bordeaux, Rouen, Nantes, Marseilles, and Lyons.

These various circumstances being in quick succession communicated to Paris within the space of two or three days, gave rise to the most gloomy forebodings on the part of the Mountaineers and Jacobins. The propositions already made were renewed with an additional degree of fury; and others were suggested, as, for instance, that all the waiters at hotels and cafés, and all domestic servants, ought to be sent off without a moment's delay; that the popular societies should march in a compact body; that commissioners of the assembly should forthwith visit the sections, and induce them to hasten their contingents; that 30,000 men should be posted to the scenes of action in the vehicles of luxury; that the rich should furnish an immediate contribution, and give up the tenth of their possessions; that the suspected should be imprisoned and guarded as hostages; that the conduct of the ministers should be investigated; that the committee of public welfare should be directed to frame an exposition for the benefit of the citizens whose judgments had been misled; and that all civil affairs should be intermitted, the proceedings of the civil tribunals suspended, the theatres closed, the tocsin sounded, and the alarm-guns fired.

Danton, with the view of restoring some confidence amidst this general consternation, offered two observations; firstly, that the apprehension of stripping Paris of honest citizens necessary to its security, need not prevent the levies, forasmuch as there would always remain 150,000 men ready to rise and exterminate any aristocrats who should dare show themselves; secondly, that the agitation of civil war, instead of being a subject of joyful anticipation, ought, on the contrary, to be a subject of alarm to the foreign enemy. "Montesquieu," said he, "has already remarked that fact in speaking of the Romans: a nation which has all its citizens armed and exercised, their minds inured to war, their souls fired with ardour, all their passions centred in a rage for battle —such a nation has nothing to fear from the cold and mercenary courage of foreign soldiers. The weakest of the two parties which civil war embroils, will always be sufficiently strong to destroy automata to whom discipline cannot impart the genuine glow of life and enthusiasm."

Resolutions were immediately passed that ninety-six commissioners should repair to the sections and accelerate their contingents, and that the committee of public welfare should continue its functions during a month longer. Custine was nominated general of the army of the north, and Houchard of that of the Rhine. A fresh distribution of the armies was made around the frontiers. Cambon presented a project for a forced loan of a thousand millions to be filled up by the rich, and hypothecated on the estates of the emigrants. "It is a mode of obliging the rich," said he, "to take part in the revolution, by reducing them to the necessity of assuming a portion of the national domains, if they wish to recover their advances by foreclosing their security."

The commune, likewise, ordained that a second army of sans-culottes should be formed in Paris to repress the aristocrats, whilst the first was marching against the rebels; that a general incarceration should be made of all the suspected; and that the central assembly, composed of the administrative authorities, the presidents of sections, and the members of revolutionary committees, should meet with all dispatch to assess the forced loan, to draw up the list of suspected, and perform other similar urgent functions.

Dissension and tumult had reached their climax. On the one side it was asserted, that the aristocrats without and those within the realm were in confederacy; that the conspirators of Marseilles, La Vendée, and Normandy, were all in one common league; that the deputies of the right side directed this vast conspiracy, and that the ferment amongst the sections was merely a sequel of their intrigues in Paris. On the other side, all the excesses committed in the various quarters were attributed to the Mountain, which was openly charged with a deliberate intention to throw France into the horrors of chaos, and to assassinate its opponents in the national representation. On both sides, anxious discussions were held upon the means of averting the threatened perils, and the measures necessary for saving the republic. The members of the right side exhorted each other to take courage, and were unanimous in recommending some act of decisive energy. Certain sections, such as those of Mail, La Butte-des-Moulins, and several others, strenuously supported them, and refused to send delegates to the central assembly convoked at the town-hall. They also refused to subscribe to the forced loan, saying they would provide for the maintenance of their own volunteers; and utterly repudiated fresh lists of the suspected, forcibly alleging that their revolutionary committees were sufficient to perform the duties of police within their jurisdictions. The Mountaineers, on the contrary, proclaimed treason, and insisted at all points that the time was arrived for bringing things to a termination; that it was now indispensable for patriots to combine, labour in common, and rescue the republic from the atrocious snares of the twenty-two denounced Girondists. At the Cordelier Club, it was openly maintained that those deputies ought to be seized and massacred. At a meeting where several outrageous females were assembled, a serious proposal was entertained for taking advantage of the first commotion in the convention to dispatch them with daggers. These harpies, in fact, provided themselves with poniards, daily filled the galleries with uproar, and boasted that they were the predestined saviours of the republic. This sudden appearance of daggers excited remarks upon their number, and it was ascertained that a single gunsmith in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine had manufactured several hundreds. On neither side did any one appear henceforth without arms, or without all the means of attack and defence. No plan had been as yet definitively arranged, but the passions had reached that point of combustion when the slightest spark suffices to kindle an explosion.

At the Jacobin Club, every variety of wild suggestion was made. On the ground that the articles of impeachment exhibited against the twenty-two Girondists did not prevent them from sitting in the convention, an act of popular energy was asserted to have become essential; the citizens destined for La Vendée must not be allowed to depart until the country was saved; the people were quite competent to save it, but they needed instruction as to the means, on which account it was expedient to name a committee of five members, with the privilege of observing secrecy even towards the society itself. To this last proposal it was objected that every thing might be openly stated in the club, that the idea of concealment was preposterous, and that the moment for acting without disguise was the present, if ever there were one. Robespierre, who deemed such declarations imprudent, appeared to condemn all illegal measures, asking whether those advantageous and more certain expedients he himself had recommended were in reality exhausted. "Have you organised," said he to his fellow Jacobins, "your revolutionary army? Have you accomplished all that is necessary to remunerate the sans-culottes called to arms or sitting in the sections? Have you covered your public places with forges and workshops? Have you arrested the suspected? No; you have employed none of those sagacious and natural appliances by which patriots would avoid being compromised, and you allow men who understand nothing about the public welfare to suggest to you measures which occasion all the calumnies disseminated against you. It is only after exhausting all legal means that recourse should be had to violent expedients, and then they ought not to be proposed in a society claiming to be enlightened and prudent. I am aware," added Robespierre, "that I shall be accused of moderatism, but I am sufficiently known to disregard such imputations."

Thus, as before the 10th August, the revolutionists felt the want of a fixed plan, and roamed from project to project, calling ever and anon for some place of general association, where they might enter into common arrangements. The assembly at the town-hall had been formed to satisfy this latter craving; but the department was not present in it; one only of its members, the Jacobin Dufourny, appeared; several sections absented themselves; the mayor also had declined to give the sanction of his presence, and it was adjourned over to Sunday the 19th May, to be then held for the discussion of the objects for which the meeting itself was convoked. Although the ordinance of the commune fixing this assembly had prescribed duties of an apparently circumscribed character, the same indefinite language had been held during its sitting as was prevalent every where else, and the necessity for another 10th of August was the predominant topic of declamation. But nothing beyond rabid denunciations and the usual club exaggerations had resulted; several females were intermingled with the men, and the heterogeneous assemblage presented the ordinary tumult and confusion, both in purpose and language, of all popular gatherings.

The 15th, 16th, and 17th passed in continued agitation, and every thing became an occasion for broils and disturbance in the convention. The people of Bordeaux sent an address, in which they announced their intention to rise in vindication of their deputies; declaring that part of them would march on La Vendée to fight the rebels, whilst the remainder advanced on Paris to exterminate the anarchists who dared assail the national representation. A letter from Marseilles confirmed the intelligence that the sections of that city were resolute in their resistance. A petition from Lyons solicited relief for fifteen hundred prisoners, confined under the designation of "suspected," and menaced with the revolutionary tribunal by Chalier and the Jacobins. These communications excited a deplorable commotion. In the hall of the assembly, and in the galleries, decided symptoms of a resolution to end the sitting in a general battle were manifested. The right side, however, animated by the danger, infused its own courage into the Plain; and the convention resolved, by a considerable majority, that the petition from Bordeaux was a model of patriotism, quashed all revolutionary tribunals erected by local authorities, and empowered citizens about to be dragged before them to repel force by force. These decisions at once inflamed the indignation of the Mountain and the courage of the Girondists. On the 18th, exasperation seemed to have attained its utmost bounds. The Mountain, weakened by the absence of several of its members as commissioners in the departments and the armies, exclaimed against oppression. Guadet thereupon claimed a hearing for an historical application to actual circumstances, and proceeded to prophesy the future destiny of parties in an astounding manner.

"When in England," said he, "a generous majority resisted the clamours of a factious minority, that minority exclaimed against oppression, and succeeded with that cry in bringing the majority itself under oppression. It called to its aid the patriots par excellence. It was thus a deluded multitude was designated, to which pillage and a partition of lands were promised That incessant appeal by the minority to the patriots par excellence, against the oppression of the majority, provoked the outrage known under the name of the purging of parliament, an outrage of which Pride, who from a butcher had become a colonel, was the author and chief perpetrator. One hundred and fifty members were driven from parliament, and the minority, composed of fifty or sixty persons, remained master of the state. What was the result? These patriots par excellence, the mere instruments of Cromwell, who made them commit folly after folly, were expelled in their turn. Their own crimes served as the pretext for usurpation."

Then Guadet, pointing to the butcher Legendre, Danton, Lacroix, and the other deputies accused of profligacy and peculation, added—"Cromwell entered the parliament one day, and addressing those same members, who alone, according to their own statements, were competent to save the country, he drove them forth, saying to one, thou art a thief; to another thou art a drunkard; to a third, thou art gorged with the public moneys; to a fourth, thou art a frequenter of harlots and evil places. Begone, therefore, said he to them all, and give place to honest men. They gave place, and Cromwell assumed it!"

This striking and terrible allusion produced a profound sensation in the assembly, which remained buried in silence. Guadet continued; and, in order to avert this "Pride's purge," proposed various measures of police, which the convention adopted amidst murmurs. But, whilst he was returning to his seat, a scandalous scene occurred in the galleries. A woman attempted to remove a man with the view of turning him out of the hall; she was seconded in her efforts by those around her, and the unfortunate person who resisted the violence seemed about to be overwhelmed by the whole population of the galleries. The soldiers on guard endeavoured in vain to restore order. Marat cried out at the pitch of his voice that the obnoxious individual was an aristocrat. The deputies could not restrain their indignation against Marat for this wanton attempt to increase the danger that already threatened the man. He coolly responded that the people never would be tranquil until they were delivered of aristocrats, of Dumouriez's accomplices, of statesmen, by which latter title he usually designated the Girondists, on account of their reputation for talent.

At this moment, the president Isnard uncovered, and claimed attention to an important declaration. He was heard with the greatest silence, and, in a tone of deep emotion, he said, "I have had revealed to me a project of England, which I deem it my duty to make known. The design of Pitt is to arm one part of the people against the other, by instigating insurrection. This insurrection is to commence with the women; the insurgents will mark out several deputies, will massacre them, then dissolve the National Convention, and that moment will be chosen to make a descent upon our coasts.

Such is the declaration I owe to my country."

The majority applauded Isnard, ordered his declaration to be printed, and moreover passed a resolution that the members should not separate, but share all their dangers in common. Explanations were then demanded as to the tumult in the galleries. A statement was made that the women who caused the disturbances belonged to a society called "The Fraternity," that they were accustomed to occupy the hall, exclude strangers and federalists from the departments, and interrupt the debates by howls and hootings. This account provoked allusions to popular societies in general, which excited instant murmurs. Marat, who had been continually moving up and down the corridors and from one bench in the hall to another, with the word "statesmen" incessantly on his tongue, here drew towards one of the members of the right side, and exclaimed, "Thou art one of them, but the people will do justice on thee and the others." Guadet again sprang to the tribune, to animate his colleagues to fortitude and determination amidst this storm. He adverted to all the troubles of which Paris was the scene, the expressions used in the popular assemblies, the frightful language held in the Jacobin Club, and the designs indicated in the association convoked at the town-hall; and he stated that the recent tumult was merely intended to produce a scene of confusion, to afford an opportunity for the premeditated assassinations to be perpetrated. In spite of the interruptions assailing him every instant, he succeeded in pitching his voice above the din, and proposed two measures of heroic energy, but quite impracticable.

"The evil," said he, "is in the anarchical authorities of Paris; I therefore move you to cashier them, and replace them by the presidents of sections.

The convention being no longer free, it is expedient to convoke another assembly elsewhere, and ordain that the substitutes shall congregate at Bourges, and there hold themselves in readiness to constitute a convention, on the first signal they shall receive from you, or on the first intelligence of the dissolution of the existing convention."

A prodigious uproar followed the submission of these two propositions. All the members of the right side arose, exclaiming that they embraced the only means of safety, and seemed to reverence the vigorous genius of Guadet evinced in their discovery. The left side likewise started on its feet, hurling menaces at its adversaries, and exclaiming in its turn that the conspiracy was at length unmasked, that the intriguers had thrown off all disguise, and that their schemes against the unity of the republic were avowed. Danton attempted to rush up the steps of the tribune, but he was stopped, and its possession given to Barrère, who appeared in the name of the committee of public welfare.

Barrère, with his insinuating address and conciliatory tone, said that if he had been allowed to speak, he would some days earlier have revealed divers facts concerning the state of France. He then reported that a project was universally spoken of for dissolving the convention; that the president of his section had gathered from the lips of the procurator Chaumette words announcing the intention; that at the Evêché, and in an assembly at the town-hall, the same subject had been repeatedly discussed; and that to facilitate the attainment of the object, it was proposed to excite a tumult, chiefly through the instrumentality of the women, and to carry off twenty-two heads under favour of the confusion. He added, that the minister for foreign affairs and the minister of the interior must have obtained information upon this topic, which they ought to be called upon to disclose. Then passing to the proposed measures, Barrère stated he agreed in opinion with Guadet as to the authorities of Paris; there, in fact, he found a feeble department, sections acting as sovereign bodies, and a commune instigated to monstrous abuses by its procurator Chaumette, a renegade monk, and suspected like all the former nobles and priests; but at the same time he believed the abrogation of these authorities would cause a state of perfect anarchy. With regard to the meeting of substitutes at Bourges, it would not save the convention, and could not supply its place. But there was, according to his ideas, a mode of parrying all the dangers wherewith they were encompassed, without involving themselves in extreme inconveniences; and this consisted in nominating a commission of twelve members, empowered to examine and report the acts of the commune for the preceding month; to investigate the plots concocted in the interior of the republic, and the designs formed against the national representation; to take informations, whensoever needful, from all the committees, ministers, and authorities; and, lastly, to adopt all necessary steps to secure the persons of the conspirators.

The first glow of enthusiasm and courage having cooled, the majority were too happy to adopt the temporising project of Barrère. Nothing was more usual than to name commissions; at every occurrence, at every peril, at every want, a committee was created to meet the contingency, and so soon as individuals were nominated to perform a certain duty, the assembly seemed to consider that the duty was executed, and that committees would abundantly possess, what it ofttimes lacked, fortitude, knowledge, capacity, and vigour. The one appointed on the present occasion was not likely to be deficient in energy, since almost all its members belonged to the right side. Amongst others, it included Boyer-Fonfrède, Rabaut Saint-Etienne, Kervélégan, and Henri Larivière, all deputies of the Gironde. But the very energy of this committee was fated to be disastrous. Instituted with the view of shielding the convention from the designs of the Jacobins, it only stimulated them the more, and augmented the very danger it was intended to avert. The Jacobins had menaced the Girondists with their clamours; the Girondists retorted the threats by establishing a committee, and to this the Jacobins prepared a rejoinder in the fatal catastrophe of the 31st May and 2d June.

Scarcely was the commission voted before the popular societies and the sections cried out, as usual, against inquisitions and martial law. The association of the town-hall, which stood adjourned to the 19th, met pursuant to that adjournment, and mustered more numerously than before. The mayor, however, did not appear, and a commissioner of police presided. Several sections also refrained from participating, the number which sent delegates not exceeding thirty-five. The meeting assumed the title of the Central Revolutionary Committee. The primary resolutions passed were, to commit nothing to paper, to keep no registers, and to prevent all egress until the conclusion of the sitting. It was then proposed to settle the form of proceeding, in other words, to fix the objects upon which attention should be directed. The real and ostensible objects were the forced loan and the lists of the suspected; but from the commencement, declamation turned upon the inability of the patriots in the convention to save the commonwealth, and upon the necessity of invigorating their power; to effect which desirable end it became an imperative duty to prosecute a diligent search for suspected characters, whether in the administrations, in the sections, or in the convention itself, and make a forcible seizure of their persons, in order to put them beyond the possibility of devising mischief. One member, with a singularly cold and precise delivery, said that he knew of no suspected persons save in the convention, and that it was in that quarter the blow must be struck. With this preamble, he proposed a very simple expedient, to wit, the abduction of the twenty-two deputies, their conveyance to a house in the suburbs, their prompt and quiet massacre, and the fabrication of letters to support the belief that they had emigrated. "We will not do the thing ourselves," subjoined this personage, "but by paying, we shall easily find performers." Another member immediately objected that this suggestion was impracticable, and that they ought to wait until Marat and Robespierre had developed their measures of insurrection at the Jacobin Club, as those, doubtless, would be infinitely preferable. "Silence!" exclaimed several voices; "mention no names!" A third member, a delegate of the Section 92, ventured a remonstrance against assassination, and reminded the meeting that there were tribunals for judging the enemies of the revolution. The greatest indignation was expressed against these doctrines; the meeting was thrown into the utmost disorder, and vociferations arose that no man should be endured who was not on a level with the crisis, and that it was the bounden duty of every patriot to denounce his neighbour if he distrusted his energy. Without further ceremony, he who had thus indiscreetly alluded to laws and courts of justice was expelled the association. A moment afterwards, it was discovered that a member of the section Fraternité, a section but ill disposed towards the Jacobins, was taking notes, whereupon he was also thrust to the door. The meeting then resumed its debate on the proscription of the deputies, on the place suitable for this "Septembrisation," and on the seizure and incarceration of other suspected parties, both in the commune and in the sections. A member strongly urged that the execution should take place that night, and to the objection that it was not possible, he replied, that men were all ready; adding, significantly, that at twelve o'clock Coligny was at court, but at one was a corpse.

Time, however, was elapsing, and the further discussion on these various topics was deferred till the following day, when it was agreed to consider the following matters: 1st, The abduction of the deputies; 2d, The lists of suspected; and, 3d, The purification of the public offices and committees. At six in the evening, an adjournment to the morrow was moved and carried.

On Monday the 20th the association accordingly met again. Pache was present on this occasion, and several lists, containing names of all sorts, were presented to him. He observed that they ought not to be otherwise designated than as "lists of suspected," which was legal, inasmuch as such lists were ordered. Some delegates remarked that the handwriting of the members ought not to be traceable, wherefore they suggested the lists should be re-copied. Others declared that republicans ought to fear nothing. Pache intimated that it was of little importance whether he were known to be intrusted with the lists in question, since they concerned the police of Paris, with which he was charged. The subtle and cautious character of Pache was not belied in this instance; he wished to include all that was exacted from him within the limits of the law and his own functions.

A member, observing this precaution, remarked that he seemed to be ignorant of what had passed at the previous sitting, and of the questions set down for discussion, which it behoved him to learn forthwith; and he therefore had to inform him that the first on the list was the abduction of twenty-two deputies. Pache thereupon suggested that the persons of all the deputies were confided to the city of Paris, and that any attempt affecting their security might compromise the capital with the departments and provoke a civil war. He was then pertinently interrogated how it came to pass that he, the identical Pache, had signed the petition presented on the 15th April, in the name of the forty-eight sections of Paris, against the twenty-two. Whereto he replied that he but performed his duty in signing a petition intrusted to him for presentation; but at present the question was beyond the powers of the association, convened for the specific matters of the loan and the suspected, and that he would be obliged to break up the meeting if the proposed discussion were persisted in. These observations gave rise to noisy symptoms of displeasure; but as nothing could be done in the presence of Pache, and no one had any great taste for the comparatively insipid occupation of writing out lists of suspected, the members dispersed without any fixed adjournment.

On Tuesday the 21st the delegates who appeared at the association scarcely exceeded a dozen. Some were unwilling to attend so stormy and outrageous a meeting any longer, and others found that it did not possess the expected facilities for energetic deliberation.

The Cordelier Club was selected on the following day as a fitter theatre for unbridled fury. Men and women mingled indiscriminately and uttered horrible howls. An instant insurrection was demanded; and whereas the sacrifice of twenty-two deputies now seemed but a tame conclusion to these monsters, a hecatomb of three hundred was wildly insisted upon. A woman, screaming with the impetuosity of her sex, proposed to assemble all the citizens on the Place de la Réunion, to proceed in a body with a petition to the convention, and not quit the hall until they had wrung from it all the decrees indispensable to the public welfare. Young Varlet, who for so long an after period took a prominent part in every disturbance, next submitted a scheme of insurrection digested into several articles. It propounded a plan for marching to the convention, bearing the Rights of Man shrouded with a crape veil, seizing and carrying off all the deputies who had belonged to the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies, suppressing all the ministries, destroying all that yet remained of the house of Bourbon, &c. &c. Legendre eagerly superseded him at the tribune to combat these propositions. All the strength of his powerful voice could scarcely rise above the yells and shrieks which assailed him, and he succeeded with the greatest difficulty in repelling the inflammatory motions of Varlet. A fixed term for the insurrection, however, was impatiently desired, or the appointment of a day for repairing to the convention and exacting from it all that was required; but the night being already far advanced, the crowd gradually retired without any decision being taken.

All Paris was acquainted with the language held, both in the two meetings at the town-hall of the 19th and 20th, and in the sitting of the Cordeliers of the 22d. Several members of the central revolutionary committee had themselves denounced the expressions used and the propositions submitted, and the rumour of a plot against a numerous body of citizens and deputies was universally diffused. The commission of twelve was apprised of all the details, and prepared to take measures against the authors of the most violent propositions.

The section of La Fraternité formally denounced them on the 24th, in an address to the convention, wherein it related all that had been said and done in the meeting at the town-hall, and distinctly accused the mayor of being present thereat. The right side hailed with applause this courageous denunciation, and demanded that Pache should be ordered to the bar. Marat retorted that the members of the right side were themselves the only conspirators; that Valazé, under whose roof they assembled every day, had advised them to take arms; and that they had actually attended the convention with pistols. "Yes," said Valazé, "I gave that advice, because it had become necessary to defend our lives, and we would assuredly have defended them." All the members of the right side energetically testified their acquiescence in the sentiment. Lasource added a fact of the gravest import, namely, that the conspirators, apparently under the idea that the execution of the plot had been fixed for the previous night, had visited his house to carry him off.

At this moment it was intimated that the commission of twelve had obtained all the information necessary to unmask the plot and prosecute its contrivers, and that a report would be presented from it on the following day. In the mean time the convention resolved that the section of La Fraternité had deserved well of the country.

On the evening of the same day, great abhorrence was expressed in the municipality against the section of La Fraternité, for having, as was alleged, foully calumniated the mayor and the patriots, by the surmise that they designed to massacre the national representation. Forasmuch as the project had never mounted beyond a proposition, repudiated too by the mayor, Chaumette and the commune deduced that it was a mere calumny to charge a real conspiracy. Doubtless there was none in the strict sense of the word; it was not one of those plots deeply and secretly hatched, as in the recesses of a palace, but nevertheless it was such a conspiracy as the multitude of a large city can form; it was the first manifestation of those popular movements, tumultuously projected and tumultuously executed by an infatuated mob, such as the famous eras of the 14th July and 10th August had witnessed. In this sense, it was unquestionably an actual and veritable conspiracy. But all attempts to counteract such plots are unavailing, for they do not surprise authority slumbering in careless ignorance, but openly and in the face of day assail it when apprised and wakeful.

The following day, two other sections, those of the Tuileries and the Butte-des-Moulins, joined that of La Fraternité in its denunciations. "If reason cannot prevail," said the section Butte-des-Moulins, "make an appeal to the good citizens of Paris, and we take upon ourselves to affirm in advance that our section will powerfully co-operate in trampling to dust those disguised royalists who insolently assume the title of sans-culottes" At the same time, the mayor wrote to the assembly, with an explanation of what had passed at the town-hall. "There was no plot discussed," he said, "but simply a deliberation held on the composition of the lists of suspected. Some wrong-heads had indeed interrupted the deliberation by certain unreasonable propositions, but he, Pache, had recalled the disturbers to order, and these vagaries of the imagination had been attended with no result." This letter from Pache was treated with contempt, and undivided attention given to the commission of twelve, which came forward to submit a decree for general security. This decree proposed to place the national representation and the establishments connected with the public finances under the safeguard of the honest citizens, and make it incumbent on all to repair, at the signal of the drum, to the place of meeting in use by the company of each quarter, and thence march on the first orders that should be given them. None might fail at this rendezvous, and until the nomination of a commander-in-chief in lieu of Santerre, destined for La Vendée, the oldest legionary chief was to hold the supreme command. The sectional assemblies were to be closed at ten in the evening; for the execution of which regulation the presidents were made responsible. This project of law was adopted without curtailment, in spite of a strenuous opposition, and in particular of Danton, who said that by thus putting the assembly and the public establishments under the safeguard of the citizens of Paris, terror was proclaimed under legislative sanction.

Immediately after procuring this decree, the commission of twelve ordered the arrest of two administrators of police, Marino and Michel by name, accused of having made the propositions in the meeting at the town-hall which had caused so much alarm. Moreover, it directed the apprehension of the substitute of the procurator of the commune, Hebert, who edited, under the name of Pere Duchêne, a paper even more atrocious than that of Marat, and brought to the level of the lowest rabble by the use of coarse and revolting language. In this journal Hebert openly published what Marino and Michel were accused of having verbally propounded at the town-hall. The commission thus deemed it necessary to proceed both against those who proposed, and those who more directly instigated, a fresh insurrection. Scarcely was the order of arrest issued against Hebert, than he hastened to the commune to proclaim his disaster, and to exhibit before the assembled council the warrant by which his liberty was invaded. "It tore him," he said, "from his functions, but he would yield obedience. The commune ought not to forget the oath it had taken to consider itself assailed in the person of any of its members He invoked not that oath for himself, as he was ready to lay his head upon the block, but for his fellow-citizens, menaced by a new slavery." Loud applauses greeted the speech of Hebert. Chaumette, the procurator-general, embraced him with transport, and the president gave him the hug of fraternity on behalf of the whole council. The sitting was declared permanent until tidings were received from Hebert. The members were exhorted to carry consolation and succour to the wives and children of those who were or might be detained under arrest.

The sitting being thus permanent, messengers were dispatched every hour to the committee of twelve, to gain intelligence of him, who was affectedly described as "the magistrate torn from his functions." At half-past two in the morning, it transpired that he was undergoing an examination, and that Varlet had been likewise apprehended. At four, information arrived that Hebert had been committed to the Abbey. An hour afterwards, Chaumette appeared at the gates of the prison, but failed to gain access to the captive. The council-general forthwith drew up a petition to the convention, and dispersed it by horsemen through the different sections, in order to obtain their co-operation. Contention raged in almost all of those bodies motions and counter-motions were made every instant, having for object to retain or change the committees and presidents, to make or prevent arrests, to second or oppose the system of the commune, to sign or reject the petition it proposed. At length, adopted by a great number of the sections, this petition was presented to the convention in the course of the 25th. The deputation from the commune complained of the calumnies propagated against the magistrates of the people, and demanded that the petition of the section La Fraternité should be referred to the public accuser, in order that the guilty, if any such there were, or the slanderers, should receive condign punishment. It furthermore prayed for justice upon the committee of twelve, which had perpetrated a deplorable outrage upon the person of a magistrate of the people, by dragging him from the exercise of his functions and shutting him up in the Abbey. Isnard presided upon this occasion, and upon him devolved the duty of replying to the deputation.

"Magistrates of the people," said he, in a solemn and stern accent, "it is essential that you learn certain important truths. France has confided her representatives to the city of Paris, and it expects that they are there in safety. If the national representation be violated by one of those conspiracies wherewith we have been encompassed since the 10th March, and whereof the magistrates have been the last to warn us, I declare, in the name of the republic, that Paris would experience the vengeance of all France, and be erased from the list of cities."

This solemn and emphatic rebuke created a profound sensation in the assembly. Numerous voices demanded its publication. Danton objected that it was calculated to aggravate the dissensions already existing between Paris and the departments, and that care should be taken how such a misfortune was promoted. The convention, deeming that sufficient was accomplished by the commanding energy of the reply and of the commission of twelve, passed to the order of the day without ordaining the publication.

The deputies of the commune were accordingly dismissed from the bar without obtaining the smallest satisfaction. The remainder of the 25th, and the whole of the following day, were passed in scenes of tumult throughout all the sections. In every quarter desperate encounters prevailed, and the two opinions alternatively gained predominance, according to the hour of the day and the varying number of the advocates belonging to each faction. The commune continued to send delegates to inquire into the condition of Hebert. At one time he was found gently reposing, and at another he had begged the commune to dismiss all inquietude on his account. A clamour, nevertheless, was raised that he slept on a miserable pallet. Some of the sections took him under their especial protection; others prepared to renew the demand for his release, with a greater display of vigour than had been manifested by the municipality; and, lastly, the women, scouring the lanes and alleys with a banner, endeavoured to stir up the people to assail the Abbey and deliver their beloved magistrate.

On the 27th, the tumult was materially aggravated. Men proceeded from one section to the other to overcome opposition by actual violence. But in spite of all exertions, towards evening only twenty-eight sections had agreed to insist upon the enlargement of Hebert, and to draw up an imperative address to the convention. The committee of twelve, perceiving the disturbances in preparation, had notified to the commander on duty a requisition for the armed force of three sections, taking the precaution to designate the sections Butte-des-Moulins, Lepelletier, and Mail, which were the most devoted to the right side, and even ready to fight for it. These three sections promptly responded to the summons, and about six o'clock in the evening planted themselves in the courts of the national palace, on the side of the Carrousel, with arms and cannon, and holding matches ready lighted. In this position they presented an imposing aspect, sufficient to protect from outrage the national representation. But the crowd pressing on their ranks and about the different avenues of the palace, the uproar and confusion every where prevailing, the struggles of the deputies and others to reach the hall, gave to the scene something of the appearance of a siege. Several deputies encountered not only great obstacles, but even insults, amidst the populace in their progress to the doors, and filled the assembly with dismay by assurances that it was completely besieged. This was not exactly the case, however; for if the doors were obstructed by a mob, they were not closed against access or egress. But appearances were sufficient to alarm excited imaginations, and the assembly was thrown into the greatest confusion. Isnard occupied the chair. The section of La Cité appeared at the bar, and demanded the liberty of its president, Dobsen, arrested by order of the commission of twelve for having refused to produce the registers of his section. It furthermore solicited the liberation of the other prisoners, the suppression of the committee of twelve, and the impeachment of the members composing it. "The convention," replied Isnard, "pardons your inexperience; but it will never permit itself to be overawed by any portion of the people." The convention applauded the president's answer. Robespierre, on the other hand, moved a vote of censure. The right side strenuously opposed it, and a violent contest ensued between the two parties; the noise within the hall, combined with that outside, caused an astounding tumult.

At this moment, the mayor and the minister of the interior presented themselves at the bar, under the belief that the convention was besieged, according to the rumour prevalent in Paris. At sight of the minister of the interior, a general cry broke from the assembly, demanding from him an account of the state of Paris and of the environs of the hall. The situation of Garat was embarrassing, in being thus suddenly called upon to decide between the two parties, a task for which he was not more unsuited by the mildness of his character than by his political scepticism. But this scepticism proceeding from genuine dispassionateness, it had been fortunate for all at the moment if they could have calmly heard and appreciated his words. In his speech he reverted to the first causes of the existing disturbances. In his opinion, the original mischief sprung from the report disseminated concerning an association formed at the town-hall for the purpose of conspiring against the national representation. He stated, in accordance with the account of Pache, that the association in question was not a meeting of conspirators, but a legal assembly, convoked for a known and definite object; that if, in the absence of the mayor, certain ardent characters had made culpable propositions, those propositions, indignantly repudiated when the mayor was present, had been attended with no evil consequences, and could by no possibility be tortured into evidences of a regular veritable plot; and that the constitution of the commission of twelve for the prosecution of this pretended plot, and the arrests it had ordered, had become the causes of the present commotion. He said, moreover, that he was unacquainted with Hebert; that he had never received any unfavourable communications respecting him; that he merely knew him to be the author of a certain publication, despicable in every sense, but most erroneously considered as dangerous; that the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies had always contemned the detestable writings circulated against them, and consequently the rigour exercised against Hebert doubtless appeared unusual and probably vindictive; and, in fine, that the commission of twelve, although composed of honest men and excellent patriots, laboured under singular prejudices, and seemed too eager to gain a reputation for energy.

These sentiments were loudly cheered by the left side and the Mountain. Garat, subsequently adverting to the existing state of things, maintained that the convention was in no danger, and that the citizens surrounding it were actuated by feelings of respect. At these words, a deputy interrupted him, saying that he had been insulted. "That is possible," replied Garat; "I do not answer for what may happen to a single individual amidst a crowd containing men of all grades; but let the whole convention appear at the door, and I venture to pledge my responsibility that the people will give way respectfully before it, acknowledge its presence by marks of reverence, and listen obediently to its voice."

Garat concluded by enforcing certain conciliatory views, intimating at the same time, with all possible delicacy, that by endeavouring to repress the violence of the Jacobins, the risk or certainty of still further exasperating them was incurred. Unquestionably he was right; by putting ourselves on the defensive against a faction we irritate it the more, and precipitate the catastrophe; but when a struggle is inevitable, must we submit without resistance? The Girondists were precisely in that predicament; their instituting the commission of twelve was an act of imprudence, but an unavoidable and generous imprudence.

After finishing his speech, Garat courageously seated himself on the right side, where the danger was reputed to lie, and the convention directed his report to be printed and distributed. Pache was heard after Garat. He represented circumstances under pretty nearly the same aspect, reporting that the assembly was guarded by three devoted sections, summoned by the committee of twelve itself, wherein he intimated that committee had transgressed its powers, inasmuch as it had no authority to issue a requisition for the armed force; that a strong detachment had secured the prison of the Abbey from any infraction of the laws; that all danger was dissipated, and that the assembly might feel assured it was in perfect security. In concluding, he begged that the convention would graciously listen to the citizens who solicited the liberation of the prisoners.

At these words sounds of dissent escaped from the ranks of the assembly. "It is ten o'clock," cried voices on the right; "president, break up the sitting." "No, no," retorted voices on the left; "hear the petitioners." Henri Larivière meanwhile scaled the tribune, and insisted upon occupying it. "If you desire to hear any one," said he, "you ought to hear your commission of twelve, whom you accuse of tyranny, and to whom an opportunity for explaining its acts should be allowed, so that you may justly appreciate them." Loud murmurs drowned his voice. Isnard, unable longer to contend with disorder, vacated the chair, and was replaced by Herault-Séchelles, whose assumption drew vociferous cheers from the galleries. He proceeded to consult the assembly, which, stupified by noise and menaces, voted, amidst indescribable confusion, that the sitting should be continued.

The demagogues were then introduced to the bar, followed by a concourse of petitioners. They arrogantly demanded the suppression of an odious and tyrannical commission, the release of the arrested persons, and the triumph of virtue. "Citizens," replied Herault-Séchelles, "the force of reason and the force of the people are identical." Extravagant joy was expressed at the promulgation of this preposterous dogma. "You claim justice," he added; "justice is our first duty, and it will be granted to you."

Other petitioners succeeded, and divers orators addressed the convention. Eventually a decree was submitted, whereby the citizens incarcerated by the commission of twelve were declared free, the commission itself was dissolved, and its conduct referred to the examination of the committee of general safety. By this time the night was far advanced; the petitioners had crowded forward and [illegible] The [illegible] render the scene one of [illegible] decree was put to the vote, and declared [illegible] without any possibility of knowing whether [illegible] really adopted or not. Some alleged that the president had not been heard, others that the [illegible] not in sufficient number, and others, again, that the petitioners had taken the places of absent [illegible] in short, that the decree was null and void. [illegible] nevertheless, proclaimed, and the galleries [illegible] petitioners forthwith dispersed, to carry to the commune, the sections, the Jacobins, and the [illegible] the joyful tidings that the prisoners were [illegible] and that the commission was superseded.

This intelligence diffused great joy amongst the populace, and procured a momentary tranquillity in Paris. Even the countenance of the mayor seemed to beam with sincere delight at this cessation of the troubles. The Girondists, however, determined to contest the victory with their adversaries to the last extremity, mustered on the following day with irrepressible indignation. Lanjuinais especially, who had not shared the more egotistical rancour dividing the two sides of the convention, and whose firm adherence to his party gave the less umbrage, as no personal animosity seemed to animate him, even he, Lanjuinais, arrived burning with ardour and resolution to put the assembly to shame for its pusillanimity on the preceding evening. The deputy Osselin had no sooner moved that the decree be read over and definitively settled, in order that the prisoners might be immediately liberated, than Lanjuinais mounted the tribune, and asked to be heard on an argument that the decree was null and had not been passed. Violent exclamations interrupted him from the left. "Grant me silence," said he, "for I am determined to remain here until you have listened to me." An objection was made to his being heard upon any point save the wording of the decree; but after a doubtful appeal, it was decided he should have the benefit of the doubt, and be allowed to speak as he listed. He then entered into an explanation of the question he purposed to discuss, admonishing his hearers that it was one of the deepest importance to the general welfare.

"More than fifty thousand citizens," said he, "have been imprisoned in the whole of France by your delegates; they have made more arbitrary arrests in one month than the old government in a century; and you complain of the apprehension of two or three men who preach murder and anarchy at two sous the sheet! Your delegates and proconsuls, who act far from your sight, you leave to act in this manner, whilst your committee, stationed by your side and under your immediate superintendence, are distrusted and suppressed! Last Sunday, a proposition was made at the Jacobin Club to execute a massacre in Paris, the same topic is revived this evening at the Evêché; proofs are supplied to you, thrust before you, and you repel them!—you protect the men of blood!"

Great commotion followed these words, and stifled the voice of the speaker. "It is impossible to deliberate," exclaimed Chambon; "we have no course left but to retire into our departments." "Your doors are beset," remarked Lanjuinais. "It is false," shouted the left. "Yesterday," added Lanjuinais, with all his force, "you were not free; you were mastered by the apostles of murder." Legendre, raising his voice from his seat, here said—"The object is to make us lose the sitting. I declare that if Lanjuinais continue to tell lies, I will throw him from the tribune."

At this scandalous menace the assembly rose tumultuously, whilst the galleries pealed with boisterous applause. Guadet instantly moved that the words of Legendre should be taken down and inserted in the votes, so that all France might be made acquainted with them, and thus learn the treatment to which its deputies were exposed. Lanjuinais continuing, maintained that the decree of last night had not been passed, as the petitioners had voted with the deputies, or, if it had been passed, that it ought to be repealed, because the assembly was not free. "When you are free," said Lanjuinais, emphatically, "you do not vote impunity to crime." On the left it was affirmed that Lanjuinais distorted the facts, that the petitioners had not voted, but withdrawn into the corridors. On the right this statement was met by a distinct negative; and, without coming to any agreement on the subject, the repeal of the decree was put to the vote. By a majority of fifty-one voices the decree was rescinded. Whereupon Danton spoke:—"You have performed a great act of justice, and I hope it will be repeated before the close of the sitting; but if the commission you have just re-installed preserve its tyrannical powers, if the magistrates of the people be not restored to liberty and their functions, then I declare to you, that having proved how far we surpass our enemies in prudence and moderation, we will prove that we surpass them also in boldness and revolutionary vigour." The provisional enlargement of the prisoners was subsequently propounded from the chair and carried unanimously. Rabaut Saint-Etienne desired to be heard in the name of the commission of twelve, and even invoked attention in behalf of the public welfare; but all his endeavours were fruitless, and he concluded by pronouncing his resignation.

The decree had been thus revoked; and the majority, by returning to the right side, seemed to prove that the left side prevailed in snatching decrees only under pressure and during moments of weakness. Although the magistrates had been liberated, although Hebert was restored to the commune, where he was crowned with civic wreaths, the repeal of the decree nevertheless had aroused the fiercest passions, and the storm, which for an instant appeared to be dispelled, speedily gathered and burst more terribly than before.

That same day, the association which had been held at the town-hall, but had refrained from assembling there since the mayor had interdicted the so-styled propositions of public welfare, was renewed at the Evêché, in the electoral club, where certain electors were in the occasional habit of resorting. It was composed of delegates from the sections, chosen from the committees of surveillance, and delegates from the commune, the department, and the different clubs. The women even were represented in it—out of five hundred persons, one hundred being of the fair sex, at the head of whom was a female famous for her political zeal and her popular eloquence. On the first day, envoys from only thirty-six sections appeared at this union: twelve consequently had not deputed commissioners, and to these a new summons of convocation was addressed. A committee of six members was subsequently named, with instructions to consider and report the next day upon measures of public welfare. The delegates separated after that preliminary proceeding, and adjourned the association till the morrow, the 29th May.

In the evening the sections were all in commotion. Notwithstanding the decree of the convention ordaining them to be closed at ten o'clock, they evaded the regulation by constituting themselves at that hour into patriotic societies, under which title they continued their sittings until the early hours of the morning. In some, new addresses were debated against the commission of twelve; in others, petitions were voted to the convention, requiring from it an explanation of those words of Isnard—"Paris will be erased from the list of cities."

At the commune, the principal events were a long discourse by Chaumette on the obvious conspiracy hatching against liberty, on the ministers, on the right side, and various similar topics; and the arrival of Hebert, who related the particulars of his detention, received a crown, which he placed on the bust of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and then proceeded to his section, accompanied by envoys from the commune, who carried back in triumph the magistrate "wrested from persecution."

The following day, the 29th, the convention received afflicting intelligence from the two most important military points, the North and La Vendée. The army of the North had been repulsed between Bouchain and Cambray; Valenciennes and Cambray were cut off from all communication. At Fontenay the republican troops had been complêtely beaten by M. de Lescure, who had gained possession of Fontenay itself. These untoward tidings spread the greatest consternation, and rendered the situation of the moderate party still more dangerous. The sections appeared successively at the bar, bearing flags inscribed with these words—"Resistance to oppression." Some demanded, as they had resolved the night before, an explanation of Isnard's words, whilst others declared that all other inviolability save that of the people had ceased, wherefore the deputies who had laboured to arm the departments against Paris ought to be forthwith put under impeachment, the commission of twelve abrogated, a revolutionary army organised, &c. &c.

The sitting held that day at the Jacobin Club was not less ominous. That the moment had at length arrived when the people must be saved, was the universal cry re-echoed through the hall; and when a member came forward to detail the measures to be pursued, he was at once dismissed to the commission of six, appointed at the central association. That, it was remarked, was the body charged to provide for all contingencies, and to consider of the means of public safety. Legendre, essaying to speak on the dangers of the crisis, and on the necessity of exhausting legal means before recurring to extreme expedients, was hooted as a sleep-walker. Robespierre, avoiding any explicit declarations, said that it was for the commune to form an intimate union with the people; that, with regard to himself, he was incapable of prescribing measures of safety; that such capacity indeed was not given to a single individual, and much less to him than to any other, exhausted as he was by four years of revolutionary struggles, and consumed by a slow and mortal fever.

These words of the tribune produced all the effect he desired, and were responded to with loud acclamations. They sufficiently indicated that he resigned himself, like all besides, to what might be proposed by the municipal authorities associated at the Evêché. That assembly had again met, and, as on the previous occasion, numerous females were present. The first subject attended to was to calm the fears of proprietors, by swearing to respect property. It was respected on the 14th July and the 10th August, said the advocates of the oath; and forthwith the pledge to respect it on the 31st May was taken. After this proceeding had been gone through, Dufourny, a member of the committee of six, observed, that without a commander-in-chief of the Parisian guard it was impossible to answer for any result, wherefore the commune must be requested to nominate one immediately. A woman, the celebrated Lacombe, catching up his words, strenuously enforced the proposition, and declared that unless prompt and vigorous measures were adopted, the salvation of the people was in the greatest jeopardy. A deputation was at once dispatched to the commune, which replied, after the manner of Pache, that the mode of nominating a commander-in-chief being fixed by the decrees of the convention, and this mode prohibiting it from taking the nomination upon itself, it could, under the circumstances, merely indulge hopes upon the subject. This rejoinder was an indirect instigation to rank the appointment in question amongst the number of those extraordinary measures in behalf of public safety which it behoved the association to take. The meeting subsequently resolved to invite all the cantons of the department to unite with it, and to send deputies to Versailles. A blind confidence was demanded in the name of the six, and a promise exacted to perform without examination all they should propose. Strict silence was enjoined as to every thing concerning the grand question of measures; and eventually an adjournment was carried to nine the following morning, then to open a permanent sitting intended to be decisive.

The commission of twelve had been apprised of all that passed during the evening. The committee of public welfare was equally well informed, and it moreover suspected, according to a placard published that day, that secret meetings were held at Charenton, and attended by Danton, Marat, and Robespierre. The committee of public welfare, profiting by an interval of absence on the part of Danton, ordered the minister of the interior to prosecute the most diligent inquiries into the existence of any such conclaves. Nothing was discovered, and it soon became obvious that the report was false. It would appear that all arrangements were left to the central association at the town-hall. Robespierre ardently desired a revolution so manifestly directed against his enemies the Girondists, but he had no need to compromise himself in provoking it; it was sufficient for him to withdraw the opposition which he had offered upon several occasions during the month of May. And in this respect, his speech at the Jacobins', in which he had said that the commune ought to coalesce intimately with the people, and devise expedients which he could never hope to discover, was a veritable acquiescence in the insurrection.* This indirect approval was quite enough, there being sufficient zeal in the central club to dispense with his active personal interference. As for Marat, he favoured the movement by his journal, and by his daily exhibitions in the convention; but he was not a member of the committee of six, upon which the real burden of the insurrection lay. The only one of the three who may be deemed a concealed mover [illegible] sedition is Danton, and even he is uncert[illegible] is no doubt he wished for the abolition of [illegible]sion of twelve, but at the same time he was not disposed to assail—as yet, at all events—the national representation. Meilhan, meeting him, during the day, at the committee of public welfare, accosted him, and entered upon a friendly conversation with him for some time, in the course of which he impressed upon him the great distinction drawn by the Girondists between him and Robespierre, and the high estimation in which they held his powers, concluding with an assurance that he might perform a distinguished part, by directing his influence to the promotion of the public good and the support of honest men. Danton, whom these words affected, hastily raised his head and said to Meilhan, "Your Girondists have no confidence in me." Meilhan strove to remove the impression: "They have no confidence," repeated Danton; and he moved away without permitting the conversation to be resumed. This short expression distinctly reveals the true propensities of the man. He despised that municipal mob; he had no inclination for Robespierre or Marat; and he would have preferred putting himself at the head of the Girondists, but "they had no confidence in him." In truth, their principles and policy

* The real dispositions of Robespierre, with regard to the 31st May, are manifest in the speeches he delivered at the Jacobin Club, where much greater freedom was allowed to the tongue than in the convention, and where it was deemed quite unnecessary to throw a veil over any plot in agitation. A few extracts from what he said at different important periods, will exhibit the march of his ideas touching the grand catastrophe of the 31st May and 2d June. His speech on the pillage committed in the month of February conveys the first indication.

SITTING OF THE 25TH FEBRUARY 1793.

Robespierre.—"As I have always loved humanity, but have never stooped to flatter an individual, so shall I now speak the truth. This is a cunning device imagined against the patriots themselves. Intriguers are bent upon ruining the patriots; in the heart of the people burns a just feeling of indignation. I have asserted, unsupported and amidst persecutions, that the people are never wrong; I ventured to proclaim that axiom at a time when it was not acknowledged; the course of the revolution has developed it.

The people have so repeatedly heard the law invoked by those who wished to crush them beneath its yoke, that they naturally distrust such language.

The people are distressed; they have not yet gathered the fruit of their labours; they are still persecuted by the rich, and the rich are now what they always were, harsh and pitiless. (Applause.) The people behold the insolence of those who have betrayed them; they see wealth accumulated in their hands; they become insensible to the necessity of taking deliberate measures to obtain their objects; and when any speak to them the language of reason, they listen only to their indignation against the rich, and are thus easily led into false proceedings by those who win their confidence in order to betray them.

There are two causes: the first, a natural disposition in the people to seek the means of alleviating their misery—a legitimate disposition in itself; the people believe that, in default of protective laws, they have a right to guard their own interests.

The second cause: this originates in the designs of the enemies of liberty, the enemies of the people, who are well convinced that the only sure mode of subjecting us to foreign powers is to alarm the people upon the subject of food, and render them the victims of the excesses resulting from the panic. I have been myself an eyewitness of these manœuvres. By the side of honest citizens we have seen strangers and men of opulence dressed in the respectable attire of sans-culottes. We have heard them say, 'We were promised plenty after the death of the king, and we are more wretched since that unfortunate prince was taken from us.' We have heard them declaim, not against the intriguing and counter-revolutionary portion of the convention, which sits where sat the aristocrats of the Constituent Assembly, but against the deputation of Paris, against the Mountain, and against the Jacobins, whom they represent as forestallers.

I do not tell you that the people are culpable; I do not say that their movements involve an outrage; but when the people rise, ought they not to have an object worthy of them? And ought paltry wares to occupy their attention? They have not even profited by them, for the loaves of sugar were grasped by the menials of aristocracy; but, supposing they had reaped all the profit, what inconveniences may not ensue in return for so miserable an advantage? Our adversaries, be assured, are anxious to terrify all who have any property; they are eager to persuade that our system of equality and liberty is subversive of all order and security.

The people ought to rise, not for the purpose of obtaining sugar, but in order to exterminate brigands. (Applause.) Is it necessary to retrace your past perils? You feared to become the prey of Prussians and Austrians; there was a negotiation, and those who then made a traffic of your liberty are the same who have excited the present troubles. I assert, in the presence of the friends of liberty and equality, and in the face of the nation, that during the month of September, after the affair of the 10th August, it was decided at Paris that the Prussians should penetrate to Paris without obstacle."

SITTING OF WEDNESDAY 8TH MAY 1793.

Robespierre.—"We have to struggle against foreign and domestic war. The civil war is abetted by the enemies at home. The army of La Vendée, the army of Brittany, and the army of Coblentz, are directed against Paris, that citadel of freedom. People of Paris, tyrants take arms against you, because you are the most estimable portion of humanity; the great potentates of Europe are moved against you, and all that France contains of corruptionists second their efforts.

After having discerned this vast plan of your enemies, it is but an easy task to devise the means of defending yourselves. I have not told you my secret; I have intimated it in the convention.

I will reveal this secret to you, and if it be possible that this duty of a representative of a free people can be considered as a crime, I am prepared to brave all dangers in order to confound tyrants and save liberty.

I said this morning at the convention, that the partisans of Paris should march to encounter the miscreants of La Vendée; that they should take up on their route their brethren in the departments; and should exterminate all—ay, all the rebels at once.

I said that all the patriots ought to rise, and reduce to impotency for mischief both the aristocrats of La Vendée and the aristocrats disguised under the visor of patriotism were distinct, and a coalition was scarcely possible. Furthermore, Danton found, neither in their opinions nor in their characters, the energy necessary to save the revolution, the grand object he looked to in all his actions. Indifferent as to persons, he sought to promote that party, of the two dividing the convention,

I said that the rebels of La Vendée had an army in Paris; I said that the generous and sublime people, who for five years have supported the burden of the revolution, ought to take the necessary precautions that our wives and children are not abandoned to the counter-revolutionary knives of the enemies Paris contains within its walls. No one has ventured to contest this principle. Such measures are of pressing, imperative necessity. Patriots! hasten to the rencounter with the brigands of La Vendée! They are formidable only because the plan of disarming the people had been adopted. Paris must send forth republican legions; but whilst we are making our internal enemies tremble, we must take care that our wives and children are not exposed to the fury of the aristocracy.

I proposed two measures; the first, that Paris should dispatch two legions sufficient to exterminate all the miscreants who have presumed to raise the standard of revolt. I demanded that all the aristocrats, all the Feuillants, all the moderates, should be expelled from the sections they have infected with their foul breath. I demanded that all suspected citizens should be placed under arrest; and that the description of suspected citizen should not be determined simply by that of noble, lawyer, financier, or merchant. I demanded that all citizens who have given proofs of incivism should be incarcerated until the war be terminated, and until we assume an imposing attitude before our enemies. I said that it was necessary to grant the people the means of frequenting the sections without curtailing their means of existence, and that, for this purpose, the convention should decree that every artisan, living on his own labour, shall be paid during the whole time he may be called upon to hold himself under arms to protect the tranquillity of Paris. I demanded an appropriation of the millions necessary for the manufacture of arms and pikes, so that all the sans-culottes of Paris may be provided with weapons.

I demanded that foundries and forges should be erected in the public thoroughfares, so that all the citizens might be witnesses to the fidelity and activity of the workmen. I demanded that all the public functionaries should be dismissed by the people.

I demanded that the municipality and the department of Paris, which possess the confidence of the people, should cease to be shackled. I demanded that the factious who are in the convention should cease to calumniate the people of Paris, and that the journalists who pervert public opinion should be reduced to silence. All these measures are necessary; and, taking the whole together, such is my acquittance of the debt I have contracted towards the people.

I demanded that the people should make an effort to crush the aristocrats, who are multiplied in every quarter. (Applause.)

I demanded that there should subsist in the heart of Paris an army, not such an army as that of Dumouriez, but a popular army, continually under arms, to overawe Feuillants and moderates. This army ought to be composed of sans-culottes receiving pay. I insisted upon millions being assigned to arm the artisans —all the good patriots; I insisted upon their occupying all the posts, so that before their imposing majesty all aristocrats may sicken and turn pale.

I move that from to-morrow forges shall be erected on the public places, where arms may be fabricated for the people. I move that the executive council shall be charged to execute these measures upon its own responsibility. If there be any who resist, if there be any who favour the enemies of liberty, to-morrow must they be scattered before the wind.

I move that the constituted authorities be charged to superintend the execution of these measures; and let them not forget they are the mandatories of a city which is the bulwark of liberty, and whose existence renders a counter-revolution impossible.

In this moment of crisis, duty calls upon all patriots to save the country by the most inexorable measures; if you suffer the patriots to be slaughtered in detail, all that the earth holds virtuous will be destroyed: it is for you to say whether you will save the human race.

(All the members rose by a simultaneous movement, and shouted, waving their hats in the air, 'Yes, yes! we will, we will!')

All the miscreants in the world have formed their plans, and all the defenders of liberty are marked out for victims.

Your glory and your happiness are brought into jeopardy, but it is not on that account alone I conjure you to watch over the welfare of the country. You imagine, perhaps, that you ought to revolt, ought to assume the appearance of insurrection; not at all: it is with the law in your hands that all our enemies must be crushed.

It is with arrant impudence that the faithless mandatories have laboured to separate the people of Paris from the departments, and the people of the galleries from the people of Paris, as if it were our especial fault, who have made all possible sacrifices to extend our galleries for the whole people of Paris. I say that I speak to all the people of Paris; and if they were actually assembled under this roof, if they heard me plead their cause against Buzot and Barbaroux, there is no question they would range themselves on my side.

Citizens, the dangers are exaggerated; we are scared with foreign armies joined to the rebels of the interior: but what can their efforts avail against millions of intrepid sans-culottes? And, if you pursue the inquiry, as one free man is equal to a hundred slaves, you ought to estimate your strength as superior to all the allied powers.

You possess in the laws all that is necessary to enable you legally to put down your enemies. You have aristocrats in the sections: expel them. You have liberty to save: proclaim the rights of liberty, and put forth all your energy. You have an immense population of sans-culottes, most pure and vigorous, but they cannot quit their labours: let them be supported by the rich. You have a National Convention; it is very possible that all the members of that convention are not equally friends of liberty and equality, but the greater number are determined to uphold the rights of the people and save the republic. The gangrened portion of the convention will not prevent the people from combating the aristocrats. Do you imagine, in fact, that the Mountain of the convention will lack sufficient force to curb all the partisans of Dumouriez, Orleans, and Cobourg? In sooth, you cannot believe it.

If liberty succumb, it will be less the fault of the delegates than of the sovereign. People, forget not that your destiny is in your own hands; your duty is to save Paris and humanity; if you fail in doing so, you are culpable.

The Mountain has need of the people; the people are upheld by the Mountain. All possible expedients are resorted to for alarming you; constant endeavours are made to impress you with the belief that the southern departments are the enemies of the Jacobins. I declare to you that Marseilles is the eternal friend of the Mountain, and at Lyons the patriots have gained a complete victory.

I now sum up and move—1st, That the sections raise an army sufficient to form the nucleus of a revolutionary army to gather in its course all the sans-culottes of the departments, in order to exterminate the rebels; 2d, That an army of sans-culottes be raised at Paris to keep the aristocrats in check; 3d, That dangerous intriguers, all aristocrats, shall be put under arrest; that the sans-culottes shall be paid at the charge of the public exchequer, which shall be sustained by the rich, and that this measure be extended over the whole republic.

I move that forges be established on all the public places.

I demand that the commune of Paris foster with all its power the revolutionary zeal of the people of Paris.

I demand that the revolutionary tribunal do its duty, and punish those who, during these latter days, have blasphemed against the republic.

I demand that this tribunal delay not to inflict exemplary chastisement upon certain generals taken in flagrant crime, and who ought to be brought to trial.

I demand that the sections of Paris unite with the commune of Paris, and counteract by their joint influence the perfidious writings of journalists subsidised by foreign potentates.

By pursuing all these measures, without furnishing any pretext for the charge that you have violated the laws, you will give an impulse to the departments, which will coalesce with you to save liberty."

SITTING OF SUNDAY 12TH MAY 1793.

Robespierre.—"I have never been able to comprehend how it happens that, in critical moments, so many men are found to make propositions which compromise the friends of liberty, whilst no one supports those which tend to save the republic. Until it has been proved to me that it is not necessary to arm the sans-culottes, that it is not advisable to pay them for mounting guard and assuring the tranquillity of Paris; until it has been proved to me that it is not advisable to convert our thoroughfares into workshops for the fabrication of arms, I will uphold and assert that those who, thrusting those measures aside, propose to you more partial measures, howsoever violent they may be, understand nothing of the means of saving the country; for it is only which promised to impart to the revolution the most sure and rapid progress. Master of the Cordeliers and the committee of six, it may be fairly presumed he took an influential part in the movement under preparation; and it would seem his main and primary design was to annul the commission of twelve, reserving for after consideration the course to be pursued with regard to the Girondists.

At length the scheme of insurrection was settled in the minds of the plotters at the central revolutionary club. According to their own expressions, they designed to make, not a physical, but an entirely moral insurrection; to respect persons and property; in short, to violate the laws and the liberty of the convention with the greatest order. Their plan was to constitute the commune in a state of insurrection; to summon in its name all the armed force which it had the privilege of calling out; to surround the convention, and then present to it an address, which in appearance would be simply a petition, but in reality an imperious command. In fact, they proposed to beg sword in hand.

On Thursday the 30th the delegates of the sections assembled at the Evêché, and formed what they called the Republican Union. Invested with full powers from all the sections, they declared themselves in insurrection for the safety of the commonwealth, menaced by an aristocratic and liberty-oppressing faction. The mayor, adhering to his usual policy, ventured certain expostulations upon the tendency of the resolution, offered to its adoption a faint opposition, and eventually succumbed to the insurgents, who ordered him to repair to the commune and announce the decision they had just taken. It was afterwards determined that the forty-eight sections should be assembled in the course of the day, to express their sentiments on the insurrection, and that immediately thereafter the tocsin should be rung, the barriers closed, and the tattoo beaten in all the streets. The sections were accordingly collected, and the day passed in gathering their stormy sanction of the insurrection. The committee of public welfare, and the commission of twelve, called the authorities before them to obtain information. The mayor communicated, with apparent regret, the plan fixed at the Evêché. L'Huillier, procurator-syndic of the department, avowed openly and with calm assurance the scheme of an insurrection purely moral, and then placidly withdrew to his colleagues.

Thus the hours of daylight were consumed, and as soon as darkness began to overshadow the city, the tattoo reverberated through all the streets, the barriers were shut, the tocsin rang with its ominous knell, and the terrified citizens asked themselves whether fresh massacres were about to drench the capital in blood. All the deputies of the Gironde, and the threatened ministers, passed the night out of their own dwellings. Roland concealed himself in the house of a friend; Buzot, Louvet, Barbaroux, Guadet, Bergoing, and Rabaut Saint-Etienne, barricaded themselves within a secluded apartment, well provided with arms, and ready, in case of an attack, to defend their lives to the last gasp. At five in the morning they left their retreat for the convention, where, under favour of the breaking day, several members, summoned by the tocsin, had earlier assembled. Their arms, hanging visibly to the eye, secured them from molestation on the part of the various groups they traversed, and they reached the convention in safety, finding several Mountaineers already in their places, and Danton engaged in conversation with Garat. "See," said Louvet to Guadet, "what a horrible hope sparkles on those countenances!" "Yes," replied Guadet, "it is to-day that Clodius exiles Cicero." And Garat, apparently surprised to meet Danton so early at the after exhausting all the measures which do not compromise the society, that recourse ought to be had to extreme measures, which measures, again, ought not to be proposed within a society claiming to be wise and enlightened. It is not a moment of transitory effervescence that can save the country. We have for enemies the most dexterous and subtle of men, who have at their disposal all the treasures of the state.

The measures that have been proposed have had and can have no result; they have served only to foster calumny, to furnish pretexts for journalists to represent us under the most odious colours.

When men neglect the first means that reason points out, and without which the public welfare cannot be accomplished, it is evident they are not in the right path. I will say no more; but I declare that I protest against all means which tend only to compromise the club without advancing the public welfare. Such is my profession of faith: the people will always be in a condition to eradicate aristocracy; it is merely requisite that the club should avoid gross blunders.

When I see men uselessly striving to make enemies to the society, and encouraging the miscreants who desire its destruction, I am tempted to believe they are either blind or ill-intentioned.

I propose that the society adhere to the measures I suggested, and I look upon all as in the highest degree culpable who do not aid their execution. How can such measures be objected to? How can their necessity be unappreciated? And if it be appreciated, how hesitate to support them and ensure their adoption? I propose to the society to hear a discussion upon the principles of the constitution preparing for France; for it behoves us to embrace all the plans of our enemies. If the society can unmask the machiavelism of its foes, it will not have lost time. I therefore move that, discarding the unsuitable propositions, the club permits me to read to it my thoughts on the constitution."

SITTING OF SUNDAY 26TH MAY 1793.

Robespierre.—"I told you that the people ought to rest upon their might; but when the people are oppressed, when no resource is left them but themselves, he would be a poltroon who did not advise them to rise. It is when all the laws are violated, when despotism is at its climax, when good faith and decency are trodden under foot, that the people are called into insurrection. That moment is arrived; our enemies openly oppress the patriots; they are labouring, in the name of the law, to replunge the people into misery and slavery. I will never be the friend of those corrupt men, whatever treasures they may offer me. I prefer to die with republicans rather than triumph with miscreants. (Applause.)

I am acquainted with but two modes of existence for a nation; either it governs itself or confides that care to its mandatories. We, the republican deputies, wish to establish the government of the people through their delegates, with responsibility; it is upon these principles that our opinions are based, but most frequently we claim in vain to be heard. A rapid signal, given by the president, deprives us of the right of suffrage. I hold that the sovereignty of the people is violated, when their mandatories give to their own creatures the offices belonging to the people. According to these principles, I am grievously concerned" ——

(The speaker is interrupted by the announcement of a deputation—tumult.) "I continue my speech," exclaimed Robespierre, "not for those who interrupt me, but for the republicans.

I exhort every citizen to be steadfast in the feeling of his right, I admonish him to rely on his own strength and on that of the whole nation; I invite the people to put themselves in insurrection, in the National Convention, against all the corrupt deputies. (Applause.) I declare, that having received from the people the privilege of defending their rights, I regard as my oppressor him who interrupts me or refuses me a hearing; and I declare, that I myself, alone, will put myself in insurrection against the president, and against all the members who sit in the convention. (Applause.) When a criminal scorn is affected for the sans-culottes, I declare that I put myself in insurrection against the corrupt deputies. I invite all the Mountaineer deputies to rally and oppose the aristocracy; and I say there is for them but one alternative, either to resist with all their strength, with all their power, the efforts of intrigue, or to give in their resignations.

It is necessary, at the same time, that the French people understand their rights; for the faithful deputies can effect nothing without liberty of speech.

If treachery call the foreign enemies into the heart of France; if, when our artillerymen hold in their hands the thunder which ought to scatter the tyrants and their satellites, we see the enemy approach our walls, then I declare I will myself chastise the traitors; and I give warning I shall consider every conspirator as my personal enemy, and treat him as such." (Loud cheers.)

assembly, stood observing him with attention. "Why all this noise?" he asked; "what do they want?" "It will be nothing," answered Danton, coolly; "they must be allowed to break a few presses, and then sent home." Twenty-eight deputies were present. Fermont occupied the chair for the moment, and Guadet boldly seated himself as secretary. The number of deputies gradually increased, and the opening of the sitting was impatiently awaited.

During this interval, the insurrection was consummated at the commune. The members of the central revolutionary committee, having at their head the president Dobsen, presented themselves at the town-hall, furnished with full revolutionary powers. Dobsen advanced, and made known to the council-general that the people of Paris, assailed in their rights, appeared there to abrogate all the constituted authorities. The vice-president of the council requested to know the powers of the committee. He examined them, and finding them to contain resolutions adopted by thirty-three sections, he declared that the majority of the sections annulled the constituted authorities. In consequence, the council-general and its officers retired. Dobsen and the delegates took the vacant places, amidst shouts of "Long live the republic!" He forthwith addressed the new assembly, and proposed to reinstate the municipality and council-general in their functions, inasmuch as both the one and the other had always discharged their duties towards the people. The motion met with a favourable reception, and the former municipality, together with the former council-general, was speedily reinstalled amid boisterous applause. These pretended formalities were simply designed to renovate the municipal powers, or in other words, to render them illimitable, and sufficient for the exigencies of insurrection. The next step was to nominate a new provisional commander-in-chief; and the choice fell upon Henriot, a brutal personage, but devoted to the commune, and already commander of the battalion of sans-culottes. In order to ensure the aid of the populace, and keep them under arms during the period of commotion, a resolution was passed that forty sous a-day should be allowed to all poor citizens on service, which forty sous should be immediately taken from the produce of the forced loan, in effect, from the rich. This was a certain mode of calling to the aid of the commune, and rousing against the bourgeoisie of the sections, all the workmen who preferred gaining forty sous by participating in revolutionary movements, to earning thirty by attending to their accustomed labours.

Whilst these proceedings passed at the commune, the citizens of the capital poured forth at the sound of the tocsin, and gathered in arms around the banner planted at the door of each captain of a section. Many were uncertain as to the light in which they ought to view the intended movement, and several were even ignorant of the measures taken in the sections and the commune during the previous evening, and asked with surprise the reason they were called out. But in this state of mind they were unfit to act of themselves or oppose what might be done contrary to their feelings; and thus they were made, although disapproving of the insurrection, to aid it by their presence. Upwards of 80,000 men under arms traversed Paris in the greatest quietness, and permitted themselves to be led with perfect docility by the audacious authority which had usurped the command. The sections Butte-des-Moulins, Mail, and Champs-Elysées, alone, having long before declared against the commune and the Mountain, and being somewhat encouraged by the energy of the Girondists, in whose dangers they shared, were prepared to resist. They had assembled in arms, and awaited events in the attitude of men threatened, and ready to defend themselves. The Jacobins, the sans-culottes, alarmed at these dispositions, and exaggerating them in their terror, rushed through the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, vociferating that these malecontent sections were about to mount the white cockade, and that the patriots were required in the centre of Paris to crush an outbreak of the royalists. The better to stimulate a general agitation, it had been determined to fire the alarm-gun. That piece was planted on the Pont-Neuf, and the penalty of death was adjudged against him who should rashly discharge it without a decree of the convention. Henriot had issued orders to fire it, but the captain of the post had refused obedience, and insisted upon a decree. But the messengers from Henriot had returned in force, overcome the opposition of the post, and at this moment the roar of the alarm-gun was added to the din of the tocsin and tattoo.

The convention, partially assembled since the dawn, as we have seen, had immediately upon its formation summoned all the authorities before it to report on the situation of Paris. Garat, present in the hall, and absorbed in scanning Danton, first appeared at the tribune, and related what every one knew, to wit, that an assembly had been held at the Evêché, which demanded reparation for the injuries heaped upon Paris, and the abolition of the commission of twelve. Garat had scarcely ceased speaking when the members of the new institution, describing themselves as "The administration of the department of the Seine," appeared at the bar, and declared that the affair in progress was simply an insurrection purely moral, having for its object to vindicate the city of Paris from the calumnies propagated against it. They added, that the most exemplary order was observed; that each citizen had sworn to respect persons and property; that the armed sections traversed the town in peace and quietness; and that all the united authorities would come during the day to announce their profession of faith and their demands to the convention.

The president Mallarmé then communicated a letter from the captain of the post on the Pont-Neuf, detailing the contest that had occurred on the seizure of the alarm-gun. Dufriche-Valazé thereupon moved that an inquiry be instituted as to the original movers of the commotion, that the persons guilty of sounding the tocsin be sought out, and that an order of arrest be issued against the commander-in-chief, for his audacity in firing the alarm-gun without a decree of the convention. At this motion, the galleries and the left side raised the boisterous shouts it was but natural to expect. Valazé was not discouraged: he said they would not lead him to forfeit his character; that he was the representative of twenty-five millions of men, and that he would fearlessly discharge his duty to the end. He concluded by proposing that the assembly should forthwith grant a hearing to the so much reviled commission of twelve, and give heed to its report, for the occurrences then passing were a sufficient proof of the plots it had incessantly denounced. Thuriot rose to answer Valazé, whereupon the bitter feelings hitherto suppressed burst forth, and the storm began to rage. Mathieu and Cambon attempted to interfere as mediators; they exhorted the galleries to silence, the orators of the right side to moderation, and all parties to the reflection that at this critical moment a contest in the capital would be fatal to the cause of the revolution; and they moreover admonished the convention that tranquillity was the only mode of maintaining its dignity, and that dignity again was its only instrument to enforce respect from the ill-disposed. Vergniaud, inclined like Mathieu and Cambon to employ conciliatory means, said that he likewise viewed as fatal to liberty and the revolution the impending contest; he consequently refrained from reproaching Thuriot, save gently, for having augmented the danger of the commission of twelve, by describing it as the pest of France, at a period when all the popular passions were roused against it. He held it ought to be dissolved if it had committed arbitrary acts, but allowed a hearing in the first place; and as its report would inevitably be of a nature to excite animosities, he proposed that both its perusal and the discussion consequent thereupon should be postponed to a less irritable moment. That was, as he insisted, the only way to maintain the dignity of the assembly, and demonstrate its freedom. Its immediate object ought to be, above all things, to ascertain who had given orders to ring the tocsin and fire the alarm-gun, which necessarily implied the obligation to call the provisional commander-in-chief to the bar. "I repeat to you," exclaimed Vergniaud, in conclusion, "that whatever may be the issue of the combat which threatens this day to be fought, it will lead to the loss of liberty; let us therefore swear to remain steadfast to our duty, and all die at our post rather than abandon the commonwealth."

The members instantly rose with acclamations, and took the oath proposed by Vergniaud. The debate then turned upon the motion to summon the commander-in-chief to the bar. Danton, upon whom all eyes were fixed at this moment, both Girondists and Mountaineers seeming to ask him whether he were indeed the author of the day's events, appeared in the tribune, and immediately obtained profound attention. "The act of primary importance," said he, "is to suppress the commission of twelve. This is of infinitely greater consequence than ordering the commander-in-chief to the bar. I speak to men gifted with certain political endowments. To summon Henriot will have no effect on the state of things; for it is not the instrument but the cause of the troubles it behoves you to deal with. Now, the cause is this commission of twelve. I do not pretend to judge its conduct or its acts: it is not as having ordered arbitrary arrests that I attack it; I ask you to suppress it as unpolitical."

"Unpolitical!" cried the right side; "we do not understand that."

"You do not understand the expression?" resumed Danton; "it must be explained to you, then. This commission was instituted merely to repress the popular energy; it was conceived only in that spirit of moderatism which will ruin the revolution and France. It has applied itself to assailing energetic magistrates, whose only fault was stimulating the ardour of the people. I also refrain from considering whether it has yielded to personal antipathies in its attacks; but this is certain, it has exhibited dispositions which it is incumbent on us to condemn. You yourselves, upon the report of your minister of the interior, whose character is so mild, his judgment so impartial and enlightened, have liberated men whom the commission of twelve had confined. What, then, is your opinion of the commission itself, since you abrogate its acts? The cannon has sounded, the people have arisen; but we ought to thank the people for their energy, in the name of that very cause we defend; and, if you be political legislators, you will yourselves applaud their ardour, reform your own errors, and abolish your commission. I address myself, I repeat, only to those men who have some comprehension of our situation, and not to those stupid beings who, in such great movements, listen only to the dictates of their passions. Hesitate not, therefore, to satisfy this people" —— "What people?" asked voices on the right. "That people," answered Danton—"that immense population, which is our advanced sentinel, which abhors tyranny and the base moderatism which would recall it. Hasten to satisfy it, rescue it from the aristocrats, save it from its own wrath; and if, when it shall be satisfied, perverse men, no matter to what party they belong, attempt to prolong a movement become unnecessary, Paris itself will bray them into nonentity."

Rabaut Saint-Etienne appeared to justify the commission of twelve in its political character, and proceeded to argue that it was strictly with political views a commission was organised to discover the plots of Pitt and Austria, who instigated with gold all the disorders in France. "Down!" shouted numberless voices; "take the word from Rabaut!" "No," exclaimed Bazire, "leave it him, for he is a liar; I will prove that his commission has organised the civil war in Paris." Rabaut strove to resume. Marat moved that a deputation from the commune be introduced. "Let me finish first," urged Rabaut. "The commune! the commune! the commune!" vociferated the possessors of the galleries and the Mountain. "I aver," said Rabaut, in the intervals of the din, "that when I wished to declare the truth, you interrupted me." "Well, conclude then!" Rabaut accordingly brought his speech to a conclusion, by moving that the commission be suppressed, if it were so determined, but that the committee of public welfare be immediately charged to prosecute all the inquiries it had initiated.

A deputation from the insurrectional committee was then introduced. "A grand conspiracy has been formed," it said, "but it is discovered. The people who arose on the 14th July and 10th August to overthrow tyranny, have arisen again to arrest the counter-revolution. The council-general sends us to make known to you the measures it has taken. The first was to place property under the safeguard of the republicans; the second to give forty sous a-day to the republicans who remain under arms; the third to form a committee for correspondence with the convention during this period of agitation. The council-general begs you to assign a room near your hall to this committee, where it may sit and concert with you."

Scarcely had the deputation ceased to speak, ere Guadet appeared in the tribune to answer it. He was not the fittest of the Girondists to calm the passions of their adversaries. "The commune," said he, "when pretending that it has discovered a conspiracy, has erred simply in a word, meaning that it has executed one." The shouts of the galleries interrupted him. Vergniaud rose with indignation, and moved that they be cleared. The tumult that ensued is not to be designated; for a length of time nothing but a confused roar of sounds was heard. The president Mallarmé repeated, but in vain, that if the convention were not respected, he would put in force the authority vested in him by the law. Guadet continued to occupy the tribune, and occasionally succeeded in pitching a phrase above the uproar in its intervals of reflux. He moved, in substance, that the convention should intermit its deliberations until its liberty were assured; and that the commission of twelve should be instructed to proceed without delay against those who had rung the tocsin and fired the alarm-gun. Such a proposition was not calculated to allay the tumult. Vergniaud was about to reappear in the tribune to restore some degree of tranquillity, when a fresh deputation from the municipality came to reiterate the demands already urged. The convention, thus inexorably pressed, could hold out no longer, and decreed that the working men required to watch over the maintenance of public order and the safety of property should receive forty sous a-day, and that a room should be assigned to the commissioners of the Paris authorities to deliberate in concert with the committee of public welfare.

After this decree was passed, Couthon undertook to answer Guadet, and the day, now pretty far advanced, was wasted in discussions without result. The entire population of Paris, assembled together in arms, continued to march through the city without the slightest infringement of order, and in the same uncertainty as to purpose. The commune occupied itself in drawing up renewed addresses relative to the commission of twelve, and that unfortunate commission was still the unceasing object of contention in the national assembly. Vergniaud, who had quitted the hall for a moment, and witnessed the singular spectacle of an immense population undecided what part to take, and blindly obeying the first authority assumed over it, deemed that advantage might be drawn from these dispositions, and accordingly submitted a motion designed to establish a distinction between the agitators and the Parisian people, and to conciliate the latter by a testimony of confidence. "I am far from accusing the majority or the minority of the inhabitants of Paris," said he to the assembly; "this day will show how Paris loves liberty. It is sufficient to walk the streets, to witness the order observed in them, and the numerous patrols moving in all directions; it is sufficient, I repeat, to behold this glorious spectacle, to induce a decree that Paris has deserved well of the country!"

At these words, the whole convention arose, and voted by acclamation that Paris had deserved well of the country. The Mountain and the galleries vehemently applauded, greatly surprised to hear such a proposition fall from the lips of Vergniaud. The manœuvre itself was doubtless very dexterous, but it was not by a flattering testimonial that the Girondists could expect to arouse the zeal of the sections, rally those that were inimical to the commune, and impart to them the courage and the union necessary to oppose the insurrection successfully.

During this interval, the section of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, instigated by the emissaries who had traversed it with the cry that the section Butte-des-Moulins had mounted the white cockade, had penetrated to the centre of Paris with cannon, and halted a few paces from the Palais-Royal, where the Butte-des-Moulins had intrenched itself. The latter had drawn up in battle array in the garden, closed all the wickets, and, guarded by its cannon, stood ready to maintain a siege in case of an assault. Outside the enclosure the report was still industriously circulated that it had assumed the white cockade and banner, and every art was used to excite the section Saint-Antoine to attack it. But certain officers of the latter represented that, before proceeding to extremities, it was but proper to be assured of the facts, and to attempt a parley. They accordingly presented themselves at the wickets, and requested to speak with the officers of the Butte-des-Moulins. These willingly admitted them, and throughout the garden they perceived none but the national colours. Then mutual explanations were given, speedily followed by a general embrace. The officers returned to their battalions, and in a short time the two sections were intermingled and parading together the streets of Paris.

Thus submission became more and more general, and the new commune was left at leisure to pursue its strife with the convention. In the mean time, Barrère, ever prone to suggest medium projects, submitted a motion, in the name of the committee of public welfare, to abolish the commission of twelve, but, at the same time, to place the armed force at the disposition of the convention. Whilst he was developing his scheme, a fresh deputation arrived, the third during the day, to express its final resolves to the national assembly, speaking as the organ of the department, the commune, and the delegates of the sections, congregated in an extraordinary meeting at the Evêché.

The procurator-syndic of the department, L'Huillier, took the lead. "Legislators," said he, "for a length of time the city and department of Paris have been calumniated before the whole universe. The same men who have laboured to destroy Paris in public estimation instigate the massacres of La Vendée; it is they who flatter and uphold the hopes of our enemies; it is they who degrade the constituted authorities, and strive to mislead the people in order to gain a pretext for complaining of them; it is they who denounce to you imaginary plots in order to promote real ones; it is they who have sought from you the committee of twelve in order to crush the liberty of the people; it is they, in fine, who, by a criminal agitation, by surreptitious addresses, by active correspondence, inflame animosities and divisions in your assembly, and rob the country of the greatest of all blessings, a good constitution, which it has merited by such inordinate sacrifices."

After this vehement apostrophe, L'Huillier proceeded to denounce schemes of federalism, declaring that Paris was prepared to perish in behalf of the republican unity, and claiming expiation for the celebrated phrase of Isnard—"Paris shall be erased from the list of cities."

"Legislators!" he exclaimed, "the project of destroying Paris is actually formed! Will you then allow this sacred repository of the arts and of human intelligence to be swept away?" These affected lamentations over, he demanded vengeance upon Isnard, the ill-fated twelve, and several other criminals, such as Brissot, Guadet, Vergniaud, Gensonné, Buzot, Barbaroux, Roland, Lebrun, Clavière, &c.

The right side preserved a mournful stillness. The left side and the tribunes applauded with fury. The president Grégoire replied to L'Huillier by emphatic eulogies on the city of Paris, and invited the deputation to the honours of the sitting. The persons composing it were blended with a multitude of other individuals, the more froward of the rabble. Too many to find space at the bar, they pressed onwards in the direction of the Mountain, which eagerly welcomed them to its ranks. Then was a strange incongruous host scattered through the hall, and undistinguishably commingled with the deputies. The galleries rent the air with joyful acclamations at this spectacle of fraternity between the representatives and the people. Osselin forthwith moved that the petition be printed, and its conclusions, digested into the form of an edict by Barrère, be now decided upon.

"President," exclaimed Vergniaud, "put the question to the assembly whether it will legislate in its present state." "The project of Barrère to the vote!" shouted the left. "We protest against all determination," retorted the right. "The convention is not free," said Doulcet. "If so," replied Levasseur, "let the members of the left side pass over to the right, and then the convention will be distinct from the petitioners, and can pronounce its decision." Upon this suggestion the Mountain hastily crossed the floor, and for a time the two antagonist sides were mingled together, and the benches of the Mountain exclusively occupied by the petitioners. The question upon the printing of the address was thereupon put to the vote and declared to be carried. "The project of Barrère to the vote!" again cried the rejoicing Mountain. "We are not free," responded several voices in the assembly. "I move," said Vergniaud, with impassioned action, "that the convention join the armed force which surrounds it, to seek protection from the violence assailing it." Upon delivering these words, he moved to the door, followed by a great number of his friends. The Mountain and the galleries greeted the secession of the right side with ironical cheers; the Plain sat undecided and terror-struck. "I move," said Chabot, "that the assembly be called over, in order that the names of those who desert their post may be marked." At this moment, Vergniaud and those who had accompanied him returned with an air of dejection, and as if utterly overwhelmed; for, in fact, the step they had taken, which might have been noble and impressive if generally adopted, became pitiful and ridiculous in the reverse alternative. Vergniaud claimed to speak, but Robespierre refused to yield him the tribune, of which he was in possession. Retaining his advantage, he (Robespierre) vehemently urged prompt and energetic measures to satisfy the people; and demanded that not only should the commission of twelve be suppressed, but severe measures taken against its members. He subsequently expatiated at great length upon the terms of Barrère's project, and opposed the clause which assigned the disposal of the armed force to the convention. "Conclude," said Vergniaud, impatiently. "Yes," retorted Robespierre, "I am about to conclude, and against you!—against you, who, after the revolution of the 10th August, would have consigned to the scaffold those who had accomplished it!—against you, who have never ceased to provoke the destruction of Paris!—against you, who would have saved the tyrant!—against you, who conspired with Dumouriez! My conclusion is a decree of impeachment against all the accomplices of Dumouriez, and also against those designated by the petitioners."

After long and boisterous cheering, a decree was drawn up, put to the vote, and adopted amidst a tumult sufficiently bewildering to remove the possibility of judging whether or not the adequate number of deputies were present. It imported that the commission of twelve was suppressed; that its papers should be seized and made the subject of a report within three days; that the armed force was in permanent requisition; that the constituted authorities should render an account to the convention of the measures taken to ensure public tranquillity; that the denounced conspiracies should be diligently pursued, and a proclamation issued to give France a correct idea of this day, which the malignant would doubtless seek to misrepresent.

It was now ten o'clock, and the Jacobins and the commune had begun to complain that the day was elapsing without any beneficial result. But this decree, although it decided nothing as to the persons of the Girondists, was a first success which elicited infinite gladness, and for which the oppressed convention itself was forced to evince a reluctant thankfulness. The commune ordered the whole city to be illuminated; a civic procession was formed to the glare of flambeaux; the sections walked in confused harmony, the Faubourg Saint-Antoine blended with the Buttedes-Moulins and the Mail. Several deputies of the Mountain and the president were compelled to take part in the procession; the conquerors coerced the vanquished themselves to celebrate their victory.

The character of the day was sufficiently obvious. The insurgents had pretended to adhere to formalities in all their proceedings. They hesitated to break up the convention, but wrung from it all they required, whilst they preserved towards it an appearance of respect. The pusillanimous members of the Plain willingly lent themselves to a deception which allowed them to assume they were yet free even when abjectly obeying. Thus they had abolished the commission of twelve, and deferred the examination of its conduct for three days, so as to avoid the imputation of an absolute surrender. They had not assigned to the convention the disposal of the armed force, but ordained an account of all measures adopted to be duly rendered, in order again to keep up the pretence of supremacy. Lastly, they commanded a proclamation, to promulgate officially that the convention was not influenced by fear, but had acted with perfect freedom.

The following day, Barrère was charged to frame this proclamation, and he travestied the events of the 31st May with that rare dexterity, which always recommended him when it was needful to provide the weak with a specious pretext for yielding to the strong. Certain measures of too rigorous a tendency, he said, had excited discontent; the people had arisen with energy, but with calmness, had appeared throughout the day apparelled in arms, had proclaimed the sanctity of property, had respected the liberty of the convention and the personal safety of each of its members, and had demanded a redress which the national representation was eager and happy to grant. It was thus Barrère expressed himself on the abolition of that committee of twelve whereof he was himself the author.

Tranquillity was far from being re-established on the 1st of June. The association at the Evêché continued its deliberations; the department and the commune, still extraordinarily constituted, were in permanence; the commotion had not subsided in the sections; and on all sides it was clamoured that but the half of the essential good had been obtained, since the twenty-two proscribed deputies yet sat in the convention. Paris, therefore, still remained the theatre of violent agitation, and a fresh outbreak was too surely anticipated for Sunday the 2d of June.

All positive and physical power was centred in the insurrectional association of the Evêché, and the legal power in the committee of public welfare, to which had been delegated all the paramount authority of the convention. A room had been appropriated during the storm of the 31st, to which the constituted authorities might resort to hold communication with that committee. The whole of the 1st of June was devoted by the committee to examining members of the insurrectional association, in order to ascertain definitely what was still desired by the insurgent commune. Its real wish was but too manifest, pointing undisguisedly to the arrest or expulsion of the deputies who had so courageously resisted its violent encroachments. This design occasioned deep inquietude to all the members of the committee, though affecting them variously. Delmas, Treilhard, and Bréard, were sincerely grieved at such a project. Cambon, a great partisan, as he himself always boasted, of revolutionary power, but scrupulously attached to the cause of legality, was indignant at the effrontery of the commune, and said to Bouchotte, the successor of Beurnonville, who, treading in the footsteps of Pache, bowed submissively to the Jacobins—"Minister of war, we are not blind; I see very plainly that persons holding office in your department are amongst the leaders and instigators of all this." Barrère also, despite his accustomed caution, began to express the dissatisfaction he could not avoid feeling. "We must see," he often repeated during that mournful day, "whether it be the commune of Paris that represents the French republic, or the convention." The Jacobin Lacroix, the friend and instrument of Danton, appeared embarrassed in presence of his colleagues at the outrage in perspective against the laws and the national representation. Danton himself, who had not exceeded an approval of, grounded on a strong desire for, the abolition of the commission of twelve, originating in his abhorrence, all-powerful with him, of every thing which fettered popular energy, would have wished that the national representation should be respected; but he foresaw on the part of the Girondists fresh assaults and a renewed opposition to the progress of the revolution, and he would have willingly devised some expedient for removing without proscribing them. Garat offered him a suggestion, which he seized upon with avidity.

All the ministers were in attendance upon the committee, and Garat, of course, with his colleagues. Pensively brooding over the position in which the chiefs of the revolution stood with regard to each other, his mind was struck with a noble conception, fitted to restore harmony.

"Recall to your recollection," said he to the members of the committee, and addressing himself particularly to Danton, "the quarrels of Themistocles and Aristides; the obstinacy of the one in repudiating whatever the other proposed, and the dangers they thereby caused their common country to incur. Remember the generosity of Aristides, who, painfully convinced of the evils they both occasioned to their country, had the magnanimity to exclaim—'Athenians, you never can be tranquil and happy until you have thrown Themistocles and me into the Barathrum!'* Let the leaders on both sides of the assembly repeat the words of Aristides, and voluntarily exile themselves in equal numbers from its sanctuary. From that moment discord will cease; sufficient ability will remain in the assembly to save the commonwealth, and in their sublime ostracism, the country will bless the men who have descended into obscurity to ensure its pacification."

All the members of the committee were moved at this generous idea. Delmas, Barrère, the ardent Cambon, were enchanted with the project. Danton, who would be of course the first sacrifice, rose, with tears in his eyes, and said to Garat, "You are right: I will go to the convention, and propose this plan. I will offer myself as the first hostage to Bordeaux." They separated, full of this brilliant conception, for the purpose of communicating it to the leaders of the two parties. They addressed themselves particularly to Robespierre, in whose eyes such a self-denial could scarcely find favour, and who in fact replied that it was a mere snare to induce the Mountain to discard its most courageous defenders. Consequently, but one portion of the project remained feasible, namely, the voluntary retirement of the Girondists, since the Mountaineers refused their concurrence. Barrère was selected as the organ through whom the committee of public welfare thought fit to propose a sacrifice to the one party, which the other had not the generosity to accept. He accordingly composed a formal scheme for submission to the twenty-two deputies and the members of the commission of twelve, to voluntarily divest themselves of their functions.

In the mean time, the plan of the second insurrection was definitively settled at the association of the Evêché. It was a subject of complaint there, as at the Jacobin Club, that the energy of Danton had relaxed since the abolition of the committee of twelve. Marat urged a demand upon the convention for the impeachment of the twenty-two, and its exaction by force, if necessary. A petition, brief and pithy in its terms, was accordingly drawn up for that object. The scheme of the insurrection was planned, not in the association at large, but in the committee of execution, charged with what was called the means of public welfare, and composed of Varlet, Dobsen, Gusman, and all those who had been engaged in a constant course of agitation since the 21st January. This committee determined to surround the convention with the armed force, and confine the deputies in the hall until they passed the required decree. For this purpose, it was judged expedient to order back the battalions destined for La Vendée, which had been designedly retained, under different pretexts, in the barracks of Courbevoie. These battalions, and some others of undoubted pliancy, were expected to be less scrupulous than the guards of the sections might possibly prove. By encompassing the national palace with these devoted men, and maintaining, as on the 31st May, the remainder of the armed force in docility and ignorance, the resistance of the convention would, it was considered, be easily overcome. Henriot was again selected to command the troops around the national palace.

Such was the exploit these insurgents promised themselves for the next day, Sunday the 2d June; but in the evening of Saturday, a sudden thought came upon them to try whether a last appeal would not suffice; to make, in short, a repetition of their demands. Forthwith, orders were issued to beat the tattoo and ring the tocsin, and the committee of public welfare hastily summoned the convention to assemble amidst this new tempest.

At this moment, the Girondists were dining together, for the purpose of holding a consultation upon the line of conduct still open to them. It was obvious to their eyes that the impending insurrection could not be designed merely to break presses, as Danton had said, or to suppress a hateful commission, but that their persons were its sole and definite aim. Certain of them gave their counsel for remaining steadfast at their posts, and dying on the curule chair, vindicating to the last the character with which their countrymen had invested them. Pétion, Buzot, and Gensonné, inclined towards this grave and magnanimous resolution. Barbaroux, regardless of consequences, yielding only to the inspirations of his heroic mind, declared for braving the enemy with a valiant defiance. Others, again, and Louvet was the warmest in supporting this latter opinion, proposed at once to abandon the convention, where they could effect nothing more of an advantageous nature, where the Plain had not sufficient courage to give them their suffrages, and where the Mountain and the galleries were determined to drown their voices by obstreperous howls. These desired to withdraw into their departments, foment the insurrection almost on the point of explosion, and return in force to Paris, to avenge the insulted laws and national representation. Each enforced his own opinion, with the usual effect of promoting general irresolution. At length, the sound of the tocsin and the tattoo obliged the unfortunate guests to rise from table, and seek an asylum before arriving at a determination. They repaired to the house of a colleague, less compromised than the other Girondists, and not inscribed on the famous list of the twenty-two, Meilhan, who had already sheltered them, and who occupied a spacious residence in the Street des Moulins, in which they could assemble under arms. Thither, then, they proceeded in all haste, excepting some who had other means of concealing themselves.

The convention had met under the knell of the tocsin. Very few members were present; the benches on the right side were vacant. Lanjuinais alone, resolute to brave all dangers, had come to denounce a plot, the revelation whereof was information to none. After a stormy and brief debate, the convention answered the petitioners of the Evêché, that, considering the decree which enjoined the committee of public welfare to present a report upon the twenty-two, it was debarred from deciding on the new demand of the commune. The assembly broke up in disorder, and the insurgents deferred till the following morning the definitive execution of their scheme.

The tattoo and the tocsin reverberated throughout the night, from Saturday to Sunday morning the 2d June 1793. The alarm-gun emitted its startling roar, and the whole population of Paris rushed to arms at the break of day. Nearly eighty thousand men were drawn up around the convention, but at least sixty-five thousand took no part in the event, contenting themselves as spectators, and holding their weapons loosely on their arms. Devoted battalions of artillery-men were stationed around the national palace, under the immediate command of Henriot. They had one hundred and sixty-three pieces of ordnance, ammunition-waggons, apparatus for heating balls, lighted matches, and all the military display fitted to impose on the imagination. Before dawn, the battalions whose departure for La Vendée had been purposely retarded, were brought back into Paris, exasperated by the assurance, diligently inculcated upon them, that plots had just been discovered, the leaders of which were in the convention, and whose expulsion was indispensable to the national welfare. It is alleged that these assertions were fortified by assignats of a hundred sous. These battalions, thus gained over, marched from the Champs-Elysées to the Madeleine, from the Madeleine to the Boulevards, and thence to the Carrousel, prepared to execute whatever the conspirators might please to order them.

Thus the convention, actually hemmed in by but a few thousands of hairbrained ruffians, seemed besieged by eighty thousand men. But, although it were not really besieged, the danger it incurred was not the less, for the few thousands which pressed more closely upon it, were disposed to proceed to the last extremities against it.

The deputies of all parties were present at the sitting. The Mountain, the Plain, the right side, occupied their places. The proscribed deputies, of whom the majority remained at Meilhan's, where all had passed the night, were likewise anxious to appear at their posts. Buzot struggled violently to disengage himself from those who detained him, resolved to expire in the sanctuary of the convention; but they succeeded in restraining him. Barbaroux alone, successfully baffling all vigilance, repaired to the convention, to manifest a sublime heroism on that fatal day. The others were persuaded to remain in their asylum, and await the issue of these dismal portents.

The sitting of the convention opened, and Lanjuinais, determined upon a last effort to vindicate the respect due to the national representation—he whom neither galleries, nor Mountain, nor imminent peril could intimidate, was the first to claim a hearing. The most furious shouts followed his request. "I am here," said he, "to address you upon the means of checking the fresh commotions now threatening us!" "Down! down!" cried the Jacobins; "he wants to provoke a civil war!" "As long as it is permitted me," resumed Lanjuinais, "to raise my voice, I will not suffer the character of a representative of the people to be degraded in my person. Hitherto you have done nothing, but endured every outrage; you have sanctioned all that has been demanded from you. An insurrectional association is formed, it names a committee charged to prepare rebellion, and a provisional commander to command the rebels; and this association, this committee, this commander, you leave unquestioned!" Fearful yells interrupted every moment the words of Lanjuinais, and at length the rage he inspired became such that several deputies of the Mountain, Drouet, the younger Robespierre, Julien, Legendre, rose from their seats, rushed to the tribune, and endeavoured to drag him down. Lanjuinais resisted, and clung to its sides with all his might. Indescribable confusion prevailed in all parts of the hall, and the deafening vociferations of the galleries contributed to render the scene by far the most horrible that had yet been witnessed. The president put on his hat, and succeeded in making his voice be heard. "The scene that has occurred," said he, "is truly afflicting. Liberty will perish if you continue to conduct yourselves in such a manner. I call you to order, you who have thus assaulted the tribune."

Tranquillity was partially restored, and Lanjuinais, who disregarded the imputation of making chimerical propositions, when they involved fortitude and courage, moved that the revolutionary authorities of Paris be annulled, or, in other words, that those who were disarmed should inflict condign chastisement on those who held arms in their hands. He had scarcely propounded this motion, ere the petitioners on behalf of the commune presented themselves afresh. Their language was more terse and short than ever.

"The citizens of Paris have not laid down their arms for four days. For four days they have sought from their mandatories their rights, flagrantly violated, and for four days their mandatories have laughed at their calmness and inaction. It is indispensable that the conspirators be put under provisional arrest, that the people be immediately saved, or they will save themselves!"

When the petitioners had concluded, Billaud-Varennes and Tallien demanded a report upon this petition, forthwith and before separating. Other deputies, in great number, insisted upon the order of the day. Eventually, amidst the roar of tumult, the assembly, inspirited by the sense of danger, rose and voted the order of the day, on the ground that a report had been ordered from the committee of public welfare within three days. Upon this decision being pronounced, the petitioners issued forth, uttering shouts of indignation, gesticulating furious menaces, and half-displaying their concealed weapons. All the men in the galleries retired as if to execute some project, and the women alone remained in their seats. Soon a noise ensued outside, and cries of "To arms! to arms!" were heard. At this moment, several deputies laboured to impress upon the convention that the resolution it had just adopted was imprudent, and that it ought to terminate a dangerous crisis by granting what was demanded, and placing under provisional arrest the twenty-two accused deputies. "We will all go!" exclaimed Larévellière-Lepeaux—"all go to prison!" Cambon here announced that the committee of public welfare would make its report in half an hour. The report was enjoined within three days, but the danger, becoming more imminent with every moment that elapsed, had induced the committee to hasten its labours.

Barrère accordingly appeared in the tribune, and submitted the idea of Garat, which had so greatly struck the members of the committee yesterday; which Danton had embraced with ardour, but Robespierre repudiated; and which, as the reader is aware, consisted in a voluntary and mutual exile on the part of the leaders on both sides. Barrère, prevented from proposing it to the Mountaineers, now recommended it to the twenty-two. "The committee," said he, "has not had time to elucidate any fact or to hear a single witness; but, considering the political and moral state of the convention, it is of opinion that the voluntary suspension of the deputies particularised would produce the happiest effect, and save the republic from a fatal crisis, the issue of which is fearful to contemplate."

When Barrère ceased, Isnard presented himself in the tribune, and said that, so soon as an individual and the country were put in the balance, he could not hesitate, and that he not only renounced his functions, but his life, if it were needful. Lanthenas followed the example of Isnard, and gave up his seat. Fauchet tendered his resignation and his life to the republic. Lanjuinais, who held that no surrender should be made, ascended the tribune, and said, "I believe that, up to this moment, I have shown sufficient energy for you not to expect any suspension or resignation from me." At these words, angry exclamations broke from the assembly. He surveyed with an undaunted eye those that interrupted him. "The sacrificer of old," said he, "as he drew his victim to the altar, decorated it with flowers and garlands, and assuredly goaded it not. You ask the sacrifice of our powers, but sacrifices ought to be free, and we are not free. We cannot leave this hall by the usual avenues, or even throw ourselves from the windows; the guns are pointed upon us, all expression of our sentiments is interdicted, and I am silent."

Barbaroux succeeded Lanjuinais, and refused, with equal courage, the resignation demanded from him. "If the convention," said he, "ordain my expulsion, I will submit; but how can I divest myself of my powers, when several departments write to me with an assurance that I have employed them beneficially and with urgent entreaties to continue so to employ them? I have sworn to die at my post, and I will keep my word." Dusaulx appeared, and offered his resignation. "What!" exclaimed Marat, "are criminals to be allowed the honour of patriotic devotion? A man must be pure to offer sacrifices to the country; it is for me, a true martyr, to devote myself. Thus I offer my suspension from the moment you have ordered the arrest of the accused deputies. But," he added, "the list is badly framed; instead of the old dotard Dusaulx, of the weak-headed Lanthenas, and of Ducos, guilty only of some erroneous opinions, there ought to be substituted Fermont and Valazé, who well deserve to be upon it, and are not."

At this moment a loud noise was heard at the door of the hall. Lacroix entered in visible agitation, vociferating with vehemence. Advancing, he stated it was too true the convention was no longer free; he had wished to leave the hall, and egress had been denied him. Although a Mountaineer and an advocate for the arrest of the twenty-two deputies, Lacroix was indignant at the assumption of the commune in thus confining the representatives of the people.

Since the refusal to proceed upon the petition of the commune, the word had been passed at all the doors foes alleged, their aim was in reality to profit by the disorder for a general abandonment to pillage and murder. Their insurrection was spontaneous, because it resulted from a general conviction; and the Mountain itself, vacillating, amazed at the movement, proved sufficiently that it had not concurred in producing it. Thus has this insurrection been purely moral and wholly popular."

This mode of representing the event served at once to give a favourable aspect to the insurrection, cast an indirect censure upon the Mountain, which had undoubtedly exhibited hesitation on the 2d June, repel the imputation of conspiracy fastened on the leaders of the left side, and agreeably flatter the popular party, which had accomplished all, and so excellently, of itself. After this interpretation, received with acclamations by the Jacobins, and afterwards re-echoed by all the organs of the victorious party, Marat was called to account for an expression which had caused considerable excitement. As Marat rarely discerned any means of terminating revolutionary hesitations, save one, dictatorship, when he perceived symptoms of tergiversation on the 2d June, he had then, as on all other occasions, repeatedly exclaimed, "We must have a chief." Required to explain this phrase, he justified it in his own peculiar manner, and the Jacobins were speedily satisfied, content with having manifested their scruples and the severity of their republican principles. Some observations were likewise hazarded on the lukewarmness of Danton, who appeared somewhat enervated since the suppression of the committee of twelve, and whose energy, so ardent up to the 31st May, had strangely cooled by the 2d June. Danton was not present; Camille-Desmoulins, his friend, warmly defended him; and the discussion was abruptly terminated, from respect for so important a personage, and to avoid topics of too delicate a texture; for, in sooth, albeit the insurrection was consummated, it was far from being universally approved even in the victorious party. It had sufficiently transpired that the committee of public welfare, and several Mountaineers, viewed with alarm this popular act of interference. The exploit achieved, to profit by it became the essential consideration, without reviving unnecessary debates. Consequently, how to use their victory promptly and usefully was the paramount object of the conquerors.

Divers measures were necessary for the requisite consummation. To remodel the committees, all of which were filled with partisans of the right side; to monopolise through the committees the direction of affairs; to change the ministers; to set a watch upon correspondence; to stop at the post-office dangerous publications, and prevent any but well-accredited journals circulating in the provinces (for, quoth Robespierre, the liberty of the press ought to be unrestricted, doubtless, but not when endeavouring to destroy freedom); to form without further delay the revolutionary army, the enrolment whereof had been already decreed, since its intervention would be indispensable to enforce the execution of the decrees of the convention throughout the country; and to realise the forced loan of a thousand millions from the rich—such were the measures proposed and unanimously adopted by the Jacobins. But an additional measure was deemed more essential than all the others, namely, the digestion, within a week, of the republican constitution. It was important to show that the opposition of the Girondists had alone prevented the accomplishment of this great task, had been the sole impediment to France rejoicing in good laws and enjoying a charter of union around which all her sons could rally. This was the simultaneous idea of Jacobins, Cordeliers, sections, and commune.

The convention, pliant before an irresistible opinion reiterated in various forms, remodelled its committees of general safety, finance, war, legislation, &c. The committee of public welfare, which was greatly overburdened with affairs, not being yet sufficiently obnoxious to suspicion to justify an abrupt dismissal of all its members, was alone preserved intact. Lebrun was replaced in the foreign office by Deforgues, and Clavière in the ministry of finance by Destournelles. The plan of a constitution presented by Condorcet, in accordance with the views of the Girondists, was regarded as inchoate or as if not rendered, and the committee of public welfare was enjoined to submit another within eight days. Five members were added to it for this extraordinary duty. Moreover, it received an order to prepare a plan of execution for the forced loan, and a scheme of organisation for the revolutionary army.

The sittings of the convention bore a perfectly novel aspect subsequent to the 31st May. They were held in silence, and almost all the decrees were adopted without discussion. The right side, and a portion of the centre, no longer voted; they seemed, by their non-participation, to protest against all the proceedings adopted since the 2d June, and to be awaiting intelligence from the departments. Marat had conceived himself bound, in justice, to declare his own suspension, until his adversaries, the Girondists, were tried. Until then he renounced his functions, he said, and contented himself with illuminating the convention in the columns of his journal. The two deputies, Doulcet and Fonfrède of Bordeaux, alone disturbed the stillness of the assembly. The first denounced the committee of insurrection, which still continued to meet at the Evêché, and, seizing letters at the post-office, broke open their seals, and returned them thus loose to their writers, with the words stamped thereon: "Revolution of the 31st May." The convention passed to the order of the day. The other, Fonfrède, a member of the commission of twelve, but excepted from the decree of arrest, because he had opposed the measures of that commission, appeared in the tribune, and demanded the execution of the decree which ordained a report upon those imprisoned within three days. This reclamation excited some tumult. "The innocence of our colleagues ought to be proved as soon as possible," said Fonfrède. "I have remained here only to vindicate it; and I warn you that an armed force is advancing from Bordeaux to avenge the outrages committed upon them." Vociferations followed the utterance of these words, the order of the day consigned Fonfrède's proposition to oblivion, and all again relapsed into profound silence. They were "the last croakings of the toads in the quagmire," said the Jacobins.

The menace held out by Fonfrède from the tribune was not an oratorical flourish, for not only the inhabitants of Bordeaux but of almost all the departments were ready to take up arms against the convention. Their discontent dated from a period long anterior to the 2d June; it had commenced, in fact, with the quarrels between the Girondists and the Mountaineers. It will be recollected that throughout the whole of France the municipalities and the sections were opposed. The partisans of the Mountaineer system occupied the municipalities and clubs; the moderate republicans, who desired to preserve the ordinary rules of justice even in the convulsions of the revolution, had all retreated, on the contrary, into the sections. In several towns the parties had come to an open rupture. At Marseilles the sections had despoiled the municipality of its powers, and transferred them to a central committee. Moreover, they had instituted a popular tribunal of their leaders, to try the patriots accused of revolutionary excesses. The commissioners Bayle and Boisset in vain annulled this committee and this tribunal; their authority was contemned, and the sections had remained in permanent insurrection against the revolution. At Lyons, the struggle had ended in the effusion of blood. Opinion was divided whether a municipal ordinance, directing the levy of a revolutionary army and a war-tax upon the rich, should be executed. The sections which refused to acknowledge it had declared themselves in permanence; the municipality had endeavoured to dissolve them; but, aided by the departmental directory, they had resisted. On the 29th May, a general engagement was fought, notwithstanding the presence of the two commissioners of the convention, who made fruitless efforts to prevent the combat. The victorious sections, after having taken by assault the arsenal and the town-hall, had deposed the municipality, closed the Jacobin Club, where Chalier excited violent commotions, and usurped the sovereignty of Lyons. Some hundreds of the combatants fell during the conflict. The representatives, Nioche and Gauthier, remained prisoners a whole day; subsequently released, they withdrew to their colleagues Albite and Dubois-Crancé, who, like themselves, had a mission for the army of the Alps.

Such was the situation of Lyons and the south during the last days of May. Bordeaux presented a not more cheering aspect. That town, with all those of the west, Brittany and Normandy, was merely waiting, before entering upon action, until the threats, so long repeated against the provincial deputies, should be realised. It was under these feelings that the departments learnt the events at the close of May. The occurrence of the 27th, when the commission of twelve was suppressed for the first time, had caused considerable irritation, and on all sides it was proposed to pass condemnatory resolutions upon the excesses of Paris. But the 31st May and the 2d June carried indignation to the highest pitch. Rumour, which magnifies at all times, exaggerated the facts. It was reported that thirty-two deputies had been put to death by the commune, that the public treasury had been given up to pillage, and that the brigands of Paris had seized upon all authority, which they purposed to hand over to the foreigner, to Marat, or to Orleans. Assemblies were immediately held to draw up petitions and make arrangements for assuming arms against the capital.

At this moment the fugitive deputies arrived, to relate in person what had passed, and to give additional consistence to the movements preparing on all sides. Besides those who had already escaped, several eluded the vigilance of the gendarmes; others even quitted the assembly to foment the insurrection. Gensonné, Valazé, and Vergniaud, persisted in remaining, saying, that if it were advisable a part of them should hasten to arouse the zeal of the departments, it was likewise essential that others should remain as hostages in the hands of their enemies, in order to demonstrate by a trial and at the hazard of their lives the innocence of all. Buzot, who had from the first refused submission to the decree of the 2d June, proceeded to his own department of the Eure, to stimulate a rising amongst the Normans, and thither Gorsas followed him with the like intention. Brissot betook himself to Moulins. Meilhan, who was not included in the decree of arrest, but who had given an asylum to his colleagues from the night of the 31st May to the 2d June, and Duchâtel, whom the Mountaineers called the ghost of the 21st January, because he had risen from his bed to vote in favour of Louis XVI., left the convention to stir up Brittany. Biroteau escaped from the gendarmes, and went with Chasset to direct the proceedings of the Lyonnese. Rebecqui, preceding Barbaroux, who was still detained, repaired to the Bouches-du-Rhone. Rabaut Saint-Etienne speeded to Nîmes, to bring Languedoc into co-operation with the general movement against the oppressors of the convention.

On the 13th June, the department of the Eure assembled and gave the first signal of insurrection. The convention, it said, not being free, and it being the duty of all citizens to restore it to freedom, it resolved that a force of 4000 men should be raised to march upon Paris, and commissioners be sent into all the neighbouring departments, to urge them to imitate the example and organise their operations in concert. The department of the Calvados, convoked at Caen, arrested the two deputies Rome and Prieur, of the Côte-d'Or, commissioned by the convention to expedite the formation of an army on the coasts of Cherbourg. It was agreed that the departments of Normandy should congregate in an extraordinary association at Caen, to form a confederation. All the departments of Brittany, as those of the Côtes-du-Nord, Finisterre, Morbihan, Ille-et-Vilaine, Mayenne, and Loire-Inférieure, passed a similar resolution, and deputed commissioners to meet at Rennes to establish a central authority for Brittany. The departments of the Basin of the Loire, excepting those which were occupied by the Vendéans, followed the general example, and even proposed to send delegates to Bourges, to form in that town a convention composed of two deputies from each department, and to march upon Paris and destroy the usurping or coerced convention there sitting.

At Bordeaux the excitement was very great. All the constituted authorities met in general assembly, designated as the Popular Commission of Public Welfare, and, premising that the convention was no longer free and ought to be restored to liberty, they resolved that an armed force should be forthwith levied, and in the interim a petition be addressed to the National Convention, praying it to afford explanations, and make known the truth with respect to the days of May and June. They subsequently dispatched commissioners into all the departments, to invite them to a general coalition. Toulouse, an old parliamentary city, in which numerous partisans of the old government were concealed behind the Girondists, had already instituted a departmental force of a thousand men. Its administrations declared, in presence of the commissioners deputed to the army of the Pyrenees, that they no longer acknowledged the convention. They moreover liberated several persons who had been placed in confinement, incarcerated others accused of being Mountaineers, and openly proclaimed that they were ready to form a confederation with the departments of the South. The higher departments of the Tarn, Puy-de-Dôme, Lot-et-Garonne, Aveyron, Cantal, and Herault, followed the example of Toulouse and Bordeaux. Nîmes declared itself in a state of resistance; Marseilles prepared a petition couched in terms of vengeance, put in activity its popular tribunal, began a process against the slayers, and organised a force of 6000 men. At Grenoble, the sections were convoked, and their presidents, in conjunction with the constituted authorities, arrogated the possession of all powers, dispatched delegates to Lyons, and manifested an intention to arrest Dubois-Crancé and Gauthier, the commissioners of the convention to the army of the Alps. The department of the Ain adopted similar resolutions. That of Jura, which had previously levied a body of cavalry and a departmental force of 800 men, protested with animation against the authority of the convention. Lastly, at Lyons, where the sections reigned paramount since the battle of the 29th May, they both received and deputed envoys, with the view of acting in concert with Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Caen. They likewise instituted proceedings against Chalier, president of the Jacobin Club, and against several other Mountaineers. Thus there remained under the authority of the convention only the departments of the North and those comprised in the basin of the Seine. The insurgent departments amounted to sixty or seventy, and Paris, with fifteen or twenty, had to resist this imposing mass, and continue the war with all Europe.

At Paris, opinions were divided on the measures to be pursued in this crisis. The members of the committee of public welfare, Cambon, Barrère, Bréard, Treilhard, and Mathieu, well-accredited patriots, though they had disapproved of the 2d June, were desirous that the ways of conciliation should be tried. It was necessary, according to their views, to demonstrate the freedom of the convention by energetic steps against agitators, and, instead of exasperating the departments by severe decrees, to win them back by expostulations on the fearful danger of civil war in the presence of foreign armies. Barrère submitted, in the name of the committee of public welfare, a decree altogether conceived in this spirit.

By the proposed enactment, the revolutionary committees, which had rendered themselves so formidable by their numerous arrests, were to be suppressed throughout France, or restricted to the object of their institution, the surveillance of suspected strangers; the primary assemblies were to be convoked at Paris to nominate a commander of the armed force, in lieu of Henriot, who owed his appointment merely to the insurgents; lastly, thirty deputies were to be sent into the departments as hostages. These measures appeared calculated to pacify and tranquillise the provinces. The abolition of the revolutionary committees would put an end to the inquisition in force against the suspected; the selection of a good commanding officer would ensure order in Paris; and the thirty deputies would serve at once as hostages and peacemakers. But the Mountain was in no humour to negotiate. Proudly boasting of what it called the national authority, it rejected all schemes of conciliation. Robespierre caused the project of the committee to be adjourned. Danton, again raising his voice in this perilous conjuncture, recalled the famous crises of the revolution; the dangers of September at the period of the invasion of Champagne and the capture of Verdun; the dangers of January, before the condemnation of the last king was decided; finally, the still greater dangers of April, when Dumouriez was about to march on Paris, and La Vendée raised the standard of revolt. The revolution, he said, had surmounted all these perils; it had come forth victorious from all these crises, and it would again emerge triumphantly from this the last one. "It is in the throes of their mightiest efforts," he exclaimed, "that political, like physical bodies, always seem threatened with imminent dissolution. Hark! the thunder roars, and amidst its crashes the great labour, in which the happiness of twenty-four millions of men is involved, shall be accomplished."

Danton recommended that, by a decree common to all the departments, they should be enjoined to succumb within twenty-four hours after its receipt, under pain of the ban of outlawry. The commanding voice of Danton, whose inspiriting tones were never heard in seasons of peril without arming all minds with courage, produced its accustomed effect. The convention, although it scrupled to adopt exactly the proposed measure, nevertheless passed most energetic resolutions. With respect to the 31st May and the 2d June, it declared* that the people of Paris, in its insurrection, had deserved well of the country. It decreed that the deputies who had been originally ordered into arrest at their own houses, and of whom some had taken to flight, should be transferred to prison, and there detained like ordinary prisoners; that a call of the whole convention should be made, and the absent without leave or orders unseated and replaced by substitutes; that the departmental and municipal authorities could be neither superseded nor removed from one place to another; that it was not competent for them to correspond together, and that all delegates sent from one department into another, with the design of concocting coalitions, were to be instantly seized by all good citizens, and forwarded under escort to Paris. After adopting these general measures, the convention annulled the ordinance of the department of the Eure; put under impeachment the members of the department of Calvados, who had arrested two of its commissioners; fulminated the like sentence against Buzot, the instigator of the revolt of Normandy; and intrusted two deputies, Mathieu and Treilhard, with a mission to the departments of the Gironde, Dordogne, and Lot-et-Garonne, which requested explanations before rising in insurrection. It summoned before it the authorities of Toulouse, dissolved the tribunal and central committee of Marseilles, denounced Barbaroux by especial stigma, and proclaimed the incarcerated patriots under the safeguard of the law. Lastly, it dispatched Robert Lindet to Lyons, in order to take cognisance of facts and draw up a report upon the state of that city.

These decrees, passed in quick succession before the close of June, materially damped the ardour of several departments, unsuited by habit to contend with the central authority. Intimidated and irresolute, they deemed it best to await the example which might be furnished them by departments more powerful, or more committed in the quarrel.

The administrative bodies of Normandy, animated by the presence of the deputies who had joined Buzot, to wit, Barbaroux, Guadet, Louvet, Salles, Pétion, Bergoing, Lesage, Cussy, and Kervélégan, followed up their first resolutions, and fixed upon Caen as the seat of a central committee for the departments. Those of the Eure, Calvados, and Orne, sent delegates. The departments of Brittany, which had previously congregated at Rennes, determined to effect a junction with the central association of Caen, and to appoint delegates to represent them therein. Accordingly, on the 30th June, the envoys of Morbihan, Finisterre, Côtes-du-Nord, Mayenne, Ille-et-Vilaine, and Loire-Inférieure, being united with those of Calvados, L'Eure, and L'Orne, constituted themselves A Central Assembly of Resistance to Oppression, promising to maintain equality, and the unity and indivisibility of the republic, but swearing hatred to anarchists, and pledging themselves to use their power solely for the purpose of ensuring respect to persons and property, and upholding the sovereignty of the people. After having thus taken formal constitution, they resolved that contingents should be furnished by each department, to form a sufficient force to march upon Paris and re-establish the national representation in its integrity. Felix Wimpffen, general of the army directed to be organised along the coasts of Cherbourg, was named commander of the departmental army. He accepted the post, and forthwith assumed the new title conferred upon him. Ordered to Paris by the minister of war, he replied that but one mode of promoting peace could be effectual, namely, the revocation of all the decrees passed subsequent to the 31st May; that upon this condition the departments would fraternise with the capital; but, in the reverse alternative, he would visit Paris only at the head of sixty thousand Normans and Bretons.

At the same time that he called Wimpffen to Paris, the minister directed the dragoon regiment of La Manche, stationed in Normandy, to proceed without delay to Versailles. Upon this order transpiring, the federalists already assembled at Evreux drew up in battle array; the national guards joined them, and the road to Versailles was blocked against the dragoons. The latter, not disposed to engage in combat, undertook not to depart, and feigned to fraternise with the federalists. The officers wrote secretly to Paris that they could not obey the minister without commencing a civil war. They were consequently suffered to remain.

The assembly of Caen decided that the Breton battalions, already arrived, should be marched from Caen to Evreux, as the general rendezvous of all the forces. To this point were likewise forwarded provisions, arms, munitions, and funds taken from the public repositories. Thither, too, were dispatched officers recently gained to the cause of federalism, and numbers of concealed royalists, who eagerly participated in all commotions, and assumed the mask of republicanism to oppose the revolution. Amongst the counter-revolutionists of this class, was the well-known Puisaye, who affected a prodigious zeal for the cause of the Girondists, and whom Wimpffen, himself a disguised royalist, named general of brigade, and intrusted with the command of the advanced guard collected at Evreux. This advanced guard might amount to five or six thousand men, and was daily increased by fresh contingents. The brave Bretons hastened from all parts, and announced that other battalions were following them in greater force. They were prevented from mustering more rapidly by the necessity of guarding the coasts of the sea from the English fleets, and of detaching battalions against the Vendéans, who already touched upon the Loire, and seemed preparing to cross it. Although the Bretons of the rural districts were blindly devoted to the clergy, those of the towns were sincere republicans, and, even when combating Paris, they were not the less disposed to continue an obstinate war against La Vendée.

Such was the situation of affairs in Brittany and Normandy at the commencement of July. In the neighbouring departments of the Loire, zeal had greatly slackened. Certain commissioners of the convention, who were opportunely in the district for the purpose of directing the new levies on La Vendée, had induced the administrative bodies to await further events before finally compromising themselves. Consequently, all idea in those quarters of sending delegates to Bourges was given up for the moment, and a studied reserve succeeded the first evanescent impetuosity.

At Bordeaux the insurrection was steady and energetic. The deputies Treilhard and Mathieu were closely watched upon their arrival, and it was even debated to arrest them as hostages; however, without proceeding to that extremity, they were ordered to appear before the popular commission, where the citizens, who viewed them as Maratist envoys, extended to them but an untoward reception. They were interrogated as to the events that had occurred at Paris; and after hearing them, the commission resolved that, even according to their own statement, the convention had not been free on the 2d June, nor ever had been so since that period; that they were themselves but the envoys of an assembly without a legal character, wherefore they had simply, with all expedient dispatch, to betake themselves forth the department. They were thereupon formally reconducted to the limits of the province, and the Bordelese were left at liberty to mature plans similar to those that had been already acted upon at Caen. They prepared stores of provisions and arms, appropriated the public funds, and sent forward an advanced guard to Langon, to await the main body, which was appointed to start within a few days. These occurrences passed also during the latter days of June and the first of July.

The deputies Mathieu and Treilhard, experiencing less resistance and a somewhat more favourable appreciation in the departments of the Dordogne, Vienne, and Lot-et-Garonne, succeeded in allaying the ferment to a certain extent, and by their conciliatory manners prevented an immediate resort to hostilities, thereby gaining time, which was of infinite service to the convention. But in the higher departments, in the mountains of the Upper Loire and on their further flanks, in L'Herault and Le Gard, all along the banks of the Rhone, the insurrection was general. Le Gard and L'Herault put their battalions in motion, and sent them to the Pont-Saint-Esprit, to occupy the passage of the Rhone, and effect a junction with the Marseillese, who were to ascend that river. The latter, refusing all obedience to the decrees of the convention, had persisted in maintaining their tribunal, continued under confinement the arrested patriots, and even commenced a series of executions. They formed an army of 6000 men, which, advancing from Aix to Avignon, and then uniting with the Languedocians collected at the Pont-Saint-Esprit, was intended to stir up on its march the districts along the Rhone, the Isère, and the Drôme, and finally coalesce with the Mountaineers of the Ain and Jura. At Grenoble, the federalised administrations contended against Dubois-Crancé, and even held out threats of arrest. Not yet venturing to levy troops, they had simply dispatched envoys to fraternise with Lyons. Dubois-Crancé, with the disorganised army of the Alps, found himself in the midst of a half-revolted city, which intimated to him daily the significant hint that the south could very easily dispense with the north. He had, moreover, to guard Savoy, where the illusions originally inspired by liberty and French dominion were dissipated, where constant murmurs were raised against the levies of men and the issue of assignats, and where nothing was understood of that revolution, so convulsive and so different from what had been at first imagined. On his flanks he had Switzerland, in which the emigrants kept up a busy agitation, and where Berne was again contemplating the occupation of Geneva by a garrison, and in his rear he had Lyons, which intercepted his correspondence with the committee of public welfare.

At Lyons, Robert Lindet had been indeed received, but in his very presence the federalist oath had been solemnly administered:—"THE UNITY AND INDIVISIBILITY OF THE REPUBLIC, HATRED TO ANARCHISTS, AND THE NATIONAL REPRESENTATION ENTIRE." So far from sending the apprehended patriots to Paris, the proceedings instituted against them were the more diligently prosecuted. A new authority, composed of deputies of the communes and members of the constituted bodies, had been formed under the title of the Popular and Republican Commission of Public Welfare for the Rhone and Loire. This assembly had decreed the organisation of a departmental force, to operate in concert with the federalists of the Jura, Isère, Bouches-du-Rhone, Gironde, and Calvados. This force was already enrolled. It had likewise been determined to levy a subsidy; and there, as in the other departments, the signal alone was awaited to commence the movement. In the Jura, when intelligence arrived that the two deputies Bassal and Garnier of Troyes, commissioned to re-establish obedience towards the assembly, had collected at Dôle 1500 troops of the line, upwards of 14,000 mountaineers had taken arms and made dispositions to envelop them.

If, then, we consider the state of France at the commencement of July 1793, we shall perceive that a column issuing from Brittany and Normandy, and propelled as far as Evreux, was only a few leagues from Paris; that another was advancing from Bordeaux, which threatened to draw in its train all the departments in the basin of the Loire, still irresolute; that 6000 Marseillese, posted at Avignon, awaiting the Languedocians at the Pont-Saint-Esprit, already occupied by 800 Nîmois, were in a position to unite at Lyons with all the federalists of Grenoble, the Ain, and the Jura, and pour through Burgundy upon Paris. In the interim, until this general junction were effected, the federalists appropriated all the moneys in the public coffers, intercepted the supplies and munitions forwarded to the armies, and returned into circulation the assignats redeemed by the sale of the national domains.*

It is a remarkable circumstance, highly characteristic of the spirit of party, that both factions addressed the same reproaches and attributed the same designs to each other. The party of Paris and the Mountain upbraided the federalists with purposing to ruin the republic by dividing it, and with harbouring a scheme, in concert with the English, to establish a king, who was to be either the Duke of Orleans, Louis XVII., or the Duke of York. On the other hand, the party of the departments and federalists charged upon the Mountain an intention to effectuate a counter-revolution by anarchy, and said that Marat, Robespierre,

* Report of Cambon on the labours of the committee of public welfare, from the 10th of April to the 10th July.

Danton, were all sold to England or to Orleans. Thus on both sides, it was the republic they pretended to save, and the monarchy they professed to abhor, and its return chiefly to oppose. Such is the deplorable and ordinary infatuation of parties!

But all that we have recently sketched affords a picture of only one portion of the dangers that hung over France. The enemy within was to be dreaded solely on account of the enemy without, who had at this time become more formidable than ever. Whilst armies of Frenchmen were advancing from the extremities towards the centre, armies of foreigners were again encompassing France, and menacing it with an almost inevitable invasion. Since the battle of Neerwinden and the defection of Dumouriez, a constant series of reverses had driven the French from all their conquests and laid open the northern frontier. It will be remembered that Dampierre, being appointed general-in-chief, had rallied the army under the walls of Bouchain, and had succeeded in restoring to it a degree of organisation and courage. Luckily for the revolution, the allies, true to the methodical plan settled at the opening of the campaign, refrained from penetrating on any point, and resolved to enter France only when the King of Prussia, after taking Mayence, should be prepared to advance into the heart of the country. If amongst the generals of the coalition had sparkled a ray of genius, or if a spirit of union had cemented them, the cause of the revolution had been lost. After Neerwinden and the defection of Dumouriez, they ought to have marched forward, and given no rest to their beaten, divided, and betrayed foes; and, whether they had made the French prisoners, or driven them into their strongholds, the country would have remained open to their victorious hosts. But the allies thought fit to hold a congress at Antwerp, in order with due deliberation to regulate the ulterior operations of the war. To the Duke of York, the Prince of Cobourg, the Prince of Orange, and divers generals, was left the important decision upon the course it behoved the allies to take. And they resolved to beleaguer Condé and Valenciennes, in order to give the house of Austria additional fortresses in the Low Countries, and to seize upon Dunkirk, to gratify England with so desirable a port upon the continent. These stipulations entered into, operations were resumed. The English and Dutch arrived in line. The Duke of York commanded 20,000 Austrians and Hanoverians, the Prince of Orange 15,000 Dutchmen, and the Prince of Cobourg 45,000 Austrians and 8000 Hessians. The Prince of Hohenlohe occupied Namur and Luxumbourg with 30,000 Austrians, and connected the allied army in the Low Countries with the Prussian army employed in the siege of Mayence. Thus from 80,000 to 90,000 men menaced the north.

The allies lost no time in forming the blockade of Condé, and to raise that blockade became an object of the greatest ambition to the French government. Dampierre, distrustful of his soldiers, scrupled to attack the formidable masses of the enemy. But, goaded by the commissioners of the convention, he drew his army to the camp of Famars under Valenciennes, and on the 1st of May attacked in several columns the Austrians, intrenched in the woods of Vicogne and Saint-Amant. Military combinations were still conceived in a timid spirit at that time; to compose a mass, seize the weak point of the enemy, and vigorously assault it, were tactics unknown to both sides. Dampierre threw himself with signal valour, but in small bodies, upon an enemy who was himself divided, and whom it would have been easy to overwhelm on any given point. Chastised for his blunder, he was repulsed after an obstinate engagement. On the 9th May he renewed the attack, on which occasion his forces were less scattered than before; but his wary antagonists were likewise more compact, and whilst he was making heroic efforts to ensure the capture of a redoubt, which stood an obstacle to the junction of two of his columns, he was struck by a cannon-ball and mortally wounded. General Lamarche, succeeding provisionally to the command, ordered a retreat, and led back the army into the camp of Famars.

This camp of Famars, being situated beneath the walls of Valenciennes and connected with that fortress, prevented its being besieged. The allies determined to attack it on the 23d May. They subdivided their troops according to their wonted method, uselessly diverting corps upon a multitude of points which Austrian prudence deemed it expedient to guard, and assaulting the camp with a less force than a more skilful adversary would have deployed. Kept in check a whole day by the artillery, the pride of the French army, they did not effect the passage of the Ronelle, which defended the front of the camp, until the evening. Lamarche decamped during the night in good order, and proceeded to plant himself in the camp of Cæsar, which was connected with the fastness of Bouchain, as that of Famars with Valenciennes. Here again the allies ought to have pursued and dispersed the French; but narrow-sighted selfishness and methodical precision fixed the imperialists around Valenciennes. A part of their army, disposed as a corps of observation, was posted between Valenciennes and Bouchain, and fronted Cæsar's camp. Another division undertook the siege of Valenciennes, and the remnant continued the blockade of Condé, which was greatly straitened for food, and the reduction whereof was confidently anticipated within a few days. The siege of Valenciennes was commenced in regular form. One hundred and eighty pieces of ordnance were sent from Vienna, and one hundred others from Holland; ninety-three mortars were already on the spot. Thus, during June and July, Condé was exposed to starvation, Valenciennes was laid in ashes, and the French generals occupied Cæsar's camp with a defeated, dispirited, and disorganised army. The most gloomy prognostications were coupled with the fall of those two frontier bulwarks, Condé and Valenciennes.

The army of the Moselle, forming the connecting link between the army of the north and that of the Rhine, had passed under the orders of Ligneville, upon the nomination of Beurnonville to the ministry of war. That general found himself in presence of the Prince of Hohenlohe, from whom he had little to dread, inasmuch as that personage, occupying at once Namur, Luxumbourg, and Treves, with 30,000 men at the utmost, and having before him the fastnesses of Metz and Thionville, was effectually debarred from attempting any dangerous enterprise. He had been recently still further crippled by a detachment of from 7000 to 8000 men sent to join the Prussian army. Thenceforth, it became both more practicable and more expedient than ever to unite the active force on the Moselle with that on the upper Rhine, to prosecute important operations.

On the Rhine, the preceding campaign had terminated at Mayence. Custine, after his absurd demonstrations around Frankfort, had been constrained to fall back and shut himself up in Mayence, where he had collected a considerable artillery, abstracted from other French fortresses, and particularly from Strasbourg. There he formed a thousand projects; sometimes he would resume the offensive, at others defend Mayence to the last, and again abandon the place altogether. He had finally resolved to maintain his possession; and his representations induced the executive council to sanction that determination. The King of Prussia thus found himself compelled to invest the town in form; and it was the resistance he encountered at this point that delayed the advance of the allies on the north.

The Prussian monarch passed the Rhine at Bacharach, a little below Mayence; Wurmser, with 15,000 Austrians and a few thousands of the corps of Condé, crossed it a little above; and the Hessian corps of Schoenfeld remained on the right bank before the suburb of Cassel. The Prussian army was not, however, so strong as it ought to have been, according to the obligations contracted by Frederick William. Having detached a considerable corps into Poland, there remained with him only 55,000 men, including the different contingents, Hessians, Saxons, and Bavarians. Thus, reckoning the corps of imperialists under Wurmser, the 5000 or 6000 emigrants of the Prince of Condé, and the 55,000 men under the King of Prussia, the army which at this moment hovered so threateningly on the eastern frontier could certainly not muster beyond 80,000 men. The fortresses on the Rhine contained of garrison troops nearly 38,000; the active army was from 40,000 to 45,000 strong; that of the Moselle 30,000; and if these two latter had been combined under one command, and with a basis (point d'appui) such as that of Mayence, they might have feasibly gone in quest of the Brandenburgher, and given him adequate occupation on his own side of the Rhine.

At all events, the two French generals on the Moselle and Rhine might have acted in concert; they assuredly might have disputed, if not prevented, the passage of the river; but they in reality did nothing. In the course of the month of March, the King of Prussia crossed the Rhine without hindrance, and only encountered in his progress some advanced posts, which he easily drove back. At that particular moment, Custine was at Worms. He had not cast a thought upon defending either the banks of the Rhine or the ridges of the Vosges, which, forming a circle round Mayence, might have checked the march of the Prussians. He repaired to the scene with promptitude, but speedily took fright at the reverses experienced by his advanced guards; he concluded he had at least 150,000 men on his hands; above all, he was haunted with the idea that Wurmser, who had been directed to debouch by the Palatinate and above Mayence, was in his rear, and preparing to separate him from Alsace. He hastily demanded succours from Ligneville, who, trembling for himself, refused to detach a single regiment. Thereupon, he hesitated no longer, but moved back with the utmost precipitancy upon Landau, thence upon Weissembourg, and even thought of seeking protection under the cannon of Strasbourg. This inconceivable retreat threw open all the inlets to the Prussians, who proceeded with composure to group themselves around Mayence, and invest it on both banks.

Twenty thousand men were immured in the place; and if such a force were ample for defence, it was much too considerable for consumption, since the stores of provisions were quite inadequate to maintain so numerous a garrison. The uncertainty which attended all the military plans at that period, had prevented any measures being taken to provision the town. Fortunately, it contained two representatives of the people, Rewbel and the undaunted Merlin de Thionville, the generals Kléber, Aubert-Debayet, and Meunier (of the engineers); and, lastly, a garrison signally endowed with all martial virtues—valour, sobriety, and fortitude. The investment was completed in April. General Kalkreuth conducted the siege with a Prussian corps. The King of Prussia and Wurmser rested in observation at the foot of the Vosges, and presented a front to Custine. The garrison made repeated sallies, and extended to a great distance its scope of defence. The French government, sensible too late of the fault it had committed in separating the two armies of the Moselle and Rhine, now united them under Custine. That general, having from 60,000 to 70,000 men at his disposal, with the Austrians and Prussians lying dispersed before him, and beyond them Mayence, defended by 20,000 intrepid Frenchmen, never dreamt, it would seem, of bearing down in a concentrated mass upon the corps of observation, scattering it before him, and bearing succour to the brave garrison stretching out its arms to him in vain. About the middle of May, it is true, becoming aware of the perilous consequences of his inaction, he made an abortive, ill-combined, ill-sustained attempt, which ultimately degenerated into a complete rout. According to his approved method, he threw the blame upon his subordinates, and was transferred to the army of the north, to restore organisation and courage to the troops intrenched in Cæsar's camp. Thus the coalition, left to prosecute the sieges of Valenciennes and Mayence, might, after the capture of those two fortresses, advance towards the centre of France, and accomplish without serious impediment the long-projected invasion.

From the Rhine to the Alps and the Pyrenees a series of revolts threatened the rear of the French armies, and interrupted their communications. The Vosges, Jura, Auvergne, and Lozère, form from the Rhine to the Pyrenees an almost continuous chain of mountains, of different height and compass. Mountainous districts are invariably, touching their institutions, manners, and customs, regions of conservatism. In almost all those we have just mentioned, the population retained a lingering attachment for its former mode of life, and, without being so fanatical as in La Vendée, it was sufficiently disposed to take up arms against the present rulers of France. The Vosges, nearly half German, were agitated by nobles and priests, and manifested intentions the more hostile as the army of the Rhine swerved from its positions. The Jura was wholly insurgent in the cause of the Girondists; and if in its revolt it evinced a decided zeal for liberty, it was not on that account the less dangerous, seeing that from fifteen to twenty thousand of its mountaineers were collected around Lons-le-Saulnier, in connexion with the insurrectionists of the Ain and Rhone. We have already sketched the state of Lyons. The mountains of Lozère, which separate the Upper Loire from the Rhone, were filled with insurgents of similar character to the Vendéans. Commanded by a member of the first Constituent Assembly, named Charrier, they amounted to nearly 30,000 fighting men, and might by the Loire effect a junction with La Vendée. After them were the federalist insurgents of the south. Thus, extensive revolts, differing in aim and principles, but all equally formidable, threatened the rears of the armies of the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees.

Upon the line of the Alps, the Piedmontese were in arms, coveting the resumption of Savoy and the county of Nice. The snow delayed the commencement of hostilities along the Saint-Bernard, and each army kept its posts in the three valleys of Sallenche, La Tarentaise, and La Maurienne. In the Maritime Alps, and to the army designated "of Italy," it chanced otherwise. Hostilities in that direction had been early resumed, and during the month of May the contest for the important post of Saorgio, on which depended the tranquil possession of Nice, had been renewed. The occupancy of this post, in fact, would have rendered the French masters of the Col-de-Tende, and given them the command of the great chain. Consequently, the Piedmontese had displayed as much energy in defending it as the latter in attacking it. They had, as well in Savoy as in the direction of Nice, 40,000 men reinforced by 8000 Austrian auxiliaries. Their troops, dispersed in several divisions of equal force, from the Col-de-Tende to the Great Saint-Bernard, had pursued, like all the forces of the allies, the system of cordons, and scrupulously guarded all the valleys. The French army of Italy was in the most deplorable condition. Composed of 15,000 men at the utmost, destitute of every necessary, and unskilfully commanded, any great efforts on its part were quite impossible. General Biron, who had appeared at its head for a brief interval, strengthened it with 5000 recruits, but failed in providing it with the still more essential matter of supplies. Had some grand conception been started in the south, such as had lacked so signally in the north, the ruin of France would have been with equal certainty accomplished on that side. The Piedmontese might with ease, under favour of the snows which paralysed all action on the High Alps, have transported all their forces to the southern Alps, and, debouching on Nice with a mass of 30,000 men, have fallen irresistibly on the dilapidated army of Italy, driven it back on the insurgent departments, completely scattered it, stimulated the movements on both banks of the Rhone, advanced possibly even to Grenoble and Lyons, taken in the rear the army entangled in the valleys of Savoy, and thus overrun the whole of that portion of France. But, in truth, they could no more boast a Victor-Amadeus amongst them, than the Austrians a Eugene or the English a Marlborough. So they contented themselves with defending Saorgio.

Brunet, who succeeded Anselme, had, with regard to this post of Saorgio, made efforts similar to those which had illustrated the close of Dampierre's career before Condé. After several fruitless and sanguinary conflicts, a decisive action was fought on the 12th June, which ended in a total overthrow. Then again, if the enemy had derived a portion of boldness from his success, he had a fair opportunity of dispersing the French, and forcing them to evacuate Nice and repass the Var. Kellermann hastened on the intelligence from his head-quarters in the Alps, rallied the army in the camp of Donjon, fixed its defensive positions, and ordered absolute inaction until a reinforcement should arrive. The situation of this army was rendered additionally critical at this moment by the appearance in the Mediterranean of the English Admiral Hood, who had put out from Gibraltar with thirty-seven sail, and of Admiral Langara, who had ventured from the Spanish ports with a flotilla of nearly equal strength. Troops disembarked from these squadrons might readily occupy the line of the Var, and take the French on their rear quarters. The cruising of the fleets, moreover, prevented supplies being forwarded by sea, encouraged the rebels in the south, and stimulated Corsica to throw itself into the arms of the English. The French fleets were in Toulon, repairing the damage sustained in the ill-fated expedition to Sardinia, and scarcely ventured to protect the coasters bringing corn from Italy. The Mediterranean ceased to recognise French predominance, and the valuable commerce of the Levant passed from Marseilles to the Greeks and English. Thus, then, the army of Italy had in front the Piedmontese, victorious in several conflicts, and in rear the revolted south and two hostile squadrons.

In the Pyrenees, the war with Spain, declared on the 7th March as a sequel to the death of Louis XVI., had scarcely as yet commenced. The preparations had been tardy on both sides, for Spain, slow, lethargic, and miserably administered, was unfitted to act with promptitude, and France had almost as many enemies on her hands as she could well attend to. Servan, nominated to the command in the Pyrenees, had occupied several months in organising his army, inveighing the while against Pache with such bitterness as Dumouriez had not exceeded. Circumstances had not improved, it would seem, under the auspices of Bouchotte; for, when the campaign was about to open, the general was still loud in his complaints against the minister, who, he alleged, left him in total destitution. France and Spain communicate at two points, Perpignan and Bayonne. To throw an invading corps upon Bayonne and Bordeaux, and so touch La Vendée, was too bold a scheme for that period; besides, the Spanish generals gave the French credit for more powerful means of resistance in that quarter than they actually possessed. In fact, they must have crossed the Landes, Garonne, and Dordogne, obstacles sufficiently formidable to scare them from the project, even had it entered their comprehension. The court of Madrid preferred an attack by Perpignan for several reasons. On that side it had a more solid basis in fortified towns; it relied on the royalists of the south, according to the flattering assurances of the emigrants, and, lastly, it had not entirely forgotten its old pretensions on Roussillon. Accordingly, 4000 or 5000 men being left to guard Arragon, and 15,000 or 18,000, half regulars and half militia, being planted in the Western Pyrenees under General Caro, General Ricardos was dispatched, with 24,000 men, to make a serious attack on Roussillon.

Two principal valleys, that of the Tech and that of the Tet, protrude from the chain of the Pyrenees, and, expanding towards Perpignan, form the first defensive lines on the French side. On the second of these lines, that of the Tet, Perpignan is situated. Ricardos, apprised of the weakness of the French, began by a bold idea. He masked the forts Bellegarde and Les Bains, situated on the first line, and rapidly advanced, with the design of reducing all the detachments scattered in the valleys to lay down their arms, by passing beyond them. The attempt almost answered his expectations. He debouched on the 15th April, repulsed the detachments sent to stop him under General Villot, and spread consternation along the whole frontier. By pushing forward with 10,000 men, he had rendered himself master of Perpignan, but he lacked the requisite daring; besides, all his preparations were not made, and he left the French time to recover from their first surprise.

The command on the French frontier, appearing too extensive for one person, was divided. Servan had the Western Pyrenees assigned to him, and General Deflers, who has been favourably mentioned in the expedition to Holland, the Eastern Pyrenees. The latter rallied the army in front of Perpignan, in a position called the Mas d'Eu. On the 19th May, Ricardos, having then under his command 18,000 men, assaulted the French camp. An obstinate and bloody combat ensued. The brave General Dagobert, retaining in advanced age all the fire of youth, and uniting sound judgment with his courage, succeeded in maintaining himself on the field of battle. Deflers came up with 1800 men of the reserve, and the ground was preserved. The close of day was at hand, and appearances were in favour of an auspicious termination of the strife, when the French soldiers, exhausted with fatigue, suddenly abandoned their positions, and retreated in disorder under Perpignan. The garrison, in alarm, shut the gates and fired upon the troops, whom it mistook for Spaniards. Here another opportunity was presented for falling boldly upon Perpignan and gaining possession of that fortress, which would have offered but a feeble resistance; but Ricardos, who had merely masked Bellegarde and Les Bains, deemed he had carried his daring to its legitimate limits, and returned to invest in form those two petty forts. He captured them towards the end of June, and then again advanced upon the French troops, which occupied very nearly the same positions as before. Thus, on the side of the Pyrenees, at the beginning of July, the fate of Roussillon hung on the issue of a battle.

Emerging upon another theatre of war, more sanguinary and terrible than any we have hitherto described, we shall find an augmentation of its horrors and calamities. La Vendée, vomiting fire and blood, was about to project a formidable column beyond the Loire. When we last traced that scene of hostility, we left the Vendéans flushed with unexpected successes, masters of the town of Thouars, which they had wrested from Quétineau, and contemplating more important enterprises. Instead of marching on Doué and Saumur, they had swept to the south of the theatre of war, designing to dislodge their enemies from the country in the direction of Fontenay and Niort. Lescure and Larochejacquelein, charged with this expedition, marched upon Fontenay towards the middle of May. At first, repulsed by General Sandos, they fell back some distance; but, speedily profiting by the blind confidence with which his first success had inspired the republican officer, they reappeared in a swarm of from 15,000 to 20,000 fighting men, carried Fontenay, despite the efforts of the young and valiant Marceau in the defence, and obliged Chalbos and Sandos to retire in the greatest disorder to Niort. The Vendéans found in Fontenay arms and munitions in great abundance, and they fortified themselves with additional resources, which, joined to those they had gathered at Thouars, enabled them to push the war with increased hopes of success. Lescure published a proclamation to the inhabitants, in which he held out terrible denunciations against those who should extend aid to the republicans. After which, the Vendéans separated, according to their usual custom, in order to superintend the labours of harvest; and a rendezvous was fixed for the 1st of June in the vicinity of Doué.

In the Lower Vendée, where Charette held the sole command, and had not yet connected his movements with those of the other chiefs, the successes had been balanced. Canclaux, commanding at Nantes, had maintained his position at Machecoul, but with difficulty. General Boulard, who was at the head of the troops in Sables, owing to his excellent dispositions and the discipline of his army, had occupied the Lower Vendée for two months, and even pushed his advanced posts to the very environs of Palluau. On the 17th May, however, he was obliged to retreat to La Motte-Achart, in the immediate vicinity of Sables, and he there found himself in the greatest embarrassment, because his two best battalions, entirely composed of citizens of Bordeaux, determined to withdraw, either from a wish to look after their own affairs, which they had relinquished on a sudden impulse, or from discontentment with the 31st May.

The labours of the field had induced some repose in the Lower as in the Higher Vendée, and for a few days the war was intermitted, and its more active scourge deferred till the beginning of June.

General Berroyer, whose command extended originally over the whole theatre of war, had been displaced, and his province divided amongst several generals. Saumur, Niort, and Sables, were assigned to the army known as that of the coasts of Rochelle, which was intrusted to Biron; Angers, Nantes, and the Lower Loire, were comprehended in the portion of the army known as that of the coasts of Brest, which was confided to Canclaux, general at Nantes; and, lastly, the coasts of Cherbourg had been given to Wimpffen, who had since become, as we have seen, the leader of the insurgents of Calvados.

Biron, transferred from the frontier of the Rhine to that of Italy, and thence to Vendée, repaired with repugnance to that scene of devastation, where in truth his aversion to participate in the excesses of civil war eventually compromised his reputation for patriotism. He arrived on the 27th May at Niort, and found the army in frightful disorder. It was composed of recruits enrolled by compulsion, or through their own zeal, in the neighbouring districts, and confusedly cast upon La Vendée, without instruction or training, and without any supplies in store. Chiefly peasants and industrious citizens, who had left their occupations with regret, they were ready to disperse at the first untoward accident. Indeed, advantage would have accrued by sending the greater part of them back at once, for they did nothing but mischief both in towns and in the country. They were a useless incumbrance in the insurgent districts, eating up the provisions, propagating disorder, giving way to causeless panics, and often drawing into their flight organised battalions, which, if left to themselves, would have fought to better purpose. These bands all appeared with their leaders ready named in the respective localities, who styled themselves generals, boasted of their armies, refused to obey, and even opposed the dispositions of the superior officers. About the city of Orleans battalions were formed, well known in this war as "the battalions of Orleans." They were composed of clerks, shop-boys, lacqueys, and of all the youths gathered from the sections of Paris and sent at the heels of Santerre. They were amalgamated with troops drafted from the army of the north, fifty men having been detached from each battalion. But it was a difficult task to assimilate such heterogeneous materials, and equally so to find them arms and clothing. Every thing was deficient; even the pay could not be furnished, and as it was unequal between the troops of the line and the volunteers, it occasioned frequent turmoils and mutinies.

The convention dispatched commissioner upon commissioner to organise this multitude. These functionaries were to be found at Tours, Saumur, Niort, Rochelle, and Nantes. They disputed with and thwarted each other, and effectually puzzled the generals. The executive council likewise maintained agents on the spot, and the minister Bouchotte had inundated the country with his emissaries, all chosen from amongst the Jacobins and Cordeliers. These latter exercised conflicting powers as against the representatives, deemed it an exhibition of zeal to exhaust a district with requisitions, and accused of despotism and treason the generals who endeavoured to check the insubordination of the troops, or prevent useless vexations. From this conflict of authorities there resulted multitudinous accusations and recriminations, and an inextricable confusion in the issuing of orders. Biron found it hopeless to expect obedience, and he dared not put his army in motion lest it should disband at the first shock, or pillage right and left on its march. Such is a faithful picture of the forces which the republic had at that period in La Vendée.

Biron repaired to Tours, and arranged an eventual plan with the representatives, which consisted in marching four columns of 10,000 men each from the circumference to the centre, so soon as this confused multitude should be brought into some degree of organisation. The four points of departure were to be the Bridges of Cé, Saumur, Chinon, and Niort. In the mean time, he proceeded to visit the Lower Vendée, where he considered the danger greater than elsewhere. He was with reason apprehensive that communications would be established between the Vendéans and the English. Supplies and troops disembarked in the Marais might greatly aggravate the evil, and render the war interminable. A fleet of ten sail had been telegraphed, and it was known that the Breton emigrants had received orders to assemble in the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. Thus appearances fully justified the fears of Biron and his visit to the Lower Vendée.

Meanwhile, the Vendéans had gathered, true to their appointment, on the 1st of June. They had, since last in the field, introduced a greater degree of regularity amongst themselves, and named a council to govern the country occupied by their armies. An adventurer, who represented himself as Bishop of Agra and nuncio from the pope, presided over this council, and by his activity in blessing standards and celebrating solemn masses, he wound up the enthusiasm of the Vendéans to an extraordinary height, and thus rendered his imposture highly beneficial. They had not yet chosen a generalissimo, but each chief commanded the peasants of his own quarter, an agreement subsisting amongst them that they should act in concert in all their operations. These chiefs had issued a proclamation in the name of Louis XVII., and of the Count de Provence, as regent of the kingdom during the minority of the young prince; and they called themselves "Commanders of the royal and catholic armies." Their project at the present moment was to occupy the line of the Loire, and advance upon Doué and Saumur. The enterprise was boldly conceived, and easy of execution in the actual state of affairs. On the 7th they entered Doué, and arrived on the 9th before Saumur. As soon as their object transpired, General Salomon, who was in Thouars with 3000 good soldiers, received orders to march upon their track. He obeyed, but found them too strong; he could not have molested them without ensuring his own destruction, so he returned to Thouars, and from Thouars to Niort. The troops at Saumur had taken post in the vicinity of the town, on the road to Fontevrault, in the intrenchments of Nantilly, and on the heights of Bournan. The Vendéans appeared, attacked the column under Berthier, were repulsed by a well-directed fire, but returned in force and drove back Berthier, who was wounded. The dismounted gendarmes, two battalions of Orleans, and the cuirassiers, still resisted. They unfortunately lost their colonel, whereupon the flight commenced, and all rushed pell-mell into the town, with the Vendéans at their heels. General Coustard, commanding the battalions planted on the heights of Bournan, still remained outside. He perceived himself separated from the republican troops, who had been driven into Saumur, and formed the daring resolution of re-entering it also, taking the Vendéans in the rear. It was necessary to cross a bridge on which the conquerors had just placed a battery. The brave Coustard ordered a corps of cuirassiers he had under his orders to charge the battery. "Where are you sending us?" said they. "To death!" replied the general; "the welfare of the republic requires it." The cuirassiers sprang forward, but the battalions of Orleans broke up and abandoned their general and the cuirassiers as they were charging the battery. The cowardice of this rabble rendered fruitless the heroism of the warriors, and Coustard, finding it impossible to penetrate into Saumur, retired to Angers.

Saumur was occupied on the 9th June, and the citadel surrendered the day after. The Vendéans, thus masters of the course of the Loire, had the option of marching on Nantes or on La Flèche, Le Mans, and Paris. Terror would have gone before them, and all had inevitably succumbed to their power. During this period, Biron was in the Lower Vendée, where, by an inspection of the coasts, he considered he was obviating dangers still more serious and substantial.

France was menaced by all these various perils simultaneously. The allies, pressing the sieges of Valenciennes, Condé, and Mayence, were on the eve of reducing those fortresses, the bulwarks of her frontiers. The Vosges in agitation, and the Jura in open revolt, afforded an easy access to invasion on the side of the Rhine. The army of Italy, shattered by the Piedmontese, had at its back the revolt of the south and the English squadrons. The Spaniards, in front of the French camp under Perpignan, threatened to carry it by an assault, and to render themselves masters of Roussillon. The insurgents of Lozère were ready to join the Vendéans along the Loire, and such was the project of the author of that revolt. The Vendéans, masters of Saumur and the course of the Loire, had only to choose their theatre, since they possessed all the means of executing the boldest incursions into the interior. Lastly, the federalists, marching from Caen, Bordeaux, and Marseilles, were preparing to stir up all the districts on their routes.

The situation of France, in the month of July 1793, was the more desperate, since on each individual point a mortal blow could be struck at her independence. The allies of the north, by neglecting the fortresses, had only to march upon Paris, and they must have driven the convention on the Loire, where it would have been received by the Vendéan rifles. The Austrians and Piedmontese were able to have executed an invasion by the Maritime Alps, extinguished the French army, and swept along the whole south as conquerors. The Spaniards might have readily advanced by Bayonne, and effected a junction with the Vendéans; or, if they preferred Roussillon, have thrown their columns boldly on the Lozère, but a short distance from the frontier, and set the south in a flame on that side. Lastly, the English, instead of cruising in the Mediterranean, had every inducement to have disembarked troops in La Vendée, and propelled them from Saumur on Paris.

But the foreign and domestic foes of the convention lacked that which assures victory in a war of revolution. The allies acted without union, and, under the boastful pretence of a holy war, concealed the most selfish views. The Austrians coveted Valenciennes; the King of Prussia, Mayence; the English, Dunkirk; the Piedmontese, the recovery of Chambéry and Nice; the Spaniards, the most disinterested of all, nevertheless indulged a lurking inclination for Roussillon; in fine, the English, again, were more eager to sweep the Mediterranean with their fleets, and secure a convenient port within it, than carry opportune succours to La Vendée. Besides this universal emulation for individual aggrandisement, which prevented the allies from extending their views beyond objects of immediate profit, they were all dull method and timidity in war, and defended with the antiquated military routine the antiquated political routine in behalf of which they had taken up arms.

As to the Vendéans, insurgents against the genius of the revolution, from which their simple and contracted minds revolted, they fought as valiant riflemen, but without comprehensive views. The federalists, distributed over the extensive surface of the country, having to communicate at great distances in order to concert their operations, rising with hesitation and secret dread against the central authority, and animated by but lukewarm passions, could scarcely act otherwise than with tardiness and vacillation. Moreover, they inwardly reproached themselves with endangering their country by a culpable diversion. They began to feel that it was criminal to discuss whether a man should be a revolutionist after Pétion and Vergniaud, or after Robespierre and Danton, at a moment when all Europe was assailing their native land; and they perceived that, in such an emergency, there was only one expedient course of action, namely, the most energetic. Already, in fact, the various factions starting up around them warned them of their folly. It was not alone the old Constituents, but the agents of the extinguished court, the sectaries of the church, all the partisans, in short, of absolute power, who arose at once; and it became obvious to their understandings, that all further opposition to the revolution would inevitably tend to the advantage of the enemies of all liberty and nationality.

Such were the causes that rendered the allies so shortsighted and timid, the Vendéans so confined and stunted, the federalists so uncertain, and the ultimate triumph of the convention over the internal rebels and over Europe so sure. The Mountaineers alone, animated by an absorbing passion, one sole idea, the safety of the revolution, and invigorated by that exaltation of mind which discovers resources in the moments of peril, detecting means novel and daring, never deeming them too hazardous, unscrupulous, or costly, if they be salutary, were appointed to disconcert, by an unexpected and sublime defence, enemies slow, formal, and loosely cemented, and crush factions which were labouring for behoof of the old order of things in various degrees, for the revolution in like variety, and bound together by no common tie or distinct determinate aim.*

* ["For all the advantages they gained, the convention were indebted to the energy of their measures, the ability of their counsels, and the enthusiasm of their subjects. If history has nothing to show comparable to the crimes they committed, it has few similar instances of undaunted resolution to commemorate. Impartial justice requires that this praise should be bestowed on the committee of public safety; if the cruelty of their internal administration exceeded the worst despotism of the emperors, the dignity of their external conduct rivalled the noblest instances of Roman heroism."—Alison's History of Europe.]

The convention, amidst the extraordinary circumstances in which it was placed, gave way to no emotion of despondency. Whilst the fortified places or intrenched camps checked for a time the enemies upon the different frontiers, the committee of public welfare devoted every hour of the day to the duties of re-organising the armies, completing them by means of the levy of 300,000 men decreed in March, forwarding instructions to the generals, and expediting funds and supplies. It negotiated with all the local administrations which evinced an intention of retaining, for behoof of the federalist cause, the stores destined for the armies, and succeeded in persuading them to desist, upon the all-sufficient motive of public safety.

Whilst such expedients were employed with regard to the external enemy, the convention pursued measures not less efficacious against its internal adversaries. The best resource against an antagonist who is doubtful of his rights and power, is to assume a full self-consciousness of legitimacy and might. It was thus the convention acted. We have already mentioned the energetic decrees it had passed on the first intelligence of disaffection. Several towns having failed in immediate submission, not for an instant was the idea entertained of treating, in a spirit of concession, with those whose proceedings took the decided character of rebellion. The Lyonnese having firmly refused to obey, and to send the apprehended patriots to Paris, it ordered its commissioners attendant upon the army of the Alps to employ force, without heeding the difficulties or the dangers those commissioners were incurring at Grenoble, where they had the Piedmontese in front, and all the insurgents of the Isère and Rhone in their rear. It also enjoined them to make Marseilles return to its duty. It allowed only three days for all the administrations to retract their equivocal resolutions; and, lastly, it sent to Vernon certain gendarmes and a few thousands of the Parisian citizens, in order promptly to put down the insurgents of the Calvados, who were nearest in position to the capital.

The great instrument of the constitution was not neglected; and eight days sufficed to accomplish that work, which was intended rather as a centre of union and attraction than a substantial plan of legislation. It had been chiefly composed by Hérault Séchelles. According to the scheme propounded, every Frenchman, twenty-one years of age, was a citizen, and capable of exercising political rights, without any qualification of fortune or property. The citizens being assembled together, were to nominate a deputy for every fifty thousand souls. The deputies, composing a single chamber, could only sit one year. They were to frame decrees for all that might concern the pressing exigencies of the state, and such decrees were to be of immediate efficacy. They were also to make laws for all that concerned matters of general interest and of minor urgency; but such laws became obligatory only if within a given period the primary assemblies lodged no reclamation. On the 1st of May in each year, the primary assemblies were to meet, of right and without convocation, to renew the deputation. The primary assemblies might demand conventions to modify the constitutional act. The executive power was to be intrusted to twenty-four members named by electors, and this was the only indirect election. The primary assemblies were to name electors, which electors nominated candidates, and the legislative body reduced by elimination these candidates to twenty-four. These twenty-four members of council were to choose the generals, ministers, and agents of all kinds, selecting them forth their own body. They were to direct and superintend them, and always to remain responsible. The executive council was to be renewed as to half its members every year. Lastly, this very brief and democratic constitution, in which the government was reduced to a mere temporary delegation, respected a solitary vestige of the former system, the communes, altering neither their functions nor the extent of their jurisdiction. The energy they had so often displayed ensured their retention on this planed tablet, this tabula rasa, where not a trace of the past was to be found. Almost without discussion, and in the course of a few days, this constitution was adopted;* and at the moment the whole measure was finally voted, a salvo of cannon reverberated through Paris, and exclamations of joy and rapture broke forth in all quarters. Thousands of copies were printed and distributed throughout the whole of France. The only opposition it encountered was on the part of certain of the agitators who had been instrumental in preparing the 31st of May.

The reader will probably remember one Varlet, vociferating in public thoroughfares; one Leclerc, a Lyonnese, so violent in his harangues at the Jacobin Club as to be even suspected by Marat for his frantic ebullitions; and one Jacques Roux, so morose to the unfortunate Louis XVI., when he would have confided his last testament to his keeping: well, all these men had signalised themselves in the last insurrection, and now exercised great influence in the committee of the Evêché and in the club of Cordeliers. They were dissatisfied that the constitution contained no stringent provision against forestallers; wherefore they drew up a petition, got it signed in the streets, and then flew to arouse the Cordeliers, exclaiming that the constitution was incomplete, since it pronounced no pains or penalties upon the worst enemies of the people. Legendre vainly strove to resist this movement; he was stigmatised as a moderate; and the petition, being adopted by the society, was presented in its name to the convention. The Mountain murmured indignantly upon its being brought to the bar; and Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois inveighed with warmth against its terms, and eventually procured its rejection. They then repaired to the Jacobin Club, to descant upon the danger of these perfidious exaggerations, which merely tended, they said, to bewilder the people, and could only originate with men subsidised by the implacable foes of the republic. "The most popular constitution that ever existed," said Robespierre, "has just ema-

* It was decreed on the 24th June, and the scheme had been submitted on the 10th.

["Hérault de Séchelles was the legislator of the Mountain, as Condorcet was to have been of the Gironde. In a few days this new constitution was adopted in the convention, and submitted to the approval of the primary assemblies. It may be easily imagined in what spirit it was framed, with the ideas then predominant on democratic government. The Constituents passed for aristocrats: the law they had established was viewed as an infraction on the rights of the people, because it imposed conditions upon the exercise of political franchises; because it did not consecrate the most absolute equality; because it appointed deputies and magistrates to be nominated by electors, and those electors by the people; because it limited, in certain cases, the national sovereignty, excluding a portion of the active citizens from high political functions, and the purely indigent from the functions of active citizens; in fine, because, instead of fixing population as the sole basis of rights, it combined that essential in all its arrangements with a pecuniary test. The constitutional law of 1793 established the pure government of the multitude: not only did it recognise the people as the source of all power, but it likewise conferred upon them its exercise. A sovereignty without restrictions; magistracies exposed to constantly occurring changes; immediate elections, in which every individual had a concurrent voice; primary assemblies, which met without convocation, at a fixed period, to nominate representatives and control their acts; a national assembly, annually renewed, which was, properly speaking, but a committee of the primary assemblies—such was that constitution. As it called the multitude to govern, as it entirely disorganised authority, it was impracticable at any era; but it was pre-eminently so at a moment of general war. The Mountaineer party, instead of the extremest democracy, had need of the most concentrated dictatorship. The constitution was suspended as soon as made, and the revolutionary government, additionally strengthened, was maintained until the peace.'—Mignet, vol. ii. pp. 13, 14.]

nated from an assembly formerly counter-revolutionary, but now purged of men who impeded its progress and threw obstacles before all its endeavours. At the present moment, all brightness and purity, that assembly has perfected the most estimable, the most popular work that was ever given to man; and an individual, cloaked with the pretence of patriotism, who boasts of loving the people better than we, stirs up the citizens of all grades, to show, forsooth, that a constitution, fitted to unite all France in the closest union, is unsuitable to them! Beware of such manœuvres, distrust those unfrocked priests,* the emissaries of Austria! Beware of the new mask assumed by the aristocrats! I discern fresh guilt in the future, which is perhaps not far from bursting into light; but we will at once expose it, and crush the enemies of the people under whatever form they may present themselves." Collot d'Herbois spoke with equal vehemence. He maintained that the enemies of the republic were above all things anxious to be justified in saying to the departments—"Behold, Paris approves the language of Jacques Roux!"

Unanimous acclamations greeted the two orators. The Jacobins, who piqued themselves on uniting political talent with revolutionary passion, prudence with energy, sent a deputation to the Cordeliers. Collot-d'Herbois was appointed its leader. He was received by the Cordeliers with the consideration due to one of the most renowned members of the Jacobin Club and the Mountain. For the society which had deputed him, also, profound respect was professed. The petition was retracted, Jacques Roux and Leclerc were expelled, Varlet obtained pardon solely on account of his youth, and Legendre received an apology for the somewhat unpalatable expressions wherewith he had been assailed during the previous sitting. The constitution, thus promptly vindicated, was forthwith distributed through France, to be sanctioned by the primary assemblies.

Thus the convention held out to the departments, on the one hand a constitution, and on the other a decree which left them but three days to form their decision. The constitution justified the Mountain from any selfish scheme of usurpation, and furnished a pretext for rallying round a legalised authority; the decree specifying three days allowed no time for hesitation, but imposed obedience as a matter of involuntary choice.

Several departments in fact succumbed, and others persisted in their first resolutions. But these latter, wasting time in exchanging addresses and deputations, seemed each to throw upon the other the initiative in action. Besides, the intervening distances were sad obstacles to rapid correspondence and concentration. But, above all, the lack of revolutionary fire caused that strenuous exertion and exalted capacity of drawing forth resources necessary for success, which are its attendant qualities, to lie dormant. However well inclined the masses may be, they are always repugnant to sacrifices, unless superinduced by some commanding, impassioned spirits. It would have needed violent measures, in truth, to stimulate effectually the moderate tradesmen of the boroughs, to induce them to strap on the knapsack and march, to contribute funds, and to quicken their determinations. But the Girondists, who condemned all such measures in the Mountaineers, were debarred from themselves employing them. The Bordeaux merchants thought they had performed a feat when they spoke with unusual vivacity in the sections, and they had never issued beyond their own walls. The Marseillese, somewhat more prompt, had sent 6000 men to Avignon; but they did not compose even that small army of their own citizens—they had substituted paid soldiers. The Lyonnese were awaiting the junction of the men of Provence and Languedoc; the Normans appeared a little cooled in their zeal; the Bretons alone were true to their purpose, and had of themselves filled up the ranks of their battalions.

At Caen, the main centre of the insurrection, considerable agitation prevailed. The columns which had moved from that point were the earliest destined to encounter the troops of the convention, and a first engagement was naturally anticipated with great anxiety. The proscribed deputies, congregated around Wimpffen, complained of his tardiness, and thought they detected the royalist in him. Wimpffen at length, urged on all sides, ordered Puisaye, on the 13th July, to push his advanced guard to Vernon, and intimated at the same time that he was himself on the point of marching with all his forces. Accordingly, on the 13th, Puisaye advanced towards Pacy, and fell in with the levies from Paris, accompanied by a few hundreds of gendarmes, when some shots were exchanged between the two parties in the woods. The next day, the federalists occupied Pacy, and appeared to have slightly the advantage. But the day after, the troops of the convention came up with artillery. At the first discharge, terror spread through the ranks of the federalists; they dispersed and fled in confusion to Evreux. The Bretons, displaying greater firmness, retired in comparative order, but they were enveloped in the precipitate flight of the others. Intelligence of this defeat caused great consternation in Calvados, and the various administrations began heartily to repent of their imprudence. Upon its being known at Caen, Wimpffen assembled the deputies, and proposed they should intrench themselves in the town and defend it to the last extremity. Then, opening his mind more freely, he told them there was only one mode of sustaining the contest, which was to interest a powerful ally in their behalf, and, if they were agreeable, he could procure them one; intimating, in sufficiently intelligible terms, that he alluded to the English cabinet. He concluded by expressing his belief that a republic was impracticable, and that a return to monarchy would be no great calamity. The Girondists repudiated with disdain all offers of this description, and testified the most sincere indignation. Some amongst them were then made sensible of the rashness of their enterprise, and the danger of unfurling any standard whatsoever, since all the discomfited factions would assuredly rally under it, to vent their malice against the republic. They lost not all hope, however, but determined to withdraw to Bordeaux, where certain of the more sanguine deemed it possible to operate a movement thoroughly republican, and more auspicious in its result than that of Calvados and Brittany. They accordingly departed with the Breton battalions, who wended their way homewards, designing to embark at Brest. They assumed the garb of common soldiers, and sought concealment in the ranks of the battalion of Finisterre. It was necessary to adopt this precaution since the defeat of Vernon, as all the administrations, eager to submit and to give the convention proofs of zeal, would have undoubtedly apprehended them. They thus traversed a great part of Normandy and Brittany, amid continual perils and deplorable sufferings, and ultimately reached Brest, in the environs whereof they lurked until an opportunity offered for proceeding to Bordeaux. Barbaroux, Pétion, Salles, Louvet, Meilhan, Guadet, Kervélegan, Gorsas, Girey-Dupré, a co-editor with Brissot, Marchenna, a young Spaniard who had visited France in quest of freedom, and Riouffe, a young man attached by enthusiasm to the Girondists, composed that band of illustrious fugitives, hunted as traitors to their country, although all were ready to lay down their lives for it, and still conceived they were serving it even when compromising it by a most hazardous diversion.

In Brittany, and in the departments of the west and the upper basin of the Loire, the administrations hastened to record their contrition, in order to avoid the ban of outlawry. The constitution, disseminated in all quarters, was the pretext for universal submission. The convention, it was said, intended neither to perpetuate itself nor to usurp power, inasmuch as it presented a constitution, and such a constitution, also, as promised a speedy termination to the reign of faction, and established the simplest government that had ever been devised. At the same time, the Mountaineer municipalities and Jacobin Clubs redoubled their energy, and the quiet, well-meaning partisans of the Gironde shrunk before a revolution which they lacked strength to combat, and which they would have equally failed in vigour to defend. From this moment Toulouse sought to justify itself in the eyes of Paris. The people of Bordeaux did not formally submit, but they recalled their advanced guard, and ceased to boast of a march upon Paris. Two other important events concurred to terminate the dangers of the convention in the west and south, namely, the defence of Nantes and the dispersion of the rebels of the Lozère.

We left the Vendéans at Saumur, masters of the course of the Loire, and able, if they had appreciated their position, to make an attempt on Paris, which would have probably succeeded, as La Flèche and Le Mans were without any means of resistance. Young Bonchamps, who alone carried his views beyond La Vendée, upheld the expediency of an incursion into Brittany, with the design of gaining a port on the ocean, and afterwards marching upon Paris. But his companions in arms were incapable of estimating such suggestions, and he had the mortification of exhorting in vain. The true capital upon which, in their eyes, it behoved them to march, was Nantes; neither their comprehension nor their hopes went beyond that point. It must be allowed, however, there were several good reasons for so concluding: Nantes opened communications with the sea, assured the possession of the whole country, and after its capture bolder projects might be attempted; moreover, the soldiers were not torn from their homes, an important consideration with peasants, who never willingly lost sight of their village steeple. Charette, also, master of the Lower Vendée, after having made a false demonstration on Sables, had seized upon Machecoul, and was now at the gates of Nantes. He had never acted in concert with the chiefs of the Upper Vendée, but he offered to combine with them upon this occasion. He undertook to assault Nantes on the left flank, whilst the main army should attack it on the right; and with such a combination of means it was scarcely possible to anticipate failure.

The Vendéans accordingly evacuated Saumur, descended towards Angers, and prepared to march from Angers to Nantes by defiling along the right bank of the Loire. Their army was much diminished, because many of the peasants refused to engage in so distant an expedition; nevertheless, it was still composed of nearly 30,000 men. They appointed a generalissimo, making choice of Cathelineau, in order to flatter the peasants and win their attachment the more strongly. Lescure, having been wounded, was left in the interior of the country to beat up for additional recruits, to keep the troops in Niort in check, and to prevent the siege of Nantes being troubled.

In the interim, the commission of representatives sitting at Tours applied for succours in all quarters, and pressed Biron, who was upon the coast, to proceed with all dispatch upon the track of the Vendéans. Not contented with recalling Biron, it ordered movements in his absence, and directed upon Nantes all the troops that could be mustered from Saumur. Biron lost no time in replying to the exhortations of the commission. He sanctioned, he said, the movement executed without his orders, but for himself he was obliged to guard Sables and Rochelle, towns of greater importance, in his estimation, than Nantes; the battalions from the Gironde, the best in his army, were about to leave him, and he had to replace them as best he could; it was impossible for him to move his army without seeing it disband and give way to pillage before his eyes, so loose was its discipline: at the utmost, therefore, he could detach from it 3000 organised troops, with which inconsiderable force, he added, it would be mere folly to march on Saumur and adventure into the heart of a hostile country. Biron wrote at the same time to the committee of public welfare, tendering his resignation, on account of the representatives thus arrogating the command. The committee rejoined, that he was justified in his remonstrance, inasmuch as the representatives might advise or propose operations, but ought not to order them, and that it was his province alone to take the measures he judged fitting for the safety of Nantes, Rochelle, and Niort. Biron, notwithstanding, used all possible exertions to form a small moveable army, wherewith he might hasten to the relief of the besieged town.

During this interval, the Vendéans had quitted Angers, and on the 28th came in sight of Nantes. They summoned the garrison in threatening terms, but being scornfully disregarded, they got ready for an attack. It was appointed to be made on both sides, at two in the morning of the 29th. Canclaux had under his orders merely 5000 regular troops, and nearly as many national guards, to defend an extensive circuit, intersected by several streams from the Loire. He made the best dispositions, and imparted the highest courage to the garrison. At the prescribed hour, Charette attacked on the side of the bridges; but Cathelineau, who operated on the right bank, and had the most difficult part of the enterprise committed to him, was stopped at the post of Niort, where a few hundred men made a most heroic resistance. The attack, thus retarded on that side, became more difficult of execution. The Vendéans, however, spread out behind the hedges and garden-walls, gained ground and pressed closely on the town. Canclaux, general-in-chief, and Beysser, commandant of the place, kept the republican troops firm in all quarters. Cathelineau, on his part, redoubled his efforts, and already he had fought his way far into a suburb, when a ball struck him in a vital part. His soldiers retired with precipitation, bearing him away on their shoulders. From that moment the attack slackened. After a conflict of eighteen hours' duration, the Vendéans dispersed, and the town was saved.

There was no part of the defensive force but did its duty efficiently on that day. The national guard had emulated the fortitude of the troops of the line, and even the mayor of the place had received a wound. The next day the Vendéans threw themselves into boats, and returned to the interior of the country. Henceforth, the opportunity for great undertakings was lost to them; they could no longer aspire to execute any important movement, or extend their hopes beyond, at the utmost, the occupation of their own districts. At this period, Biron, hastening to succour Nantes, arrived at Angers with such efficient troops as he had been enabled to collect, and Westermann appeared in La Vendée with his Germanic legion.

Nantes was no sooner delivered from this imminent peril, than the authorities, entirely disposed in favour of the Girondists, determined to unite with the insurgents of Calvados. They actually passed a resolution hostile to the convention; but Canclaux denounced it with such vehemence, that the Nantese were speedily reduced to order.

Thus dangers of the most serious character were happily obviated on that side. An event not less important occurred in Lozère, namely, the submission of 30,000 insurgents, who might have readily opened a communication with the Vendéans, or with the Spaniards through Roussillon.

By a truly fortunate chance, the deputy Fabre, commissioned to the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, was on the spot at the moment of the revolt, and displayed that manly promptitude in the conjuncture which subsequently carried him into the arms of death on the Pyrenees. He made sure of the administrations, put the whole population under arms, summoned to his aid all the forces in the vicinity, both gendarmes and regular troops, and stirred up the Cantal, the Upper Loire, and the Puy-de-Dôme. The insurgents, thus stricken by superior vigour at the first onset, and assailed on all sides, were scattered with rapidity, driven for refuge into the woods, and their leader, the ex-Constituent Charrier, himself captured by the vigilance of the conquerors. In his papers evidence transpired that his project was a ramification of the grand plot discovered six months previously in Brittany, the chief whereof, La Rouarie, had died without being able to realise his schemes. Tranquillity was consequently assured in the mountains of the centre and the south, the communications of the army of the Pyrenees were guaranteed, and the valley of the Rhone had no longer one of its flanks infested by revolted mountaineers.

An unexpected victory over the Spaniards in Roussillon fully re-established the submission of the south. When last on that scene of action, we saw the Spaniards, after their first march into the valleys of the Tech and the Tet, retrograde to capture Bellegarde and Les Bains, and subsequently return to plant themselves in front of the French camp. After indulging in a long survey, they at length attacked it on the 17th July. The French scarcely mustered 12,000 raw recruits; the Spaniards, on the other hand, boasted 15,000 or 16,000 well-disciplined troops. Ricardos, too much bent on enveloping the French positions, distributed his assault over too wide a space. The young volunteers of France, encouraged by Barbantane and the valiant Dagobert, held firm in their intrenchments, and, after the most desperate efforts, the Spaniards gave token of a disposition to retire. Dagobert, who had been awaiting that critical moment, rushed furiously upon them; but one of his battalions suddenly disbanded and retreated in disorder. On witnessing this untoward accident, Deflers and Barbantane moved opportunely to the aid of Dagobert, and their combined forces fell with such violence upon the Spaniards, that they were driven to a considerable distance. This engagement, fought on the 17th July, raised the courage of the French soldiers, and, in the opinion of one historian, produced all the effect on the Pyrenean frontier of Valmy on that of Champagne the year preceding.

In the direction of the Alps, Dubois-Crancé, placed between malecontent Savoy, unfriendly Switzerland, and insurgent Grenoble and Lyons, conducted himself in so arduous a position with equal vigour and judgment. Whilst the sectional authorities took in his presence the federalist oath, he administered the opposite oath to the club and his army, and stood prepared to avail himself of the first favourable opportunity for acting. Thus, having seized the correspondence of the authorities, he found distinct proof of their scheme to coalesce with the Lyonnese, whereupon he denounced them to the people of Grenoble as striving to provoke the dissolution of the republic by a civil war; and, profiting by the momentary exasperation he aroused, he obtained their deprivation of office, and the restoration of all authority to the old municipality. Thenceforth at ease regarding Grenoble, he devoted himself to re-organise the army of the Alps, with the view of ensuring possession of Savoy and executing the decrees of the convention against Lyons and Marseilles. He changed all the staffs, re-established order in the battalions, and incorporated therein the recruits from the levy of 300,000 men. Seeing the departments of La Lozère and La Haute Loire had employed their contingents in stifling the revolt of their mountainous districts, he endeavoured to supply their deficiency by requisitions. After these first cares were attended to, he dispatched General Carteaux with a strong body of infantry, and the legion levied in Savoy, under the name of "the legion of the Allobroges," to plant himself at Valence, in order to occupy the course of the Rhone, and prevent the junction of the Marseillese with the Lyonnese. Carteaux, taking his departure in the early part of July, proceeded by forced marches on Valence, and from Valence on Saint-Esprit, where he enveloped the corps of Nîmois, dispersing a part and ingrafting the remainder on his own ranks, and thus secured both banks of the Rhone. Without a moment's delay, he threw himself on Avignon, where the Marseillese had established themselves some time previously.

Whilst these events were passing in and around Grenoble, Lyons, always affecting the stanchest fidelity to the republic, and vowing to maintain its unity and its indivisibility, refused obedience to the decree of the convention, which removed to the revolutionary tribunal of Paris the proceedings instituted against divers patriots. Its committee and its staff were filled with concealed royalists. Rambaud, president of the committee, and Précy, commander of the departmental force, were secretly devoted to the cause of the emigration. Misled by designing and dangerous instigators, the unfortunate Lyonnese were bent on compromising themselves past recall with the convention, which, from this time forth universally obeyed and victorious, was sure to visit on the last city in revolt the full measure of vengeance reserved for vanquished federalism. Meanwhile, they assembled in arms at Saint-Etienne, and harboured deserters of all kinds; but still labouring to avoid the appearance of open revolt, they gave free passage to the convoys proceeding to the frontiers, and ordered the liberation of the deputies Noël-Pointe, Santeyra, and Lesterpt-Beauvais, who had been arrested by the neighbouring communes.

The Jura was partially tranquillised. The representatives Bassal and Garnier, whom we left with 1500 men nearly encompassed by 15,000, had withdrawn their inadequate force, and attempted the ways of negotiation. In them they were more successful, the insurgent administrations having undertaken to terminate the movement by the acceptance of the constitution.

Nearly two months had now elapsed since the 2d of June (for the close of July was at hand); Valenciennes and Mayence were still threatened, but Normandy, Brittany, and almost all the departments of the west, had returned to obedience. Nantes had just been delivered from the Vendéans, the malecontents of Bordeaux dared not venture beyond their own walls, La Lozère was reduced, the Pyrenees were rendered secure for a time, Grenoble was quieted, Marseilles was isolated from Lyons by the successes of Carteaux, and Lyons, albeit refusing to obey decrees, still shrunk from declaring war. The authority of the convention, therefore, was almost fully re-established in the interior. On the one hand, the tardiness of the federalists, their want of union and concert, and their half-measures—on the other, the prompt energy of the convention, the unity of its power, its central position, its habit of command, and its alternate policy of conciliation and peremptory enforcement—had decided the triumph of the Mountain over this the last effort of the Girondists. We, as Frenchmen, must rejoice at the result, for at a moment when France was assailed on every side, the most worthy to wield supremacy was the strongest. Out of their own mouths the federalists were condemned: "Honest men," said they, "have never known how to employ energy."

But, whilst they, the federalists, were falling in every quarter before the ascendancy of the convention, a tragical accident occurred to stir up relentless wrath against them.

At this period lived in Calvados a young female, in her twenty-fifth year, uniting to great beauty a firm and independent character. Her name was Charlotte Corday d'Armans. Her manners were pure and fault less, but her mind was active and unquiet. She had quitted the paternal roof, to live with greater freedom in the house of a friend at Caen. Her father had formerly vindicated, in certain publications, the privileges of his province, at a time when France was reduced to uphold burghal and provincial privileges as precious immunities. His daughter Charlotte had, like many females of the time, embraced the cause of the revolution with ardour, and, after the manner of Madame Roland, was intoxicated with the idea of a republic based on the authority of laws and teeming with virtues. The Girondists appeared to her striving to realise her dreams; the Mountaineers seemed the only obstacles to that happy issue; and, upon learning the events of the 31st May, she resolved to avenge her cherished orators. The war of Calvados commenced; she conceived that the death of the chief of the anarchists, concurring with the insurrection of the departments, would ensure the victory of the latter; she consequently resolved to perform a signal act of devotedness, and consecrate to her country a life whereof no partner, children, or family, formed the absorbing care or charm. Deceiving her father, she wrote to him that the troubles of France becoming every day more terrible, she was on the point of seeking security and quietude in England. When so writing, she was already directing her steps to Paris. Before her departure from Caen, she was solicitous to see the deputies who were the objects of her enthusiasm. With this view, she feigned a pretext, and requested from Barbaroux a letter of recommendation to the minister of the interior, having, she said, papers to claim on behalf of a friend, a late canoness. Barbaroux gave her one for the deputy Duperret, the friend of Garat. His companions, who were present at the interview, and heard her express her hatred against the Mountaineers, and her zeal for a pure and regular republic, were struck with her beauty and affected by her ingenuous sentiments. Not the remotest allusion to her project started suspicion in their minds.

Arrived at Paris, Charlotte Corday reflected for a time on the choice of her victim. Danton and Robespierre were sufficiently renowned in the ranks of the Mountain to merit her preference, but Marat was the man whom the provinces regarded as the most detestable of all, and as the chief of the anarchists. Her first wish was to smite Marat on the summit of the Mountain and in the midst of his friends; but this design was no longer practicable, for Marat was in a condition which prevented him from attending the convention. The reader can have scarcely forgotten that he had voluntarily suspended his functions for a certain interval; but, perceiving that the trial of the Girondists could not be speedily determined, he put an end to the farce and re-appeared in his place. Soon after, one of those inflammatory attacks, which, in revolutions, terminate such tempestuous existences as are not cut short by the scaffold, obliged him to retire into the tranquillity of his own abode. But even there, nothing could restrain his insatiable activity; he passed great part of the day in his bath, abundantly supplied with pens and paper, writing without intermission, editing his journal, addressing letters to the convention, and complaining that sufficient attention was not given to them. He indited his last communication, saying, that if it were not read, he would have himself transported in his sickness to the tribune, and read it in person. In this letter, he denounced two generals, Custine and Biron. "Custine," said he, "now transferred from the Rhine to the north, was proceeding in the same manner as Dumouriez, railing against anarchists, forming his staffs according to his own caprice, arming certain battalions, disarming others, and distributing them conformably to his plans, which were doubtless those of a conspirator." (It will be recollected that Custine was profiting by the siege of Valenciennes to re-organise the army of the north in Cæsar's camp.) "As to Biron, he was an old valet of the court. He affected a mighty dread of the English, in order to keep himself in Lower Vendée and leave the enemy in possession of Upper Vendée. He was evidently only waiting for a descent to unite with the English, and deliver up our army to them. The war of La Vendée ought to have been already finished. A man of judgment, after witnessing the discomfiture of the Vendéans once, ought to understand the means of destroying them. For his own part, likewise possessing as he did military science, he had devised an infallible manœuvre, and if his health were not so precarious, he would have had himself removed to the banks of the Loire, in order to put his plan in execution by personal superintendence. Custine and Biron were the two Dumouriez's of the moment; and, after having secured them, it was essential to adopt a final measure, which would stifle all calumnies, and commit all the deputies past recall to the revolution. This was to put to death the imprisoned Bourbons, and set a price on the heads of the fugitive Bourbons. By this expedient, the accusations against some of destining Orleans to the throne would be no more heard of, and the intrigues of others to make their peace with the family of Capet would be prevented."

Thus, to the last, he exhibited the inordinate vanity, the wild fury, and the prompt talent of anticipating popular hatred, which had always marked his career. In fact, Custine and Biron were shortly to become the objects of general execration, and it was Marat, sick and on the eve of death, who, as upon many former occasions, enjoyed the honour of the initiative.

Charlotte Corday was thus obliged to seek him at his own house to attain her aim. In the first place, she delivered the letter she held for Duperret, executed her commission with the minister of the interior, and then made ready to accomplish her purpose. She inquired of a coachman the residence of Marat, proceeded straightway thither, and was refused admittance. She then wrote to him, saying that, having just arrived from Calvados, she had important news to communicate to him. This was sufficient to ensure her an interview. On the 13th July, accordingly, she presented herself about eight in the evening. Marat's housekeeper, a young woman of twenty-seven, with whom he lived maritally, demurred to her entrance; but Marat, who was in his bath, heard Charlotte Corday, and ordered her to be admitted. Remaining alone with him, she related what she had seen at Caen; then pausing, she listened to him and surveyed him ere she struck the blow. Marat eagerly demanded the names of the deputies present at Caen. She repeated them, and he, seizing a pencil, prepared to write them down, exclaiming—"Very good, they shall all go to the guillotine." "To the guillotine!" echoed the young girl, in an indignant tone; and drawing a knife from her bosom, she struck Marat under the left breast, and plunged the steel to his heart.

"Help!" he cried; "help, my love!" His housekeeper flew at the call; a messenger employed in arranging journals also hastened to the spot. They found Marat weltering in his blood, and the young girl calm, serene, motionless. The messenger knocked her down with a chair, and the housekeeper spurned her with her feet. The noise attracted visiters, and the whole quarter was speedily in commotion. Charlotte Corday rose from the floor, and encountered with dignified placidity the threats and outrages of those who surrounded her. Certain members of the section, drawn to the scene by the pervading tumult, struck by her beauty, her courage, and the calmness wherewith she avowed her action, interfered to save her from brutal immolation, and conducted her to prison, where she continued to confess all with the same tranquil assurance.

This assassination, like that of Lepelletier, caused an extraordinary sensation. It was immediately propagated that the Girondists had armed and instigated

Charlotte Corday. An analogous report had attended the death of Lepelletier, and on all similar occasions such will be the case. A proscribed opinion is very generally illustrated by some signal act of revenge; simply one mind, more highly exasperated than others, conceives and executes the deed; but it is nevertheless imputed to all the partisans of the same opinion, and thus authority is derived for wreaking additional vengeance upon them, and for decking the victim with the crown of martyrdom. Some difficulty had been felt in charging crimes on the imprisoned deputies. The departmental revolt had furnished one specious pretext for taking their lives, by declaring them accomplices of the fugitive deputies; the death of Marat served to eke out their supposititious crimes, and the reasons in request for consigning them to the scaffold.

The Mountain, the Jacobins, and especially the Cordeliers, who gloried in having first possessed Marat, in having remained more intimately connected with him, and in having never disavowed him, testified great and unfeigned sorrow. It was agreed that he should be interred in the garden of the Cordeliers, beneath the same trees under which he was accustomed to read his journal to the people in the evenings. The convention resolved to attend his obsequies in a body. At the Jacobin Club it was proposed to assign him extraordinary honours; several even demanded the Pantheon as his sepulchre, though the law prohibited any one being deposited within it until twenty years after death. It was moved that the whole society should walk in the funeral procession; that the presses of the "Friend of the People" should be purchased by the society, in order to prevent them falling into unworthy hands; and that his journal should be continued by successors capable, if not of rivalling him, at least of recalling his energy and supplying his watchfulness. Robespierre, whose aim at all times was to render the Jacobins more imposing by stifling all their inconsiderate ebullitions, and who moreover was desirous of fixing upon himself the attention too exclusively bestowed upon the martyr, came forward to address the club upon this occasion.

"If I speak to-day," said he, "it is because I have a right to do so. The question is concerning poniards; they are pointed at me, I have deserved them, and it is merely the result of chance that Marat has been struck before me. I have therefore a right to interfere in the discussion, and I do so to express my astonishment that your energy should exhaust itself in vain declamations, and your thoughts be directed solely upon idle pomp and ceremonies. The best manner of avenging Marat is to pursue remorselessly his enemies. The vengeance which seeks satisfaction in vain funereal honours is soon appeased, and speedily foregoes the determination of exhibiting itself in a more real and beneficial form. Cease, then, your useless discussions, and revenge Marat in a manner more worthy of himself." All further debate was cut short by this peremptory inhibition, and no more heed was given to the propositions that had been so eagerly submitted.

Nevertheless, the convention, the Jacobins, the Cordeliers, all the popular societies, and all the sections, concurred in decreeing him great honours. His body lay in state for several days; it was uncovered, and the wound he had received left open to view. The popular societies and the sections defiled in procession past his bier, strewing it with flowers. Each president pronounced an oration. The section of La Republique was the first to approach. "He is dead!" exclaimed its president, lugubriously—"the friend of the people is dead, and by assassination! Let us waive all eulogy over his inanimate remains. His eulogium is in his career, his writings, his gory wound, his death! Scatter flowers over the pallid corpse of Marat, my countrywomen! Marat was our friend, he was the friend of the people: it was for the people he lived, it is for the people he died." At these words, young maidens made the circuit of the bier, and threw fragrant flowers on the body of Marat. The orator resumed: "But sufficient are the lamentations; hear the mighty soul of Marat, shaking off its bonds, and saying, Republicans, abstain from further weeping. To republicans is permitted but one tear, after which their country claims all their sympathies. It was not I who was marked for assassination, but the republic; it is not I who call for vengeance, but the republic, the people, yourselves!"

All the societies and all the sections came one after the other around the coffin in which the body of Marat lay extended; and if history record such scenes with some minuteness, it may teach men to reflect on the influence of prepossessions, and lead them to ponder seriously, when they mourn the mighty of this earth, or revile the unfortunate of their era.

Meanwhile, the trial of the young murderess was expedited with that rapidity for which republican forms of process were remarkable. Two deputies were implicated in the arraignment; the one, Duperret, with whom she had had intercourse, and who had accompanied her to the minister of the interior; the other Fauchet, late a bishop, previously suspected on account of his connexion with the right side, and whom a woman, insane or malignant, falsely asserted to have seen in the galleries with the prisoner.

Charlotte Corday, when conducted before the tribunal, preserved her wonted calmness. The indictment was read over to her, after which the court proceeded to call the witnesses. The first who appeared was stopped by the prisoner, without allowing him time to commence his deposition. "It was I," she said, "who killed Marat." "Who incited you to commit this murder?" demanded the president. "His crimes." "What do you mean by his crimes?" "The calamities he has caused since the revolution." "Who are they who have instigated you to this action?" "Myself alone," proudly answered the young girl. "I had long revolved it in my mind; nor would I ever have taken counsel of others for such a deed. I wished to restore peace to my country." "But do you imagine you have sacrificed all the Marats?" "No," responded the prisoner, with a sigh: "alas! no."

She then permitted the witnesses to conclude, and, after each testimony, repeated, "That is true; the deponent is right." She defended herself from one charge alone, namely, her pretended concert with the Girondists; and she confronted only one witness, the woman who implicated Duperret and Fauchet in the case; after which she seated herself, and listened to the remainder of the process with perfect serenity. "You perceive," said her advocate, Chaveau-Lagarde, briefly compressing her defence, "that the accused confesses all with imperturbable firmness. Such composure and self-oblivion, sublime in one respect, can only be explained by the most exalted political fanaticism. It is for you to judge what weight is due to this moral consideration in the scales of justice."

Charlotte Corday was condemned to undergo the penalty of death. Her beautiful countenance evinced no emotion as the sentence was delivered, and she returned to prison with a smile on her lips. She wrote to her father, craving his pardon for having disposed of her life. She wrote also to Barbaroux, to whom she related her journey and achievement in a letter full of feminine grace, spirit, and elevation of mind; she told him her friends ought not to regret her, for a lively imagination and a susceptible heart threaten stormy lives to those who may possess them. She added, that she was now fully avenged on Pétion, who had, when at Caen, suspected for a moment her political sentiments. She begged him also to tell Wimpffen that she had assisted him to gain more than one battle. She concludes in these words: "What a deplorable community to form a republic!

Peace ought, at all events, to be made; some government will follow in its track."

On the 15th, Charlotte Corday underwent her sentence with the calm assurance that had never quitted her. She opposed to the outrages of the vile populace a modest and becoming firmness. All, however, did not insult her; many pitied a female so young, so beautiful, and so disinterested in her crime, and followed her to the scaffold with eyes of sympathy and admiration.

Marat's body was transported in great pomp to the garden of the Cordeliers. "This pomp," said the report of the commune, "had nothing in it but what was simple and patriotic. The people, gathered under the banners of the sections, followed quietly. A disorder in some sort imposing, a reverential silence, a general consternation, presented a most affecting spectacle. The procession continued in motion from six in the evening until midnight; it was composed of citizens from all the sections, members of the convention, of the commune, and of the department, electors, and popular societies. Upon reaching the garden of the Cordeliers, the body of Marat was deposited beneath the trees, the leaves whereof, slightly agitated, reflected and multiplied the soft and subdued light. The people pressed around the coffin in silence. The president of the convention delivered an eloquent discourse, in which he stated that the time would soon come when Marat should be avenged, but that no hasty or inconsiderate measures should be allowed to justify the reproaches of the country's enemies. He added that liberty could not perish, and that the death of Marat would only consolidate it. After several other speeches, which were all warmly applauded, the body of Marat was laid in the grave. Tears flowed plenteously, and all slowly retired, with hearts oppressed by grief."

The heart of Marat, whereof the possession was contested by several societies, was ultimately adjudged to the Cordeliers. His bust, universally treasured as a fitting adjunct to those of Brutus and Lepelletier, was installed in all the assemblies and public places. The seal put upon his papers was removed; an assignat for five francs was all the wealth found in his possession, and his poverty became a fresh subject of admiration. His housekeeper, whom, according to the words of Chaumette, he had "one fine day, in the face of the sun," taken as his wife, was dignified with the name of Marat's widow, and supported at the cost of the state.

Such was the end of this man, the most singular of an epoch so abundant in diversified character. Entering the career of science, he attempted to overturn all the systems in vogue; then cast into political troubles, he forthwith imagined a frightful conception—still such a conception as revolutions realise every day of their progress, in proportion as their dangers increase, but which they never openly avow, namely, the destruction of all their adversaries. Marat, perceiving that, in spite of all repudiations, the revolution in truth obeyed his counsels, that the men whom he had denounced were execrated and sacrificed as he had predicted, came to look upon himself as the greatest politician of modern times, and gave way to an overweening vanity and effrontery, appearing to his enemies as the most horrible of the human species, and to his friends themselves as, at the least, wayward and strange. He quitted the scene by an accident as singular as his whole life, disappearing at the very moment the leaders of the republic, concentrating all their powers to establish an inexorable and sombre government, must have inevitably broken with a frantic, systematic, and presumptuous colleague, who would have deranged all their plans by his inordinate pretensions. Incapable, in fact, of being an active and commanding leader, he was simply the apostle of the revolution; and when that office was no longer needed, but instead thereof, practical energy and continuity, the knife of a young enthusiastic maiden came opportunely to convert him into a martyr, and give a saint to the people, who, weary of their ancient idols, were longing for new ones.

CHAPTER XXIV.

DISTRIBUTION OF PARTIES SINCE THE 31ST MAY.—DISCREDIT OF DANTON.—REVERSES IN LA VENDEE.—CAPTURE OF MAYENCE AND VALENCIENNES.—IMMINENT PERIL OF THE REPUBLIC IN AUGUST 1793, AND MEASURES OF VIOLENCE CONSEQUENT THEREON.

Of the famous triumvirs, there now remained but Robespierre and Danton. To form a correct idea of their influence, it behoves us to inquire how power had been distributed, and in what direction opinion had flowed, since the suppression of the right side.

From the very day of its convocation, the convention had been in reality possessed of all power. It was unwilling, however, to keep it openly in itself, in order to avoid the imputation of despotism, and consequently permitted to subsist out of its own pale a phantom of executive power, under the title of ministers. Discontented with their administration, whereof the vigour was wholly unequal to the circumstances, it established, immediately after the defection of Dumouriez, a committee of public welfare, which entered on its functions on the 10th April, being invested with a faculty of superior inspection over the government. It was empowered to suspend the execution of measures ordered by the ministers, to supply deficiencies when it judged them inadequate, and totally to revoke them when it deemed them prejudicial. To its care, also, were committed the instructions given to representatives dispatched on missions, and with it alone were the latter entitled to correspond. Thus placed above the ministers and representatives, who were themselves placed above other functionaries of all grades, it had under its control the whole fabric of government. Although this authority, as may be judged from its appellation, was only contemplated as a simple inspection, it in reality became action itself; for the head of a state rarely executes any thing immediately, but is contented to set and witness the machine in motion, to select his agents, and direct the operations. Consequently, through its function of superintendence, the committee was enabled to effect all this, and it was not slow to act upon the capacity. It regulated the military operations, apportioned the supplies, ordered measures of security, nominated the generals and agents of all kinds; and the trembling ministers were too happy to be freed from all responsibility by reducing themselves to the scale of mere clerks. The members who composed the committee of public welfare were Barrère, Delmas, Bréard, Cambon, Robert Lindet, Danton, Guyton-Morveau, Mathieu, and Ramel. They were known as able and laborious men, and though somewhat suspected of a leaning to moderation, they were not deemed capable, like the Girondists, of being accomplices of the stranger. In a short time they united in their hands all the affairs of the state; and although they had been appointed but for one month, it was held impolitic to interrupt them in their labours, and they were protracted from month to month, from the 10th April to the 10th May, from the 10th May to the 10th June, and from the 10th June to the 10th July. Beneath this committee, the committee of general safety exercised the high police, so important a department in times of distrust; but even in its functions it depended on the committee of public welfare, which, being charged in general terms with what concerned the welfare of the state, necessarily included in its powers a right of inquiry into plots against the republic.

Thus, by means of its decrees, the convention had the supreme fiat; by means of its commissioners and its committee, it held the executive power; so that albeit unwilling to concentrate all power in itself, it had been invincibly led to do so by circumstances, and by the necessity imposed upon it of confiding the execution of what it considered imperfectly performed by strange agents to its own members, under its own immediate vigilance.

Nevertheless, whilst all authority was thus exercised within its pale, it participated no further in the operations of government than by its approbation, ceasing even to deliberate thereon. This is easily accounted for. The great questions of social organisation were settled by the constitution, which established a pure democracy. The question whether, in promotion of public safety, the most revolutionary means should be adopted—whether, in truth, there should be an unreserved abandonment to all that passion might dictate—was answered by the 31st May. Accordingly, the constitution of the state and its moral policy were fixed. Nothing remained to discuss, therefore, but measures of administration, finance, and war. Now, subjects of this nature can rarely be understood by a numerous assembly, and are invariably left to the discretion of men who devote their attention more specifically to such matters. The convention, upon this principle, willingly threw the burden of them on the committees it had charged with affairs. It had implicit reliance on their probity, talents, and zeal. Hence it sunk into silence; and the last revolution, whilst stifling the freedom of debate, had likewise removed all occasion for it. It resolved into a mere council of state, to which the committees, as the heads of administrations, repaired to present accounts always applauded, and to propose decrees always adopted. The sittings, taciturn, sombre, and brief, were no longer protracted as formerly during whole days and nights.

Next to the convention, which, in the manner explained, attended to the general concerns of government, came the commune, regulating the municipal system, and effecting therein a complete revolution. Giving up, since the 31st May, all intentions of conspiring, or using the local force of Paris against the convention, it devoted its attention to matters of police, supplies of food, the markets, the churches, theatres, and even courtesans, publishing, upon all these subjects of internal and private concern, ordinances which soon became models throughout France. Chaumette, procurator-general of the commune, was by his reports, always attentively heard and applauded by the people, the chief mover of this municipal legislature. Incessantly on the alert in quest of fresh matter to regulate, and continually encroaching on private liberty, this legislator of the halls and markets became every day more importunate and intolerable. Pache, as impassible as ever, looked calmly on, gave his approbation to whatever was proposed, and freely abandoned the honours of the municipal tribune to his subordinate Chaumette.

The convention leaving its committees to act at discretion, and the commune restricting its interference exclusively to its own province, all discussion upon matters of government had devolved upon the Jacobins. They alone canvassed, with their accustomed audacity, the operations of the executive and the conduct of each of its agents. It has been already shown, that, long ago, they had acquired a prodigious importance by their numbers, by the reputation and the influential position of several of their members, by the vast ramifications of their affiliated societies, in fine, by their seniority and their long influence over the revolution. But since the 31st May, having reduced to silence the right side of the convention, and secured predominance to the system of inordinate energy, they had obtained a sway over opinion almost boundless, and usurped the faculty of speech, in some sort abdicated by the convention. They assailed the committees with an unremitting interposition, and scrutinised their conduct, as also that of the representatives, the ministers, and the generals, with that rage for personalities for which they were so remarkable; thus exercising over all the agents of government an inexorable censorship, often unjust, but always useful, by the terror it inspired, and the devotedness it imposed upon all. The other popular societies also enjoyed their license and their influence, but succumbed, notwithstanding, to the authority of the Jacobins. The Cordeliers, for example, more turbulent and prompt to act, nevertheless acknowledged the mental superiority of their seniors, and always yielded to the restraint of their counsels, when they chanced to outrun the fitting moment for a project, through a superfluity of revolutionary ardour. The petition of Jacques Roux against the constitution, retracted by the Cordeliers on the summons of the Jacobins, afforded an instance of this deference.

Such, since the 31st May, was the distribution of power and of influence. We perceive in concurrent activity a governing committee, a commune occupied with municipal regulations, and the Jacobin Club exercising over all the details of government a constant and rigorous supervision.

Two months had not passed away without opinion expressing itself strongly against the existing administration. The minds of men could not stop short with the 31st May; their urgency was sure to go far beyond; nor can it be a matter of surprise that they should incessantly demand additional vigour, greater celerity, and, above all, more results. In the general remodelling of the committees, as demanded on the 2d June, the committee of public welfare had been excepted, being composed, as was universally acknowledged, of men indefatigable in toil, alien to all factions, and charged with labours which it was dangerous to interrupt; but it was not forgotten that it had hesitated on the 31st May and the 2d June, that it had proposed to negotiate with the departments and send them hostages, and it was thus speedily assailed with invectives of incompetency to the crisis. Instituted at one of the most difficult periods, on it was unscrupulously thrown the blame of reverses occasioned by the calamitous situation of affairs, and scarcely avoidable by human wisdom. As the centre of all operations, it was overwhelmed with business, and it was reproached with burrowing in papers, beguiling time with details, in a word, with being emasculated and incapable. And yet, established at the time of Dumouriez's defection, when all the armies were disorganised, when La Vendée was rising in rebellion and Spain commencing hostilities, it had reorganised the army of the north and that of the Rhine, it had created the armies of the Pyrenees and La Vendée, which were not in existence, and provisioned one hundred and twenty-six towns and forts; and although much remained to be done to place the forces on the necessary footing, it bespoke extraordinary industry to have accomplished such labours in so short an interval, and amidst the obstacles of the departmental insurrection. But public discontent always required more than was actually performed—more, indeed, than could be performed; and by that very insatiableness it provoked the amazing energy which was alone commensurate with the danger. In order to increase the strength of the committee and invigorate its revolutionary ardour, to its former members had been added Saint-Just, Jean-Bon-Saint-André, and Couthon. Notwithstanding this popular infusion, dissatisfaction was not appeased, the remark passing into vogue that the adjuncts were unquestionably most excellent, but that their influence was neutralised by the others.

Against the ministers, also, opinion was not less ruthlessly directed. The minister of the interior, Garat, at first rather favourably viewed on account of his neutrality between the Girondists and the Jacobins, fell under the category of a moderate after the 2d June. Being instructed to compose a document calculated to enlighten the departments touching the late events, he had digested a long dissertation, in which he explained and weighed all wrongs with an impartiality creditable to his philosophy, doubtless, but rather inappropriate to the dispositions of the moment. Robespierre, to whom he imparted this over-wrought production, spurned it malevolently. The Jacobins were soon apprised of its tone, and they reproached Garat with culpable indifference to the duty of counteracting the poison disseminated by Roland. In the like position was D'Albarade, the minister of marine, who was accused of leaving all the old aristocrats as superior officers in the squadrons. There is no doubt, in fact, that he had retained a great number, and the events at Toulon but too speedily demonstrated the truth; but it was more difficult to purge the navy of objectionable subjects than the army, because the peculiar acquirements requisite in naval service prevented the possibility of replacing the old officers with new, or of converting in six months a peasant into a sailor, a midshipman, or an admiral. Bouchotte, the minister of war, had alone preserved his popularity, because, after the example of Pache, his predecessor, he had thrown open his offices to the Jacobins and Cordeliers, and allayed their mistrust by calling themselves into his department. Almost all the generals were assailed, especially those who were nobles; but above all, two had become the clamour of the hour—Custine in the north, and Biron in the west. Marat, as we have related, had denounced them a few days before his death; and since that denunciation, it is a fact that men perpetually inquired why Custine was loitering in Cæsar's camp without relieving Valenciennes, and why Biron, inactive in the Lower Vendée, had allowed Saumur to be taken and Nantes to be besieged.

Similar distrust prevailed every where; calumny smote all heads, and brooded over even the firmest patriots. As there was no longer a right side upon which all crimes might be heaped, as there was no longer a Roland, a Brissot, or a Guadet, to whom, at every alarm, treachery could be imputed, invective turned upon the most decided republicans. An incredible rage for suspicions and accusations possessed the public mind. The longest and most persevering of revolutionary careers was no longer a guarantee; and in a single day, in a single hour, any man might be assimilated with the fiercest enemies of the republic. Imagination could be hardly made to forego its illusions touching that Danton, whose undaunted boldness and inspiriting eloquence had so often stimulated courage in critical emergencies; but Danton carried into the revolution a passion of extreme violence for ultimate objects, but no animosity towards individuals, and that was not sufficient. The spirit of a revolution is composed of passion for objects and hatred for those who oppose obstacles; Danton had but one of these two feelings. In promoting revolutionary measures tending to smite the rich, to goad the indifferent into action, and to develop the resources of the nation, he had scrupled at nothing, but devised and employed the most reckless and violent means; nevertheless, tolerant and placable towards individuals, he looked not upon all as his enemies, but viewed them as men differing in character and in mind, whom it was expedient to gain or accept with their respective powers and degrees of energy. He had not considered Dumouriez as a traitor, but rather as a malecontent driven to extremities. He had not deemed the Girondists accomplices of Pitt, but honest imbeciles, and his wish was to have removed without injuring them. It was even said that he had expressed himself indignantly upon the orders given by Henriot on the 2d June. He gave his hand to noble generals, dined with contractors, lived on familiar terms with men of all parties, and indulged in pleasures whereof he had not been chary in the course of the revolution. All these things were notorious; and sinister rumours crept abroad, implicating alike his energy and his probity. One day it was said that Danton no longer appeared at the Jacobin Club; and insinuations were levelled at his idleness, at his continual distractions, and at the fact of the revolution not having been without its enjoyments to him. Another day, some malignant Jacobin said in the tribune—"Danton left me to go and shake hands with a general." Sometimes complaints were directed against the individuals he had recommended to the ministers. Again, not venturing too often to attack him personally, his detractors assailed his friends. Thus, the butcher Legendre, his colleague in the Parisian deputation, his lieutenant in the faubourgs and public places, and the imitator of his wild and boisterous eloquence, was treated as a moderate by Hébert and the other unruly spirits at the Cordelier Club. "I a moderate!" exclaimed Legendre to the Jacobins; "I, who often reproach myself with exaggeration—who am accused from Bordeaux of having dispatched Guadet—who am charged in all the journals with having seized Lanjuinais by the collar, and dragged him on the pavement!"

Another friend of Danton was stigmatised as a moderate, an equally known and tried patriot, Camille-Desmoulins, at once the most lively, satirical, and eloquent writer distinguished in the revolution. Camille was intimately acquainted with General Dillon, who, when stationed by Dumouriez at the post of the Islettes in the Argonne, had displayed exemplary firmness and gallantry. Camille was aware, from personal intercourse, that Dillon was simply a brave soldier, without political opinions, endowed with the true martial instinct, and sincerely desirous of serving the republic. Suddenly, from the effect of that incredible distrust pervading the very air, it was reported that Dillon was preparing to place himself at the head of a conspiracy to establish Louis XVII. upon the throne. The committee of public welfare caused him to be instantly arrested. Camille, who had convinced himself by inquiry that the rumour was a mere fable, rose to defend Dillon in the convention. Cries from all sides interrupted him: "You dine with the aristocrats!" Billaud-Varennes, interfering to stop him, exclaimed—"We must not allow Camille to disgrace himself!" "I am prevented speaking," retorted Camille; "no matter, I have my pen!" And he speedily published a pamphlet, entitled "A Letter to Dillon," replete with intellect and fancy, wherein he dealt his blows on all sides and at all heads. To the committee of public welfare he said—"You have usurped all powers, engrossed all affairs, and you terminate none. There were three of you charged with the war department; the one is absent, the other ill, and the third understands nothing of such concerns. You leave at the head of our armies the Custines, Birons, Menous, Berthiers, all aristocrats, or Lafayettists, or imbeciles." To Cambon he said—"I comprehend nothing of thy system of finance, but thy paper greatly resembles that of Law, and flies as rapidly from hand to hand." To Billaud-Varennes he said—"Thou art wroth with Dillon, because, being a commissioner to his army, he exposed thee to the enemy's fire." To Saint-Just—"Thou reverest thyself, and bearest thy head like a priest elevating the host:" to Bréard, Delmas, Barrère, and others—"You wished to give in your resignations on the 2d June, because you were unable to contemplate that revolution with composure, so frightful did it seem to your imaginations."

He added, that Dillon was neither a republican, nor a federalist, nor an aristocrat, but a soldier, asking only to serve as such; that he equalled in patriotism the whole committee of public welfare, and all the staffs retained at the head of the armies; that he was at all events a distinguished officer, such as it was fortunate to have an opportunity of employing, and that it must not be imagined every corporal was competent to become a general. "Since," he concluded,

"an obscure officer, Dumouriez, conquered in spite of himself at Jemappes, and took possession of all Belgium and of Breda, like a quartermaster with his pencil, the successes of the republic have inspired us with the same infatuation which the successes of his reign communicated to Louis XIV. He selected his generals in his antechamber, and we conceive we may take ours from the streets; certain sanguine temperaments have indeed proclaimed that we possess three millions of generals!"

We learn from such language, such cross-firing, that the Mountain was in an unsettled state. This situation ordinarily ensues to every party emerging from victory, vibrating with incipient discord before the separate fractions have taken distinct development. No fresh party had as yet sprung or seceded from the conquering ranks. The imputation of moderatism or exaggeration hung over all heads, without resting positively on any. Amidst this confusion of opinion, one reputation always remained inaccessible to attacks, that of Robespierre. He certainly had never evinced indulgence towards individuals; he had cherished no outlaw, nor consorted with any general, financier, or deputy. None could accuse him of having sacrificed to pleasure during the revolution, for he lived obscurely with a carpenter, and, it is said, prosecuted an unsuspected intercourse with one of his daughters. Austere, reserved, upright, he enjoyed the reputation of being, and was in reality, incorruptible. He could be reproached only with pride—a species of vice which defiles not like corruption, but which causes great calamities in civil broils, and becomes most fearful in men of severity and sternness, in religious or political votaries, because, being their sole passion, they gratify it without distraction and without remorse.

Robespierre was the only individual who could repress certain movements of revolutionary impatience, without his moderation being imputed to the influences of pleasure or interest. His resistance, whenever he offered it, was always attributed to reason alone. He felt this position, and now commenced for the first time to construct a system. Hitherto, totally absorbed in hatred, he had laboured merely to drive the revolution over the Girondists; but at present, discerning in a new outbreak of violent opinions danger to the patriots, he deemed it essential to enforce respect for the convention and the committee of public welfare, because all authority was vested in them, and could not be transferred to other hands without interminable confusion. Moreover, he was himself in that convention; he must speedily be in the committee of public welfare; and, therefore, in defending them, he at once sustained an authority altogether indispensable, and an authority which he was about to share. As every opinion first took consistence in the Jacobin Club, he was assiduous in his endeavours to strengthen his sway over it, and attach it to the convention and the committees, reserving the faculty of future alienation, if he should judge it necessary. Constantly attentive to the Jacobins alone, he flattered them by his presence; and whilst he rarely spoke in the convention, where, as we have observed, silence was but seldom broken, his voice was repeatedly heard in their tribune—for he never allowed an important proposition to pass without discussing it, either to modify or repudiate it. In this, his conduct was more discreetly calculated than Danton's. Nothing is more offensive to men, or more favours sinister rumours, than neglect and absence. Danton, careless as a being of ardent and impassioned spirit, was too negligent in his attendance at the Jacobin Club. When he did appear, he was compelled to justify himself, to give assurances that he would always be a good patriot, to say that, "if sometimes he used certain conciliatory means to recover weak but excellent persons, his energy was not on that account diminished; that he always watched with the same ardour over the interests of the republic, and that it would assuredly be victorious." Vain and dangerous excuses! Whenever a man is reduced to explain, to enter into a justification of himself, he is more or less subdued by those to whom he addresses his exculpation. Robespierre, on the contrary, always present, always prepared to rebut insinuations, was never obliged to humble himself by apologetic appeals; so far was it the reverse, indeed, that he assumed an accusing tone, and rated at times his faithful Jacobins. He had adroitly seized that point, when the feelings inspired by a favourite leader having become unequivocal and decided, he does but stimulate them by rebukes.

We have already related the manner in which he treated Jacques Roux, who had proposed a petition against the constitutional act; and he pursued the same course upon all occasions when the conduct of the convention was brought into question. That assembly, he said, was purified; it merited all respect, whoever accused it was a bad citizen. The committee of public welfare had doubtless not done all it ought to have done (for even when vindicating any, Robespierre never failed to plant a censure); but it was now in a better course; to attack it was to destroy the necessary centre of all authority, to weaken the energy of the government, and to compromise the republic. When endeavours were made to annoy the convention or the committee by reiterated petitions, he opposed them, saying, that the influence of the Jacobins was trifled with, and that the time of the depositaries of power should not be lightly wasted or invaded. One day, a clamour arose that the sittings of the committee should be public. He inveighed bitterly against such a proposal, asserting there were concealed enemies, who, under the mask of patriotism, broached the most incendiary suggestions, and proceeding to show that the foreigner subsidised two orders of conspirators in France—"the exaggerators, who pushed things to the verge of chaos, and the moderates, who would fain paralyse the world by a mission of meekness."

The committee of public welfare had been prolonged three separate times; on the 10th July it fell to be continued a fourth time, or remodelled. On the 8th a great muster took place at the Jacobin Club. From all parts came voices, crying "that the members of the committee ought to be changed, and not continued again, as had happened thrice previously."

"There is no doubt," said Bourdon, "the committee has good intentions; I am not disposed to criminate it; but a misfortune inherent in human nature is to possess energy only for a few days. The present members of the committee have already passed that period; they are emasculated; let us supersede them. At this moment we need revolutionary men—men to whom we can intrust the fate of the republic, and who will answer to us for its safety, body and soul."

The ardent Chabot succeeded Bourdon. "The committee," said he, "must be remodelled undoubtedly, and no fresh prolongation endured. To add some additional members, ascertained good patriots, is not sufficient, as has been proved by previous trial. Couthon, Saint-Just, and Jean-Bon-Saint-André, recently adjoined, are nullified by their colleagues. Neither ought the committee to be renewed by ballot, for the new one may be no better than the old, which is worth exactly nothing. I have heard Mathieu," pursued Chabot, "hold the most incivic language at the club of revolutionary females. Ramel has written to Toulouse that the possessors of property can alone save the commonwealth, and that care must be taken to withhold arms from the sans-culottes. Cambon is an imbecile, who sees all objects through a magnifying-glass, and stares in terror a hundred yards off. Guyton-Morveau is an honest man, a quaker, who is perpetually trembling. Delmas, who had the province of appointments, has made abominable selections, and filled the army with counter-revolutionists. In short, this committee was the friend of Lebrun, and is the enemy of Bouchotte."

Robespierre hastened to answer Chabot. "In each sentence, in each word," said he, "of Chabot's speech, I perceive the purest patriotism to glow; but I discern also that too exalted patriotism, which is indignant that all things are not ordered according to the bent of its own desires, which frets because the committee of public welfare has not attained in its operations an impossible perfection, which Chabot will seek for in vain.

I am of opinion with him that this committee is not composed of men equally enlightened, equally virtuous; but what body will he find composed in such a manner? Can he prevent men from being liable to error? Has he not seen the convention, since it vomited from its bosom the traitors who dishonoured it, derive a fresh energy—a grandeur which was unknown to it previous to that auspicious day—a character altogether more august as the national representation? Is not this example sufficient to demonstrate that it is not always necessary to destroy, but that it is sometimes more prudent simply to reform?

Yes, certainly, there are in the committee of public welfare men capable of wielding the machine, and giving additional impetus to its powers. These men require encouragement alone. Who can forget the services this committee has rendered to the commonwealth, the numerous plots it has discovered, the beneficial observations we owe to it, the sapient and profound views it has developed to us?

The assembly did not institute a committee of public welfare to influence itself or direct its decrees; but this committee has been useful in severing what was good, in measures propounded, from what, presented under a seductive form, might have led to dangerous consequences; it has given the first impulse to several essential enactments which have probably saved the country; it has obviated the inconveniences of protracted deliberation, so often fruitless, by presenting the results, happily elicited and combined, of investigations to which the assembly itself could scarcely bring the requisite stock of knowledge, from want of familiarity with their topics.

All this suffices to prove that the committee of public welfare has not been of such inconsiderable assistance as many profess to believe. It has committed faults, doubtless; am I likely to palliate them? Would I incline towards indulgence, who uphold that sufficient has not been done for the country when all has not been accomplished? Yes, it has committed faults, and I am willing with you to upbraid it on account of them; but it would be impolitic at this moment to excite the discontent of the people towards a committee which has need of unrestricted confidence, which is charged with great interests, and from which the country anxiously anticipates important aid; and although it may labour under the displeasure of the revolutionary republican female citizens, I do not the less esteem it adequate to its momentous duties."

All discussion was closed after the reflections of Robespierre had been propounded. Two days afterwards, the committee was remodelled, and reduced to nine members, as at its first formation. The future members were Barrère, Jean-Bon-Saint-André, Gasparin, Couthon, Hérault-Séchelles, Saint-Just, Thuriot, Robert Lindet, and Prieur de la Marne. All the members accused of weakness were superseded except Barrère, whose great facility in digesting reports and bending to circumstances procured him pardon for the past. Robespierre was not yet upon the list; but a few days more, a slight increase of danger on the frontiers and of terror in the convention, were alone needed to carry him within its fold.

Robespierre had soon several other occasions of employing his new policy. The navy beginning to excite uneasiness, incessant complaints were urged against the minister D'Albarade, his predecessor Monge, and the deplorable inefficiency of the fleet, which on its return from Sardinia had been brought into the docks of Toulon; but the repairs were not proceeded with, and the ships were commanded by old officers, almost all aristocrats. Certain individuals recently added to the navy-office were also excepted against on various grounds. One individual, named Peyron, who had been sent on a mission to reorganise the force at Toulon, was more especially assailed. This man had failed to do, as was alleged, what he ought to have done, and the minister was held responsible for his omissions; but the minister threw the responsibility upon a distinguished patriot, who had recommended Peyron to his confidence. This "distinguished patriot" was referred to with affected wonder, without venturing to designate him. "His name?" cried several voices. "Well, then, this celebrated patriot," replied the denouncer, "is Danton!" At these words, deep murmurs broke forth. Robespierre darted to the tribune: "I demand," said he, "that this farce be terminated and the sitting opened. Some accuse D'Albarade; I know him only by public fame, which avouches him a patriot minister; but with what is he now reproached? An error! What man is incapable of error? A selection he has made has not answered general expectation! Bouchotte and Pache have also made unfortunate appointments, and yet they are both true republicans—both sincere friends of the country. A man is in office; that is enough, he is calumniated. Alas! when shall we cease to put faith in the ridiculous or perfidious tales with which we are deluged from all quarters?

I perceived that to this sufficiently general denunciation of the minister was added a particular denunciation levelled at Danton. Is it, then, he whom they would fain cover with opprobrium? But if, instead of discouraging patriots by assiduously searching for crimes against them, when scarcely the most venial error can be traced, these persons would devote a portion of their time to facilitate the operations of those same patriots, to render their labours more lightsome and less harassing, it would be somewhat more honest, and the country would be greatly profited. They have denounced Bouchotte, they have denounced Pache, for it was predestined that the best patriots should be denounced. It is truly time to put an end to these absurd and afflicting scenes; would that the society of Jacobins confined itself to that range of matters which it can treat with advantage—that it interdicted many of those which are agitated within its pale, and which, for the most part, are equally futile and dangerous!"

Thus Robespierre, discerning all the peril of a new convulsion, which might have swept away every trace of a government, laboured to fix the attachment of the Jacobins upon the convention, the committees, and the old patriots. This laudable and beneficial policy redounded likewise to his own immediate advantage. By strengthening the power of the committees, he prepared the way for his own; by defending the patriots of the same date and energy as himself, he fortified his own position, and prevented victims from falling at his side; he placed far beneath himself those of whom he became the protector; finally, he rendered himself, even by his severity, adored by the Jacobins, and secured a high reputation for sagacity. In this Robespierre was actuated by no other ambition than such as had moved all the revolutionary leaders, who had hitherto attempted to arrest the revolution at the point whereat they themselves stopped short; and this policy, which had consigned them to such odium, failed to subject him to the like vicissitude, because the revolution was approaching the term of its dangers and excesses.

The incarcerated deputies had been voted under impeachment immediately after the death of Marat, and their trial was in preparation. Frequent and sharp clamours began to be raised at this time that the heads of the remaining Bourbons should be made to fall, though those heads belonged to two females, the one the widow, the other the sister, of the late monarch, and to the Duke of Orleans, so remarkable for fidelity to the revolution, and at present a prisoner in the jail of Marseilles as the reward of his services.

A festival in celebration of the acceptance of the constitution had been ordered. All the primary assemblies were to send deputies empowered to express their sentiments, and to meet together on the field of the federation in a solemn gathering. The period was no longer fixed for the 14th July, but for the 10th August, since the capture of the Tuileries had produced the republic, whilst that of the Bastille, leaving the monarchy in subsistence, had merely abolished feudalism. Thus the republicans and constitutional royalists were distinguished in the fact that the first celebrated the 10th August, and the latter the 14th July.

The cause of federalism was rapidly on the wane, and the acceptance of the constitution general. Bordeaux still preserved an attitude of reserve, performing no decisive act of submission or hostility, but accepting the constitution. Lyons continued the proceedings appealed to the revolutionary tribunal; but, rebellious on that point alone, it succumbed as to others, and likewise adhered to the constitution. Marseilles alone refused its concurrence. But its petty army, previously separated from that of Languedoc, was driven at the end of July from Avignon, and compelled to re-cross the Durance. Thus federalism was vanquished, and the constitution triumphant. But the danger was growing greater on the frontiers; alike in Vendée, on the Rhine, and in the north, it was becoming more than ever imminent. New victories indemnified the Vendéans for their check before Nantes, and Mayence and Valenciennes were most closely pressed by the enemy.

We intermitted our recital of military events, as the Vendéans, repulsed from Nantes, were returning to their own districts, and we took leave of Biron as he was entering Angers, after the deliverance of Nantes, and purposing to form a combined plan of operations with General Canclaux. During that interval, Westermann had reached Niort with the Germanic legion, and obtained permission from Biron to advance into the interior of the country. This was the same Westermann, the Alsatian, who had distinguished himself on the 10th August, and decided the success of that day; who had afterwards served with reputation under Dumouriez, joining in the ties which subsisted between that general and Danton; and was finally denounced by Marat, whom he had caned, it was said, for divers abusive expressions. He was of the number of those patriots whose great services were acknowledged, but against whom reproaches began to be urged, on account of dissipated habits in the course of the revolution, and a feeling of antipathy to be engendered, because they exacted discipline in the armies and acquirements in the officers, and hesitated to exclude every officer who happened to be noble, or stigmatise as a traitor every general unfortunate enough to be defeated. Westermann had collected a legion called Germanic, consisting of 4000 or 5000 men, including infantry, cavalry, and artillery. At the head of this small army, of which he had rendered himself thoroughly master, and wherein he maintained an exact discipline, he had displayed a most notable prowess, and executed many brilliant exploits. When transferred into La Vendée, he had subjected it to a fresh organisation, and expelled the poltroons, who had furnished matter of denunciation against him. He testified an undisguised contempt for those disorderly battalions which pillaged and ravaged the country; and recorded the same sentiments as Biron, for which he was ranked with him amongst the military aristocrats. The minister of war, Bouchotte, had, as we have before remarked, distributed his Jacobin and Cordelier agents throughout La Vendée. These men professed open rivalry with the representatives and the generals, upholding all excesses and spoliations under the title of military requisitions, and insubordination, under pretext of defending the soldier against the tyranny of his officers. The chief clerk in the war department under Bouchotte was Vincent, a young frantic Cordelier, one of the most dangerous and turbulent spirits of the era. This person had gained complete sway over the mind of Bouchotte, disposed of all appointments, and assailed the generals with an effrontery and rigour truly surprising. Ronsin, the same comptroller who had been commissioned to Dumouriez when his contracts in Belgium were cancelled, being in great esteem with Bouchotte and his minion Vincent, was the chief of their agents in La Vendée, under the appellation of assistant-minister. Beneath him were Momoro, a printer, Grammont, a comedian, and several others, who acted in the same spirit and with the like violence.

Westermann, previously on indifferent terms with these parties, came to an open rupture with them by an act of promptitude and vigour. One Rossignol, formerly a journeyman jeweller, who had gained notoriety on the 20th June and the 10th August, and who commanded one of the battalions of the Orleans muster, was in the list of those new officers favoured by the Cordelier minister. Carousing one day with some of Westermann's troops, he told them that soldiers ought not to be the slaves of officers, that Biron was a *ci-devant and a traitor, and that the inhabitants ought to be turned out of their houses to accommodate the troops. Westermann caused him to be arrested and delivered over to the military tribunals: Ronsin forthwith demanded his release, and forwarded to Paris a denunciation against Westermann.

Westermann, disregarding the maledictions of the Cordelier emissaries, marched forward with his legion, designing to penetrate into the very heart of the country. Starting from the side opposite the Loire, that is to say, from the south of the theatre of the war, he first of all seized upon Parthenay, and next entered Amaillou, setting fire to this latter town in reprisal of enormities on the part of M. de Lescure. That Vendéan chief, on entering Parthenay, had treated with great severity the inhabitants, who were suspected of revolutionary tendencies. Westermann drove out all the inhabitants of Amaillou, and sent them to Parthenay by way of indemnity; he then burnt the mansion of Clisson, belonging to Lescure, and every where spread terror by the rapidity of his march and the exaggerated reports of his military executions. Westermann was not of a cruel disposition, yet he commenced those disastrous reprisals which desolated neutral districts, always accused by each party of having favoured its adversaries. All fled before him to Châtillon, where the families of the Vendéan chiefs and the remnants of their armies were assembled. Westermann, not fearing to risk himself in the centre of the insurgent country, penetrated to Châtillon on the 3d July, driving precipitately from its protection the supreme council and the staff, which were there located as in their capital. The fame of this daring exploit was propagated far and wide; but the position of Westermann was full of hazard. The Vendéan chiefs had fallen back, rung the tocsin throughout the land, assembled a considerable army, and made dispositions to surprise him on the side he least expected an attack. He had planted a post upon an eminence out of Châtillon, which commanded all the environs. The Vendéans, creeping stealthily forward, according to their usual tactics, suddenly surrounded this post, and commenced an assault on all sides. Westermann, apprised of the attack somewhat tardily, hastened to support the position, but the detachments he sent out were repulsed and thrown back upon Châtillon. A panic then seized upon the republican troops, and they abandoned the place in disorder. Westermann himself, after performing prodigies of valour, was borne away in the flight, and obliged to save himself in all haste, leaving behind him a great number of men dead and prisoners. This check caused as much despondency in the public mind, as the early temerity and success of the expedition had given rise to presumption and sanguine expectations.

Whilst these events were passing at Châtillon, Biron had agreed upon a plan of operations with Canclaux. They were both to descend as far as Nantes, sweep the left bank of the Loire, diverge towards Machecoul, effect a junction with Boulard, who was to advance from Sables; and, after having thus separated the Vendéans from the sea, march into Upper Vendée to subdue the whole country. The representatives protested against this plan; they alleged that in order to penetrate into the country, the generals ought to start from the points they then occupied, push forward to the bridges of Cé, with the troops assembled at Angers, and support their movement by a parallel column to advance from Niort. Biron, finding his views thus thwarted, gave in his resignation. But, at that precise moment, the discomfiture of Châtillon was learnt, and the entire disaster charged upon Biron. He was upbraided with having left Nantes to incur the hazard of a siege, and with not having seconded Westermann. Upon the denunciation of Ronsin and his comrades, he was ordered to the bar of the convention. Westermann was put under accusation also, and Rossignol immediately liberated. Such was the fate of the generals in La Vendée amongst the Jacobin emissaries.

General Labarolière succeeded to the command of the troops left at Angers by Biron, and prepared to advance into the country by the bridges of Cé, according to the views of the representatives. After fixing 1400 men at Saumur and 1500 at the bridges of Cé, he pushed on to Brissac, where he stationed a post to secure his communications. His undisciplined army committed the most frightful ravages in a country devoted to the republic. On the 15th July, it was attacked in the camp of Fline by 20,000 Vendéans. The advanced guard, composed of regular troops, resisted with fortitude. The main body, however, was on the verge of flight, when the Vendéans, forestalling it in that purpose, themselves retreated in great disorder. The new battalions thereupon exhibited some degree of ardour; and, in order to encourage them, they were rewarded with praises which the advanced guard alone had merited. On the 17th, the army proceeded to the vicinity of Vihiers; and a fresh attack, received and sustained with the same vigour by the advanced guard, was again repelled. In the course of the day Vihiers itself was occupied. Several of the general officers entertaining the opinion that the battalions of Orleans were too indifferently organised to keep the field, and that with such an army it was impossible to remain amidst a hostile country, strongly counselled a retreat. Labarolière decided that it was expedient to remain at Vihiers, and act on the defensive if attacked. On the 18th, an hour after mid-day, the Vendéans made their appearance; the republican advanced guard displayed its usual gallantry, but the rest of the army shrunk at sight of the enemy, and recoiled in spite of all the efforts of the generals. The Parisian battalions, more disposed to shout "treachery" than to fight, retreated in the utmost disorder. The confusion became general. Santerre, who had dashed into the fray with the greatest intrepidity, narrowly escaped being taken prisoner. The representative Bourbotte was exposed to similar danger; and the army fled so swiftly that in a few hours it had gained Saumur. The division of Niort, which was preparing to move forward, stopped short, and on the 20th it was decided that it should await the re-organisation of the column of Saumur. As some one was to be made answerable for the defeat, Ronsin and his agents denounced the head of the staff, Berthier, and General Menou, who both passed for aristocrats, because they recommended the enforcement of discipline. Berthier and Menou were forthwith ordered to Paris, as had previously been Biron and Westermann.

The fortune of this war, up to the present period, therefore, had thus ruled. The Vendéans, suddenly rising in April and May, had taken Thouars, Loudun, Doué, and Saumur, favoured by the wretched quality of the troops opposed to them, who were nearly all raw recruits. Pouring down as far as Nantes in June, they had been repulsed from that town by Canclaux, and from Sables by Boulard, two generals who possessed the art of establishing order and discipline amongst their soldiers. Westermann, impetuous and valiant, and having some good troops under his command, had penetrated even to Châtillon towards the close of June; but, betrayed by the inhabitants and surprised by the insurgents, he had sustained a signal defeat. Lastly, the column of Tours, designing to advance into the country in conjunction with the battalions of Orleans, had experienced the fate usual to disorganised armies. At the end of July, therefore, the Vendéans were victorious throughout the whole extent of their territory. As to the brave and unfortunate Biron, accused of not being at Nantes when he was visiting Lower Vendée, and of not being with Westermann whilst he was settling a plan of campaign with Canclaux, thwarted and interrupted in all his operations, he had been removed from the army without enjoying any opportunity of signalising himself, his whole sojourn with it having been one continued persecution. Canclaux still remained at Nantes, but the brave Boulard was no longer in command at Sables, and the two battalions of the Gironde had recently withdrawn. The description of La Vendée in July may consequently be thus summed up:—total discomfiture of all the columns in the upper country; complaints and denunciations of the ministerial agents against the generals as alleged aristocrats, and recriminations of the generals against the disorganisers commissioned by the minister and the Jacobins.

Towards the east and the north, the sieges of Mayence and Valenciennes were making alarming progress.

Mayence, situated on the left bank of the Rhine, on the French side, and opposite the mouth of the Maine, forms a large semicircle, whereof the Rhine may be deemed the cord. A considerable suburb, that of Cassel, built on the other bank, communicates with the place by a bridge of boats. The islet of Petersau, situated below Mayence, elongates upwards, its extreme point projecting sufficiently far to be within gunshot of the bridge of boats, and to take the defences of the fortress in flank. On the side of the river, Mayence is protected only by a wall of brick, but on the land side it is fortified most elaborately. Starting from the shore, opposite the point of Petersau, it is defended by an enclosure and a moat, into which flows the rivulet of Zahlbach on its course to the Rhine. At the extremity of this moat, the fort of Hauptstein sweeps its length, combining the protection of its fire to that of the water. Proceeding from this point, the wall continues and rejoins the upper course of the Rhine, but the moat intermits, and is replaced by a second enclosure parallel to the first. Thus, on this side, two rows of walls require a double siege. The citadel, connected with the double enclosure, serves materially to augment its strength.

Such was Mayence in 1793, even before all its fortifications had been completed. The garrison amounted to 20,000 men, because General Schaal, who was directed to retire with a division, had been thrown back into the town, after unsuccessfully attempting to join Custine's army. The magazines of victual were sadly disproportioned to so large a garrison. In the uncertainty that had prevailed whether Mayence was to be retained or not, little alacrity had been manifested in provisioning it. Custine had eventually issued his orders to that effect. The Jews had come forward, but proposed terms of characteristic astuteness; they demanded that all the convoys intercepted on the route by the enemy should be paid for. Rewbel and Merlin refused this offer, apprehensive that the Israelites would themselves contrive to rob the convoys. The granaries, notwithstanding, were well filled with corn; but it was foreseen that if, the mills planted on the river were destroyed, it would be impossible to grind it. Animal food was in scanty store, and the forage especially was quite insufficient for the 3000 horses of the garrison. The artillery was composed of one hundred and thirty pieces of bronze, and sixty of iron, which had been found in the place, and were extremely defective; the French had brought eighty in an efficient state. There was consequently an ample supply of guns to mount the ramparts, but powder was in deficient quantity. The scientific and intrepid Meunier, who had executed the works at Cherbourg, was charged with the defence of Cassel and the posts on the right bank; Doyré directed the operations in the body of the place; Aubert-Dubayet and Kléber commanded the troops; the representatives Rewbel and Merlin encouraged the garrison by their presence. The troops were encamped in the interval between the two enclosures, and occupied at a distance advanced posts. They were animated with the best spirit, reposing great confidence in the strength of the place, in the ability of their leaders, and in their own powers. Moreover, they were deeply sensible that to them was intrusted the defence of a most important point for the safety of France.

General Schoenfeld, encamped on the right bank, encompassed Cassel with 10,000 Hessians. The Austrians and Prussians conjoined formed the grand attack on Mayence. The Austrians occupied the right of the besieging force. In front of the double enclosure, the Prussians composed the centre at Marienbourg, where the head-quarters of the King of Prussia were fixed. The left, likewise composed of Prussians, encamped in front of the fort Hauptstein and the moat inundated by the waters from the rivulet of Zahlbach. The besieging army scarcely amounted to 50,000 men. The aged Kalkreuth held the chief direction. Brunswick commanded a corps of observation on the side of the Vosges, where he acted in concert with Wurmser to protect the main operations. Proving deficient in heavy besieging artillery, a negotiation was opened with the states of Holland, who again denuded their arsenals to aid the progress of their most formidable neighbours.

The investment began in April. Whilst awaiting the convoys of artillery, the offensive fell to the garrison, which omitted no opportunity of making most vigorous sallies. On the 11th April, a few days after the investment, the French generals resolved to attempt a surprise upon Schoenfeld and his Hessians, who were too widely extended on the right bank. Accordingly, during the night, they left Cassel in three columns. Meunier marched straight forward on Hocheim; the two others descended the river towards Biberich; but a musket suddenly discharged in the column of General Schaal threw the ranks into confusion. The troops, still new in war, had not yet acquired that firmness they soon after attained under their able leaders. It was found necessary to retire. Kléber protected the retreat with his column in a manner sufficient to impose respect. This sally availed the besieged forty oxen and cows, which were salted.

On the 16th, the enemy attempted to carry the post of Weissenau, which, placed near the Rhine and to the right of his attack, greatly incommoded him. The French, despite the conflagration of the village, intrenched themselves in a cemetery; the representative Merlin vaulted into the midst of them, and by an admirable display of cool intrepidity they preserved the post.

On the 26th the Prussians dispatched a pretended envoy, who stated he had been sent by the general of the army of the Rhine to advise the garrison to surrender. Generals, representatives, soldiers, already attached to the place, and convinced they were rendering signal service by detaining the army of the Rhine on the frontier, all indignantly rejected the suggestion. On the 3d May the King of Prussia determined to take a post on the right bank, near Cassel, that of Kosteim. Meunier superintended the defence in person. The assault, attempted on the 3d May with formidable obstinacy, and renewed on the 8th, was finally repelled with considerable loss to the besiegers. Meunier, on his part, essayed an attack on the islets situated at the mouth of the Maine. He took them, then lost them, and in each instance displayed an exemplary valour.

On the 30th May, the French executed a general sally on Marienbourg, which King Frederick William had selected as his station. Favoured by the darkness, 6000 men passed through the hostile lines, seized upon the intrenchments, and penetrated even to the royal quarters. However, the alarm being given, they had shortly the whole Prussian army upon their hands, and they retreated, leaving a considerable number of their comrades in the dust. The following day, the King of Prussia, full of wrath at the insult, opened a tremendous fire on the town. That same day, Meunier made a fresh attempt on one of the isles of the Maine. Wounded in the knee, he breathed his last, less as a consequence of his wound than of the irritation he suffered in being obliged to quit the operations of the defence. The whole garrison assisted at his obsequies; the King of Prussia caused the fire to be suspended whilst the last honours were rendering to this hero, and saluted his interment by a salvo of artillery. The body was deposited at the angle of the bastion of Cassel, which he had himself erected.

In the mean time, the heavy convoys arrived from Holland, and the serious business of the siege commenced. A Prussian officer tendered counsel to the effect, that the islet of Petersau, the extremity of which projected between Cassel and Mayence, should be taken possession of, batteries thereon erected, the bridge of boats and the mills destroyed, and Cassel assaulted, so soon as it was isolated and deprived of aid from the fortress. Thereafter he proposed to advance to the moat through which the Zahlbach flowed, cross it under protection of the batteries of Petersau, which would enfilade the moat, and attempt an assault upon that side, which was defended by only one enclosure. This project was daring and hazardous, since it involved the necessity of disembarking at Petersau, and subsequently crossing a moat filled with water and swept by the fire of Hauptstein; but the results it promised would be of speedy realisation if successful. It was deemed expedient, however, to go more cautiously to work; to open a trench on the side of the double enclosure, and in front of the citadel, even under the penalty of making a double siege.

On the 16th June, a first parallel was traced, eight hundred paces from the first wall. The besieged threw the works into disorder, and it was found necessary to abandon them. On the 18th, a fresh parallel was traced at a much greater distance, that is to say, at fifteen hundred paces, which cautious interval provoked sundry sneers on the part of those who had supported the bolder scheme by the isle of Petersau. Between the 24th and the 25th, a further approach was made; the besiegers established themselves at eight hundred paces, and erected batteries. The besieged again molested the works and spiked the guns but they were ultimately repulsed, and overwhelmed by an exterminating fire. On the 28th and 29th, two hundred pieces were brought to bear upon the place, and covered it with projectiles of all sorts. Floating batteries, constructed upon the Rhine, bombarded the interior of the town on its most unprotected quarter, and caused considerable damage.

Nevertheless, the last parallel was not yet opened, the outer enclosure was not yet scaled, and the garrison, full of undiminished ardour, gave not a thought towards surrender. To get rid of the floating batteries, some hardy Frenchmen swam into the stream, and cut the cables of the enemy's boats. In presence of both armies, these men were seen hauling as they swam a large boat, filled with eighty soldiers, who were all made prisoners.

But deplorable distress began to prevail. The mills had been burnt, and in order to grind the corn it was necessary to employ hand-mills. The workmen soon refused to labour at them, because the enemy, advertised of the fact, took care to pour a constant shower of shells on the spot where they were placed. Moreover, the corn was almost entirely exhausted; for some time, the only animal food to be obtained had been the flesh of horses. The common soldiers devoured rats, and went on the banks of the Rhine to hook up any dead horses the river might bear past. Such food proved fatal to many amongst them; it became indispensable to issue a prohibition against its use, and even to plant guards on the shore of the river to prevent them searching for it. A cat was worth six francs; the flesh of a dead horse forty-five sous the pound. The officers fared no better than the soldiers, and Aubert-Dubayet, regaling his staff at dinner, set before its members, as the complement of viands, a cat flanked by twelve mice.

What was still more afflictive to this unfortunate garrison, was the total deprivation of intelligence. The communications were so effectually intercepted, that for three months it was kept in absolute ignorance of what was passing in France. It had endeavoured to make known its distress, first by a lady who was about to travel in Switzerland, next by a priest who had taken the road to the Low Countries, and lastly, by a spy who was to traverse the hostile camp. But all of these dispatches had miscarried. Conceiving that the plan of transmitting intelligence from the Upper Rhine by means of bottles thrown into the river might probably be adopted, the besieged extended nets across the stream. They assiduously drew them every day, but never found any thing to relieve their anxiety. The Prussians, who had practised every variety of stratagem, caused false Moniteurs to be printed at Frankfort, importing that Dumouriez had overturned the convention, and that Louis XVII. was on the throne with a regency. The German soldiers on the advanced posts handed these false Moniteurs to the soldiers of the garrison, and their perusal occasioned the greatest disquietude, adding to the sufferings already in endurance the dreadful apprehension of their possibly defending a ruined cause. Nevertheless, they were content to wait, saying to each other, "The army of the Rhine will soon arrive." Sometimes their hopes were more eager, and they said, "At last, it is here." One night they heard a brisk cannonade at a considerable distance. They started joyfully to their feet, grasped their arms, and prepared to march towards the French cannon, and place the enemy between two fires. Delusive expectation! The sound died away, and no liberating army appeared. At length, the misery had reached so insupportable an extremity, that 2000 inhabitants demanded leave to quit the town. Aubert-Dubayet granted their request; but they were not received by the besiegers, and, remaining between two fires, many cruelly perished beneath the walls. In the morning, the soldiers were seen carrying wounded children in their cloaks.

During all this period, the army of the Rhine and Moselle moved not a step in advance. Custine had commanded it until the month of June. Still in the deep dejection of his retreat, he had continued in a state of irresolution during the entire months of April and May. He alleged that he was not sufficiently strong; that he needed a powerful body of cavalry to cope with that of the enemy in the plains of the Palatinate; that he had no provender to feed his horses; that he must wait until the rye was sufficiently advanced to convert it into forage, and that he would then march to the relief of Mayence.* Beauharnais, his successor, hesitating with the like infirmity of purpose, allowed the opportunity of saving the place to escape. The line of the Vosges, as we know, skirts the Rhine, and terminates not far from Mayence. By occupying the two flanks of the chain and its principal passes, an army possesses a great advantage, because it can be concentrated either wholly on one side or wholly on the other, and thus enabled to overwhelm an enemy by its united masses. Such was the position of the French. The army of the Rhine occupied the eastern flank, and that of the Moselle the western. Brunswick and Wurmser were scattered, at the termination of the chain, along a very extensive cordon. In possession of the passes, the two French armies might have united upon one or other of the two flanks, overpowered either Brunswick or Wurmser, taken the besiegers in the rear, and saved Mayence. Beauharnais, brave but unenterprising, merely executed some uncertain movements, and afforded no relief to the garrison.

The representatives and generals immured in Mayence, reflecting upon the situation of affairs, considered that they were by no means called upon to drive things to the very last extremity; that if they waited eight days longer, they would be in complete destitution, and must surrender as prisoners of war; but that, on the other hand, by capitulating, they would obtain free egress with the honours of war, and preserve 20,000 men, become under Kléber and Dubayet the best soldiers of the republic; for which sufficient reasons they came to the conclusion that the town ought to be surrendered. Doubtless Beauharnais might in a few days advance to its relief, but after having waited so long in vain, they were justified in abandoning all hope of such aid, and the motives inducing them to surrender were potential. The King of Prussia was compliant as to conditions; he allowed the garrison to march out with arms and baggage, and imposed but one stipulation, namely, that it should not serve for one year against the allies. But there were sufficient enemies in the interior to beneficially occupy those admirable soldiers, subsequently known as the Mayencers. They were so attached to their post, that they hesitated to obey their generals when it became necessary to move out of the town—a singular instance of military spirit fixing doggedly on a particular point, and of attachment formed for a place solely recommended by a hazardous defence of some months! However, the garrison yielded upon remonstrance; and whilst it defiled past, the King of Prussia, seized with admiration for its valour, called by their names those officers who had distinguished themselves during the siege, and complimented them with chivalric courtesy. The evacuation took place on the 25th July.

We left the Austrians blockading the fortress of Condé and prosecuting the regular siege of Valenciennes. These operations, carried on simultaneously with those on the Rhine, were also approaching their termination. The Prince of Cobourg, at the head of the corps of observation, took up a position in front of Cæsar's camp, whilst the Duke of York commanded the besieging force. The attack, first projected on the citadel, was ultimately directed between the suburb of Marly and the Mons gate. An ample range of defences was developed on this surface, but it was less guarded by the garrison, and was preferred as being more easy of approach. It was determined to cannonade the works during the day, and to bombard the town during the night, the more effectually to spread desolation amongst the inhabitants, and the sooner terrify them into submission. The place was summoned on the 14th June. General Ferrand and the representatives Cochon and Briest returned an answer couched in terms of befitting dignity. They had mustered a garrison of 7000 men, and inspired the inhabitants with most favourable sentiments, a part of whom they organised into artillery companies, which rendered essential service.

Two parallels were successively opened during the nights of the 14th and 19th June, and endowed with formidable batteries. These caused frightful ravages in the town. The inhabitants and the garrison briskly responded to the vigour of the attack, and several times destroyed the works of the besiegers. The 25th June, in particular, was terrific beyond example. The enemy bombarded the place until mid-day, without any rejoinder on its part; but at that hour an awful fire, bursting from all the ramparts, swept into the trenches, retorting the confusion, dismay, and death, which had prevailed in the town. On the 28th June, a third parallel was traced, and the courage of the inhabitants began to give way. A considerable part of that flourishing town was already laid in ashes. The children, old men, and women, had been deposited in the cellars as places of security. The reduction of Condé, which had just been taken by famine, still further augmented the dejection of the besieged. Emissaries also had been sent to agitate amongst them. Crowds began to collect, demanding a capitulation. The municipality partook the feelings of the inhabitants, and secretly acted in concert with them. The representatives and General Ferrand repudiated with emphatic determination the demands addressed to them, and with the aid of the garrison, whose courage had warmed into high exaltation, they dispersed the riotous assemblages.

On the 25th July the besiegers prepared their mines and made dispositions to assault the covered way. Fortunately for them, three globes of compression exploded at the very moment the mines of the besieged were about to start and destroy their works. They thereupon sprang forward in three columns, cleared the palisades, and penetrated into the covered way. The garrison, struck with terror, recoiled, and abandoned its batteries, but General Ferrand led it back to the ramparts. The artillery, which had worked marvels during the whole siege, again caused tremendous havoc amongst the besiegers, and stopped them almost on the threshold of the fortress. On the morrow, being the 26th July, the Duke of York summoned General Ferrand to surrender, announcing that, after the lapse of that day, he would listen to no proposition, but that both the inhabitants and the garrison would be put to the edge of the sword. At this terrible menace, the people flocked together in considerable crowds: one vast multitude, in which were interspersed men armed with pistols and daggers, surrounded the municipality. Twelve individuals emerged as representatives of all, and presented a formal requisition to surrender. A council of war was sitting amidst the tumult; none of its members could gain egress, all of them being confined until they had decided upon the surrender. Two practicable breaches, hostile inhabitants, and a vigorous assailant, rendered further resistance fruitless. The town was yielded up on the 28th July. The garrison issued forth with the honours of war, was constrained to lay down its arms, but had permission to re-enter France, under the sole condition of not serving for a year against the allies. Thus other 7000 brave soldiers were provided to do efficient service against the enemies of the interior. Valenciennes had sustained a bombardment of forty-one days, and 84,000 balls, 20,000 shells, and 48,000 bombs had been thrown into the town. The general and the garrison had performed all that duty demanded, and the artillery had reaped a vast renown.

At this instant, the war of federalism was reduced to its two grand calamities—the revolt of Lyons on the one hand, and that of Marseilles and Toulon on the other.

Lyons, indeed, consented to acknowledge the convention, but refused to obey two decrees, the one removing to Paris the proceedings commenced against the patriots, the other superseding the authorities, and enjoining the formation of a new provisional municipality. The secret royalists in Lyons affrighted imaginations by depicturing the return of the old Mountaineer municipality, and, by instilling alarm at doubtful and uncertain dangers, drew the city into all the real and inevitable hazards of an open insurrection. On the 15th July, the Lyonnese put the two patriots Chalier and Riard to death, and from that moment they were proclaimed in a state of rebellion. The two Girondists, Chasset and Biroteau, perceiving royalism rearing its head, withdrew from the scene. The president of the popular commission, who was devoted to the emigrants, having, however, been displaced, the manifestations abated somewhat of their hostility. The constitution was recognised, and offers of submission tendered, but always on condition of not executing the two obnoxious decrees. In the interim, the leaders were indefatigable in founding cannon and forming magazines of all warlike stores; and it seemed but too certain that the difficulties could be terminated only by an appeal to arms.

Marseilles was infinitely less formidable. Its battalions, driven beyond the Durance by Cartaux, were incapable of sustaining a long resistance; but it had communicated its spirit of revolt to the city of Toulon, hitherto so emphatically republican. This port, one of the first in the world, and incomparably the first in the Mediterranean, excited the cupidity of the English, who were cruising before its docks. Emissaries of England were furtively at intrigue within it, and laying the train for an infamous perfidy. The sections had assembled on the 13th July, and, proceeding like all those of the south, had superseded the municipality and closed the Jacobin Club. Authority, now transferred to the hands of the federalists, might readily pass, as it moved successively from faction to faction, into those of the emigrants and the English. The army of Nice, in its existing state of weakness, was utterly unable to prevent so direful a calamity. The worst anticipations, therefore, became feasible: that murky tempest, long piled upon the whole horizon of the south, had eventually settled over two prominent points, Lyons and Toulon.

During the last two months, the situation of France had been more clearly displayed, and the danger, less general and astounding, was more distinctly ascertained, more decisively critical. In the west was the corroding sore of La Vendée; at Marseilles an obstinate sedition; at Toulon an impending treason; at Lyons an open resistance and a siege. On the Rhine and in the north was the loss of two bulwarks, which had so long stopped the coalition, and prevented the enemy from marching on the capital. In September 1792, when the Prussians were advancing on Paris, and had taken Longwy and Verdun; in April 1793, after the retreat from Belgium, the defeat of Neerwinden, the defection of Dumouriez, and the first rising of La Vendée; on the 31st May 1793, after the general insurrection of the departments, the invasion of Roussillon by the Spaniards, and the loss of the camp of Famars—at these three periods the dangers had been truly alarming, doubtless, but never perhaps so real as at this fourth and last crisis of the revolution. France was less raw and untutored in war than in September 1792, less bewildered with the dread of treachery than in April 1793, and less embarrassed with insurrections than on the 31st May and the 2d June 1793; but if it were more inured to war and better obeyed, it was invaded at once on all points—on the north, the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees.

But we should have an imperfect conception of the evils which afflicted the republic at this era, if we restricted our contemplation to the five or six battle-fields on which human blood was so freely shed. The interior offered a spectacle equally deplorable. Corn was still scarce and dear. The people contended at the doors of the bakers to obtain a trifling quantity of bread. They vainly disputed with the dealers to induce them to accept assignats in exchange for objects of the first necessity. The wretchedness of want was exhibited in all its most startling colours. The people complained of forestallers, who engrossed the articles of consumption, and of jobbers, who enhanced their price, and threw discredit on the assignats by their traffic. The government, in the same predicament as the people, possessed as its means of existence assignats alone, which it was compelled to disburse in triple or fourfold amount, in purchase of supplies or services, and which it dared not increase in quantity, lest it should still further depreciate their value. It was therefore a matter of equal doubt how either government or people were to subsist.

The general produce, nevertheless, had not diminished. Although the famous night of the 4th August* had not yet produced all its boundless consequences, France was deficient neither in corn nor in raw or manufactured commodities; but their equal and peaceable distribution had become impossible from the inherent evils of the paper money. The revolution having, when abolishing monarchy, determined notwithstanding to pay its debts; when annulling the future sale of offices, become bound to make good their value; when, in short, defending the new order of things against confederated Europe, been obliged to incur the charges of an universal war—it, that same revolution, possessed, to support all these various burdens, the national domains taken from the clergy and the emigrants. In order to bring into circulation the value of those domains, it had imagined the assignats, which formed its representation, and which, by means of progressive sales, were intended to revert to the public exchequer, and be there committed to the flames. But as men began to doubt the ultimate success of the revolution and the validity of its dispositions, they abstained from purchasing its domains. The assignats, therefore, remained in circulation, somewhat like an unaccepted bill of exchange, and fell in credit from the conjoined influence of doubt and superabundant issue.

Specie always remained the sole standard of value; and it is scarcely necessary to say, that a suspicious and unrecognised currency suffers irreparably in competition with an undoubted and incontestible medium. The latter is kept close, and refused to be parted with, whilst the former is offered in profusion, and acquires discredit by the alacrity shown in getting rid of it. Such was the fate of the assignats with reference to the precious metals. But the revolution, long condemned to violent expedients, could not now be checked. It had put into forced circulation the anticipated value of the national domains; it had next to attempt the maintenance of that circulation by forced means. On the 11th April, despite the efforts of the Girondists, who generously though imprudently contended against the force of this revolutionary position, the convention decreed the penalty of six years' imprisonment against any person selling specie, that is to say, exchanging a certain quantity of gold or silver for a greater nominal amount of assignats. It enacted the same penalty against any person stipulating different prices for goods, according as the payment was to be made in coin or paper.

These measures were unavailing to prevent the difference from becoming daily more glaring. In June, a metallic franc was worth three paper francs; and in August, only two months afterwards, it commanded six francs in assignats. The depreciation, which was at the rate of three to one, had therefore advanced to six to one.

Under such circumstances, the dealers refused to vend their commodities at the same price as formerly, for the substantial reason, that the money offered them in exchange was but the fifth or sixth fraction of what it professed to be worth. They accordingly retained with vigilance their various stores, and resolutely withheld them from anxious purchasers. This depreciation of value in the assignats would have been of no moment whatever, undoubtedly, if the whole community, accepting them for precisely what they were worth, had taken and given them at the same standard. In such case, they might have performed the symbolic functions in exchanges, and availed as a circulating medium, equally well with any other description of currency; but the fact was differently ordered. Capitalists who lived on their incomes, and creditors of the state who received either an annual dividend or compensation for an office, were obliged to accept the paper according to its nominal value. All debtors eagerly acquitted their liabilities, and creditors, constrained to allow the factitious value, realised but the fourth, the fifth, or the sixth of their outstanding accounts. Lastly, the labouring population, from its redundancy compelled to sue for employment, to toil for whomsoever would give it, and incompetent to combine in order to enforce a triple or quadruple increase of wages in proportion to the depreciation of assignats, earned but a scanty portion of what was necessary to provide it with essential articles of consumption. The capitalist, despoiled of his legitimate property, was discontented and silent; but the people, wrathful and infuriated, stigmatised as engrossers the dealers who refused to sell them commodities at the ordinary price, and insisted that all engrossers should be sent to the guillotine.

This deplorable situation was the necessary result of the creation of assignats, as the assignats themselves were provoked by the necessity of satisfying obligations imposed by old debts, the abolition of offices, and the prosecution of a ruinous war; and, from the same inevitable tendency, it was obvious the maximum must speedily result from assignats. Trifling indeed was the benefit in rendering that currency forced, if the trader, by enhancing his prices, might elude the obligation to accept it. Hence it became clear, that an assize of commodities must be made imperative equally with that of money. So soon as the law had taken upon itself to declare, "this slip of paper is worth six francs," it ought to have added, "so much merchandise shall be sold for six francs;" for otherwise, the merchant, by upholding it at twelve, adroitly evaded the compulsory exchange.

It had therefore been found indispensable, regardless of the Girondists, who advanced admirable arguments based upon the ordinary economy of things, to establish the maximum on corn. The severest privation to the people is the want of bread. The crops were not deficient, but the farmers, unwilling either to face the tumult of the markets, or to part with their grain at the coercive rate of assignats, kept both themselves and their stocks in seclusion. The small quantity of produce that appeared was quickly snatched up by the communes, and by such of the affluent as apprehensions moved to lay in stores. The scarcity was more sensibly felt at Paris than in any other town of France, because the providing of supplies for so immense a city required more multifarious labours, the markets were more tumultuous, and the terror of the farmers proportionably greater. On the 3d and 4th May, the convention had found it impossible to avoid passing a decree, whereby all farmers and corn-factors were enjoined to declare the quantities of grain in their possession, to thrash out such as might be in sheaf, to convey the same to the markets, and exclusively to the markets, and there dispose of it at an average price, to be fixed by each commune, regulated according to the prices ranging from the 1st of January to the 1st of May. Moreover, by this enactment, no person was allowed to purchase, in satisfaction of his wants, more than a month's consumption; any who should buy or sell at a price exceeding the maximum, or prevaricate in their declarations, were punished by confiscation and a fine of from 300 to 1000 francs. Domiciliary visits were ordered to ascertain the truth, and a statement of all the declarations was to be sent by the municipalities to the minister for the home department, in order therefrom to construct a general statistical table of the resources of France in pulse.

The commune of Paris, superadding its ordinances of police to the decrees of the convention, had regulated the mode of distribution by the bakers of their bread. No individual was competent to present himself for a loaf, unless provided with a certificate of good conduct. Upon this certificate, which was issued by the revolutionary committees, was prescribed the quantity of bread demandable, which allowance was duly proportioned to the number of mouths in each family. These regulations extended even to the manner in which applicants were to stand at the doors of the bakers' shops. A rope was to be attached to each door, which every person was enjoined to hold in his hand, so as not to lose his turn, and to avoid confusion. Malevolent women, however, often cut these ropes, whereupon fearful tumults ensued, rendering the interposition of the armed force necessary to restore order. Thus do we see to what multifarious cares a government is condemned, and to what vexatious measures it finds itself constrained, when circumstances impose upon it the difficult task of providing for every possible contingency, even to the minutest details. But in the course of events, one measure had hung in close connexion with another. Forcing the circulation of assignats had led to forcing exchanges, to forcing prices, to forcing even the quantity, the hour, the mode of purchases; the last fact resulted from the first, and the first had been as inevitable as the revolution itself.

At the same time, the high prices which had provoked the maximum were not confined to grain, but extended to all commodities of primary importance. Animal and vegetable food as well, groceries, candles, fuel, liquors, articles of clothing, leather for shoes, all had risen in proportion as assignats had fallen, and the people grew daily more stubborn in the conviction that the dealers, in refusing to accept a valueless currency, were detestable engrossers. It will be recollected that in February they had pillaged the stores of the grocers, according to the advice of Marat. In July, they plundered some boat-loads of soap, which arrived by the Seine at Paris. The commune, indignant at the outrage, passed severe ordinances on the occasion, and Pache published the following simple and laconic warning:—

"PACHE, THE MAYOR, TO HIS FELLOW-CITIZENS.

Paris contains seven hundred thousand inhabitants. The surface of Paris produces nothing towards feeding, clothing, nourishing them; hence it follows that Paris must derive all from the other departments and from foreign countries.

If, upon the arrival of provisions and articles of merchandise at Paris, the inhabitants pillage them, they will cease to be sent.

Paris will then possess nothing to feed, clothe, or nourish its numerous inhabitants.

And seven hundred thousand men, destitute of every thing, will turn upon and devour each other."

The people plundered no more, but they fiercely clamoured for some terrible retribution on the dealers; and we have already witnessed, in fact, how readily the priest Jacques Roux stirred up the Cordeliers to insist upon an article being inserted in the constitution against engrossers and forestallers. They inveighed with equal fury against stockjobbers, who, they said, contributed to enhance prices by speculating in assignats, gold, silver, and foreign paper.

The popular imagination ran wild in its chimeras, shadowing the obnoxious parties as horrible monsters and relentless enemies, whereas in truth they were but cunning traffickers, profiting by a public calamity, but not producing it, and assuredly without the power to have produced it. The depreciation of assignats hung upon a concatenation of causes: their profuse issue—the insecurity of their hypothec, which would utterly disappear if the revolution succumbed—their comparison with specie, which never lost its intrinsic worth, and with commodities, which, always continuing valuable, could not be obtained in exchange for a debased currency. In this condition of matters, capitalists avoided keeping their funds in assignats, because in such a form they underwent a constant process of atrophy. Their first solicitude had been to procure bullion, but years of sad constraint had effectually scared both buyers and sellers of specie. Their next idea was to purchase merchandise; but it afforded a transitory investment, since it could not be kept for any considerable period, and also a dangerous possession, inasmuch as the wrath against engrossers was undiscriminating and furious. Consequently, their eyes wandered into foreign lands in quest of securities. All who held assignats eagerly sought to procure bills of exchange on London, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Geneva, on all the towns of Europe, in short; and to obtain these foreign remittances they lavished their own domestic securities, and thus greatly contributed to degrade assignats by throwing them superabundantly on the market. Some of these drafts were realised out of France, and their amounts absorbed by emigrants. Magnificent furniture, the wreck of former luxury, consisting of rich cabinets, mirrors, curious clock-work, gilded bronzes, porcelain, pictures, rare editions, &c., paid for these letters of credit, which were transmuted into guineas or ducats. But the greater part of them were not attempted to be realised. In anxious request amongst alarmed capitalists, who had no intention of emigrating, but desired simply to ensure a solid guarantee for their wealth, they almost all remained in the country, and passed currently from one shuddering money-owner to another. They thus formed a peculiar floating capital, guaranteed by foreigners, and became formidable competitors with the home assignats. There is reason to believe that Pitt had engaged the English bankers to accept a great quantity of this paper, and had even opened for the purpose a considerable credit, in order to augment the mass in circulation, and by such means to accelerate the utter discredit of the assignats.

Considerable eagerness was likewise evinced to obtain shares in banking associations, which seemed beyond the influence of either revolution or counter-revolution, and which offered, moreover, an advantageous investment. Those of the discount company were in great demand; but the stock of the India company was sought after with especial avidity, because it rested, as it were, on an unseizable basis, the capital being invested in ships and factories established in various quarters of the globe. It was in vain that a heavy duty had been imposed on transfers; the directors evaded the law by abolishing bonds, and substituting for them a simple inscription on the registers of the company, which was effected without any formality. They thus defrauded the state of a considerable revenue, for several thousands of bargains were made every day, and all the precautions taken to suppress stockjobbing were rendered futile. It was likewise in vain that, in order to lessen the attraction of this stock, the profits had been subjected to a tax of five per cent.; the dividends were distributed to the shareholders as repayment of capital, by which ingenious device the directors again evaded the law. Consequently, from six hundred francs, these shares rose to one thousand twelve hundred, and even two thousand francs. They also formed so much floating medium opposed to the revolutionary currency, which contributed to discredit it.

Furthermore, the assignats had not only to contend with all these varieties of credits, but with certain parts of the public debt, and even with other peculiar assignats. Loans were still in subsistence that had been contracted at different periods and in various forms. Some went as far back as the reign of Louis XIII. Amongst the last contracted under Louis XIV., several were of separate creation. The moneyed interest generally preferred those which were anterior to the constitutional monarchy before such as had been opened for the wants of the revolution. All were in rivalry with the assignats hypothecated on the possessions of the clergy and the emigrants. In fine, between the assignats themselves certain distinctions were drawn. Out of five thousand millions issued since the first fabrication, one thousand had been redeemed by sales of national domains, leaving scarcely four thousand millions in circulation, out of which there might be five hundred millions created under Louis XVI., and impressed with the royal effigy. These last-named would be more favourably considered, it was imagined, in the event of a counter-revolution, and admitted for at least a portion of their value. Accordingly, they bore a premium of ten or fifteen per cent. above the others. The republican assignats, the sole resource of the government, the only currency of the people, were thus infinitely depressed, competing at such heavy disadvantage against bullion, merchandise, foreign drafts, commercial and banking shares, various state obligations, and, lastly, royal assignats.

The compensation for offices, the payment for the extensive supplies furnished to the state in its war contracts, and the promptitude of debtors in redeeming their liabilities, had occasioned great accumulations of funds in a few hands. The war and the brooding dread of fresh convulsions had deplorably interrupted commercial operations, led to divers considerable windings-up and liquidations, and thus further augmented the mass of stagnant capital seeking for safe investment. The funds thus amassed were recklessly abandoned to constant stockjobbing on the Parisian Exchange, being alternately converted into gold, silver, commodities, bills, stocks, old state debts, &c. Upon that busy scene, as usual, appeared those adventurous spirits who cast themselves headlong into all schemes of hazard, speculating on the accidents of trade, on army and other government contracts, on the stability and good faith of states, &c. Close observers of all avenues to gain, they derived profit on every successive enhancement, caused by the constant depression of assignats. The debasement of the assignat, in fact, first of all commenced on the exchange, by quotations of its relative value to specie and all the other floating securities. It afterwards extended with reference to commodities, which were held at advanced rates in the shops and markets. At the same time, the augmentation was not so rapidly developed on commodities as on the precious metals or more favoured investments, because the markets were distant from the exchange, and were less sensitive; moreover, because the dealers could not enter into concert with the promptitude of jobbers gathered into a single hall. The difference, therefore, first determined on 'Change, was not acted upon elsewhere until after an interval of longer or shorter duration; and the assignat of five francs, which had been ruled on the stock-market as worth but two francs, being still current outside for three francs, the speculators had ample opportunity of operating to advantage. Holding their funds disposable, they caught at bullion before the rise; when it advanced in relation to assignats, they exchanged it for the latter; thus obtaining an increased amount, before merchandise had time to be affected by the enhancement, they therewith purchased a larger quantity of goods, which they re-sold when the proportion was re-established. Consequently their trade consisted in monopolising specie and merchandise, whilst both were rising in value with reference to assignats. Their gain was simply the constant profit deducible from the enhancement of all articles as to the assignat; and it was natural that an advantage so peculiarly owing to a public calamity should be viewed with disgust. Their speculations extended to variations in all sorts of securities, such as foreign paper, shares in companies, &c. &c. They availed themselves of all accidents capable of provoking differences or fluctuations, such as a defeat, an important motion, or false intelligence.

The persons engaged in this species of traffic formed a considerable class. Amongst them were foreign bankers, contractors, usurers, former priests and nobles, recent revolutionary upstarts, and deputies, who, for the honour of the convention, did not exceed five or six, and who enjoyed the disgraceful advantage of contributing to fluctuations by adroitly designed motions. They lived in a course of dissipation with actresses, or former nuns and countesses, who sometimes forsook their character of mistresses to interfere in more serious affairs. The two principal deputies immersed in these intrigues were Julien of Toulouse and Delaunay of Angers, who cohabited, the first with the Countess of Beaufort, the second with the actress Descoings. It is alleged that Chabot, of dissolute manners as an ex-capuchin, and often occupied on financial subjects, was devoted to this abominable jobbing, in concert with two brothers named Frey, expelled from Moravia for their revolutionary opinions, and settled at Paris in the calling of bankers. Fabre d'Eglantine was likewise implicated, and even Danton was accused, though without any overt act being assigned, of not being altogether free from the foul reproach.

The most shameless scheme of all was that devised by the Baron de Batz, a banker and astute financier, in conjunction with Julien of Toulouse and Delaunay of Angers, the two deputies most decidedly bent on making money. These persons formed the project of denouncing the malversations of the India Company, thereby depressing its stock, buying-in at the reduction, restoring the value by means of milder motions, and thus reaping the profit of the rise. D'Espagnac, that reprobate abbé whom we remember as Dumouriez's contractor in Belgium, who had since that period obtained the general contract for waggons, and whose bargains Julien protected in the convention, was from gratitude to furnish the funds for this operation. Julien purposed to draw into this scheme likewise Fabre, Chabot, and others, who might become useful as members of different committees.

The majority of these men were attached to the revolution, and were actuated certainly by no wish to injure it; but at the same time, and at all hazards, they were resolute to secure money and the means of commanding enjoyments. The public was unacquainted with the full extent of their secret manœuvres, but, as they were known to speculate on the discredit of assignats, the evil by which they profited was laid to their charge. Inasmuch as there were several foreign bankers associated with them in the same pursuits, they were styled agents of Pitt and the coalition; and here again the mysterious and dreaded influence of the English minister was imagined to be at work. In short, indignation was equally aroused against stockjobbers and engrossers, and the condign punishment of both orders of delinquents was invoked with uniform vehemence and pertinacity.

Thus, whilst towards the north, the Rhine, the south, and La Vendée, the enemies of France were predominant, its financial resources depended on a repudiated currency, whereof the security was uncertain as the revolution itself, and which, at every accident, fell in value according to the extent of the danger.

Hence resulted this singular position: in proportion as the peril augmented, and the means ought to have become greater, they on the contrary contracted; munitions of war were unattainable by the government and provisions by the people. It was therefore necessary to create at once soldiers, armies, and an effective currency for the government and for the people; and after all these marvels, to perform the still greater miracle of ensuring victories.

CHAPTER XXV.

FESTIVAL OF THE 10TH AUGUST, AND INAUGURATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF 1793.—EXTRAORDINARY MEASURES, MILITARY, ADMINISTRATIVE, AND FINANCIAL, OCCASIONED BY THE IMMINENT DANGERS OF THE COUNTRY.—DECREES OF VENGEANCE.

The delegates commissioned by the primary assemblies to attend the celebration of the anniversary of the 10th August, and to accept the constitution in behalf of all France, had in the interim arrived at Paris. It was determined to seize this occasion to excite a movement of enthusiasm, to reconcile the provinces with the capital, and to elicit heroic resolutions. A brilliant reception was prepared for them. The dealers were summoned into the city from all the environs, with their commodities. Vast quantities of provisions were accumulated, in order that no dearth might mar the festivities, and the delegates enjoy the spectacle of combined peace, order, and abundance. Attention was carried to so scrupulous a point, that the directors of public conveyances were ordered to give them seats, even those which might have been already secured by travellers. The administration of the department, which emulated that of the commune in the harsh austerity of its language and proclamations, published an address to "the brethren" of the primary assemblies, couched in these terms:—

"Here, men, assuming the mask of patriotism, will speak to you with enthusiasm of liberty, of equality, of the republic one and indivisible, whilst in the recesses of their hearts they crave and pray only for the re-establishment of royalty and the dismemberment of their country. Such men are the rich: the rich in all eras have abhorred virtue and contaminated manners. There, you will meet depraved women, too seductive in their charms, who will conspire with them to beguile you into vice. Beware—beware, above all, of the former Palais-Royal; it is in that garden you will encounter such snares. That famous garden, the cradle of the revolution, of old the asylum of the friends of liberty and equality, is at this day, in spite of our active precautions, the mere common sewer of society, the haunt of miscreants, the den of all conspirators. Shun that infected spot; prefer, to the dangerous spectacle of luxury and debauchery, the inspiring scenes of industrious virtue; visit the faubourgs, the founders of our liberty; enter the workshops, where men, active, simple, and virtuous as yourselves, and like you ready to defend the country, have long expected you, to tighten the bands of fraternity. Come, especially, into our popular societies. Let us unite, let us animate our courage before these fresh dangers of the country, and let us swear for the last time the death and destruction of all tyrants!"

The first care was to entice them to the Jacobin Club, which greeted them with a most cordial welcome, and offered them its hall to assemble in during their stay. The delegates accepted the offer; and it was agreed they should deliberate in the society itself, and be incorporated with it whilst at Paris. Hence it occurred that the capital was merely favoured for a time with four hundred Jacobins the more. The club, which was accustomed to sit every alternate day, resolved to meet daily for the important purpose of discussing measures of public welfare with the delegates of the departments. A report was circulated that some amongst these delegates were inclined towards indulgence, and held instructions to demand a general amnesty on the day set apart for the acceptance of the constitution. In fact, certain individuals had suggested this expedient as a means of saving the Girondists and all others detained for political causes. But the Jacobins were adverse to any composition, energy and vengeance being to them indispensable concomitants. "The delegates of the primary assemblies had been calumniated," said Hassenfratz, "by a rumour busily propagated that they purposed proposing an amnesty; they were incapable of such conduct, and would unite with the Jacobins in demanding, conjointly with urgent measures for public safety, the punishment of all traitors." The delegates deemed this a significant intimation; and if any, few at all events, ever entertained the project of an amnesty, none ventured to give it utterance.

On the morning of the 7th August, they were conducted to the commune, and from the commune to the Evêché, where the club of electors was held, and wherein had been concocted the 31st May. Therein it was determined should be effected the reconciliation of the departments with Paris, since the attack upon the national representation had thence originated. The Mayor Pache, the procurator Chaumette, and the whole municipality, marching at their head, ushered the delegates into the association of the Evêché. On both sides satisfactory harangues were pronounced; the Parisians declared they had never dreamt of contemning or usurping the rights of the departments; the delegates in return acknowledged that Paris had been calumniated; whereupon they mingled in a general embrace, and gave way to the spontaneous feelings of enthusiasm. The idea suddenly started in their minds to repair to the convention, in order that it might rejoice in the knowledge of this happy reconciliation. Accordingly, they forthwith proceeded thither, and were introduced the moment of their arrival. The debate was suspended, and one of the delegates stepped forward to address the assembly.

"Citizen representatives," said he, "we have come to let you know how joyful and affecting a scene has just occurred in the hall of the electors, whither we had gone to give the kiss of peace to our brethren of Paris. Speedily, we trust, the heads of all calumniators of this republican city will fall under the sword of the law. We are all Mountaineers. Long live the Mountain!"

Another suggested that the representatives should give the delegates the kiss fraternal. Instantly the members of the assembly left their seats and rushed into the arms of the departmental delegates. After some moments passed in the tender emotions natural to such a scene, the delegates defiled through the hall, uttering cries of "Long live the Mountain! The republic for ever!" and chanting in full chorus—

"La Montagne nous a sauvé
En congediant Gensonné;
La Montagne nous a sauvé
En congediant Gensonné.
Au diable les Buzot,
Les Vergniaud, les Brissot!
Dansons la carmagnole," &c.*

They ultimately returned to the Jacobin Club, where they drew up, in the name of all the delegates of the primary assemblies, an address intended to assure the departments that Paris had been calumniated. "Friends and brethren," they wrote, "calm, calm your disquietude. We are all here of one feeling. All our souls are blended; and triumphant liberty surveys none but Jacobins, brothers, and friends. The Bog (Marais) is no more. We form but one enormous and terrible MOUNTAIN, which is preparing to vomit its fires on all royalists and partisans of tyranny. Perish the infamous slanderers who have calumniated Paris! We all keep watch here night and day; and we labour, in concert with our brethren of the capital, for the common safety. We will not return to our hearths until we can announce to you that France is free and that the country is saved." This address, having been read aloud and enthusiastically applauded, was immediately dispatched to the convention, in order that it might be inserted in the bulletin of its sitting. A general rapture pervaded the meeting: all desired to speak, the tribune was besieged by an eager throng of excited orators, and a bewildering intoxication was rapidly affecting all heads. Observing the brewing trouble, Robespierre asked to be heard. Every one hastened to yield him the tribune. Jacobins and delegates, all combined in applauding the celebrated orator, whom many of the latter had not yet seen or heard.

He congratulated the departments on having recently saved France. "They saved it," he said; "for the first time in 1789, by spontaneously flying to arms; for the second time, by repairing to Paris to execute the 10th August; the third time, by giving, in the heart of the capital, a spectacle of union and general reconciliation. At this moment, untoward events have afflicted the republic and put its existence in danger; but republicans are not allowed to fear; they have to discard emotions which may incite them to disorders. Many are on the watch to produce a factitious scarcity and instigate a tumult—men who would lead the people to the arsenal to plunder its stores and set it on fire, as has happened in several towns, and who do not despair of again provoking a catastrophe in the prisons, in order to calumniate Paris and dissolve the union which has so recently been sworn. Beware all such snares; be calm and firm; look the calamities of the country fearlessly in the face, and let us all strenuously labour to save it."

These words tended to allay the ferment; and the meeting separated, after bestowing on the sagacious orator reiterated plaudits.

No disturbance occurred to embroil Paris during the succeeding days; but nothing was omitted to move the imaginations of men and stimulate them to a generous ardour. No danger was concealed, no sinister intelligence withheld from the people. Official announcements made known successively the defeats in La Vendée; the alarming accounts from Toulon; the retrograde movement of the army of the Rhine, which was receding before the conquerors of Mayence; and, lastly, the extreme peril of the army of the north, which was intrenched in Cæsar's camp, and which the imperialists, the English, and the Dutch, masters of Condé and Valenciennes, and forming a twofold mass, might at any hour carry by a sudden assault. Between Cæsar's camp and Paris there were scarcely forty leagues, and not a regiment, not a single obstacle capable of arresting an enemy. If any signal disaster befel the army of the north, all was lost; and accordingly the slightest rumours coming from that quarter were gathered with intense anxiety.

The alarm was well founded, for at this moment Cæsar's camp was exposed to imminent hazard. On the evening of the 7th August, the allies had appeared in force before it, and threatened it on all sides. Between Cambray and Bouchain stretches a chain of heights, protected by the course of the Scheldt. Here was placed the so-called Cæsar's camp, resting on two fortresses and skirted by a river. The Duke of York, commissioned to turn the French, debouched in view of Cambray, which formed the right of Cæsar's camp, on the afternoon of the 7th. He summoned the place, to which the commandant replied by closing his gates and burning the suburbs. Cobourg, on the same evening, arrived with a mass of 40,000 men, in two columns, on the banks of the Scheldt, and bivouacked in front of the French camp. A scorching heat paralysed the strength of both men and horses; several soldiers, struck by the rays of the sun, had expired during the day. Kilmaine, who had been nominated to replace Custine, but had merely consented to hold the command provisionally, deemed it impossible to retain so hazardous a position. Menaced with having his right flank turned by the Duke of York, and possessing scarcely 35,000 discouraged troops to oppose to 70,000 men flushed with victory, he judged it more prudent to retreat, and gain time by seeking another post. The line of the Scarpe, running behind that of the Scheldt, seemed to him an advisable position to occupy. Between Arras and Douay, heights skirted by the Scarpe form a camp similar to Cæsar's, being like it supported by two fortresses and defended by a river. Kilmaine made preparations for his retreat the following morning, the 8th August. His main body was to cross the Ceuse, a small river meandering in the rear of the ground he occupied, and he himself was to move with a strong rearguard towards the right, where the Duke of York stood in full readiness to debouch.

On the morrow, accordingly, at daybreak, the heavy artillery, the baggage, and the infantry, got in motion, passed the Ceuse, and destroyed the bridges. An hour afterwards, Kilmaine, with some batteries of light artillery and a strong division of cavalry, moved to the right, in order to protect the retreat against the English. He could not have arrived more opportunely. Two battalions, having wandered in their route, found themselves entangled in the little village of Marquion, and were then engaged stoutly resisting the English. Despite their efforts, however, they were on the point of being overwhelmed. Kilmaine, arriving at the critical moment, planted his light artillery on the enemy's flank, sent upon him a charge of cavalry, and compelled him to retire. The battalions were then disengaged and enabled to rejoin the rest of the army.

In the mean time, the English and imperialists, debouching at once on the right and front of the camp of Cæsar, found it completely evacuated. Finally, towards the close of day, the French were united in the camp of Gavarelle, resting on Arras and Douay, and having the Scarpe before them.

Thus, on the 8th August, Cæsar's camp was evacuated as that of Famars had been, and Cambray and Bouchain were left to their own resources like Condé and Valenciennes. The line of the Scarpe, running behind that of the Scheldt, is not, as a glance at the map will show, between Paris and the Scheldt, but between the Scheldt and the sea. Kilmaine therefore had diverged to one side instead of marching backwards, and a part of the frontier was consequently exposed. The allies had it in their power to burst over the whole department of the north. What course they should adopt was a question fraught with deep solicitude. Were they to devote a day's march to attack the new-formed camp of Gavarelle, and dissipate the enemy who had just escaped them? Were they to march on Paris, or return to their old project upon Dunkirk? In this state of suspense, they pushed their stragglers as far as Péronne and Saint-Quentin, and terror spread to Paris, where it was repeated with dismay that Cæsar's camp was lost, like that of Famars, and that Cambray was abandoned like Valenciennes. On all sides execrations arose against Kilmaine, the essential service he had rendered by his dexterous retreat being utterly overlooked.

The preparations for the solemn festival of the 10th August, destined to electrify the national mind, proceeded amidst these sinister forebodings. On the 9th, a report on the analysis of votes was presented to the convention, by which it appeared the forty-four thousand municipalities had accepted the constitution. Only in the complement of votes there lacked those of Marseilles, Corsica, and La Vendée. A solitary commune, that of Saint-Tonnant, in the department of the Côtes-du-Nord, was daring enough to demand the re-establishment of the Bourbons on the throne.

On the 10th the festival commenced with the day. To the celebrated painter David had been left the chief direction and arrangement. At four in the morning the procession assembled on the square of the Bastille. The convention, the delegates of the primary assemblies (out of whom the eighty-six seniors had been selected to represent the eighty-six departments), the popular societies, and all the sections under arms, were drawn up around a vast fountain, styled "of Regeneration." This fountain was formed by a colossal statue of Nature, pouring water from its breasts into an immense basin. When the beams of the rising sun were seen on the summits of the edifices, the great luminary was saluted with stanzas sung after the air of the Marseillaise. The president of the convention took a cup, sprinkled on the earth the water of regeneration, then put it to his lips, and passed the vessel to the seniors of the departments, who all drank from it in turn. After that ceremony, the procession advanced along the Boulevards. The popular societies, displaying a banner on which was painted the eye of Vigilance, marched in the van. Then came the entire convention. Each of its members held a bouquet of ears of wheat; and eight of them, occupying the centre, bore on an ark the Constitutional Act and the Rights of Man. Encompassing the convention, the seniors formed a chain, holding together by a tricoloured cord. These carried in their hand branches of olive, the symbol of reconciliation between the provinces and Paris, and pikes, intended to form part of the national fasces, illustrative of the concord amongst the eighty-six departments. Following this portion of the procession, came groups of artisans with the implements of different trades. In the midst of them appeared a cart containing an old man and his aged spouse, and drawn by their youthful sons. This cart was followed by a chariot of war, on which rested an urn in honour of the soldiers who had died for their country. Finally, the march was closed by hurdles loaded with sceptres, crowns, armorial bearings, and stuffs interwoven with fleurs de lis.

The procession traversed the Boulevards and proceeded to the Place de la Revolution. When passing the Boulevard Poissonnière, the president of the convention presented a branch of laurel to the heroines of the 5th and 6th October, who were seated on their cannon. On the Place de la Revolution he again paused, and set fire to all the emblems of royalty and nobility dragged in the hurdles. He afterwards removed a veil thrown over a statue, which, emerging to public view, displayed the august features of Liberty. Salvos of artillery announced the moment of its inauguration; and, at the same instant, thousands of birds, bearing diminutive streamers, were launched into the air, seeming, as they regained their native liberty, to be typical of the earth's enfranchisement.

The procession then moved on towards the Champ-de-Mars by the Place des Invalides, and defiled before a colossal figure representing the French people in the act of overthrowing federalism, and stifling it in the slime of a quagmire. At length it reached the Field of the Federation. There it divided into two columns, which drew up around the altar of the country. The president of the convention and the eighty-six seniors occupied the summit of the altar; the members of the convention and the mass of departmental delegates occupied the steps. Each group of artisans approached in succession to deposit around the altar the produce of its trade, manufactures, fruits, and commodities of all kinds. The president of the convention, uniting together the records upon which the primary assemblies had registered their votes, laid them upon the altar of the country. A general discharge of artillery instantly rent the air, the vast concourse of people joined their voices to the roar of the cannon, and all swore, with the same enthusiasm as on the 14th July 1790 and 1792, to defend the constitution—a vain solemnity, if we regard the letter of the constitution, but a heroic and well-sustained pledge, if we consider merely the territory and the revolution. Constitutions passed away, indeed, but the soil and the revolution were defended with undeviating fortitude and constancy.

After this ceremony, the eighty-six seniors delivered their pikes to the president, who, uniting them into one fascis or bundle, confided it, together with the constitutional act, to the delegates of the primary assemblies, exhorting them to combine all their powers around the ark of the new covenant. A separation then took place: one portion of the procession accompanied the urn, sacred to the ashes of the French killed in fighting for their country, to the temple destined for its reception; the remainder proceeded to deposit the ark of the constitution in a sanctuary fitted as a temporary resting-place, its ultimate destination being the hall of the convention, whither it was to be removed the following day. A grand representation, pourtraying the siege and bombardment of Lille, and the heroic resistance of its inhabitants, occupied the residue of the day, and disposed the minds of the people to warlike scenes.

Such was the federation of France as a republic. We no longer perceive, as in 1790, all the classes of a great nation, rich and poor, patricians and plebeians, blended for an instant in a common rapture, and, weary of corroding animosities, pardoning for a few hours their differences of rank and opinion; but we perceive an immense population, speaking no more of pardon, but of danger, devotedness, and resolutions based on despair, and enjoying with a species of delirium those imposing ceremonies on the eve of rushing into the field of battle. One circumstance tended to heighten the character of this scene, and obviate the ridicule which scornful or hostile minds might seek to throw upon it, namely, the undoubted peril and the enthusiasm with which it was braved. On the first federation of the 14th July 1790, the revolution was as yet innocent and benignant, but it was quite possible it might not prove earnest, might be put an end to, in fact, as an absurd farce, by foreign bayonets; in August 1793 it was stained with tragedies, but great, signalised by victories and defeats, and earnest as could be an irrevocable and heroic resolution.

The crisis was such as led irresistibly to extreme measures. Ideas, which at any other time would have been denounced as at once extraordinary and monstrous, were every where in fermentation. It was proposed to exclude all nobles from employments; to decree the general incarceration of the suspected, against whom no law sufficiently precise existed; to ordain a levy of the population in a mass; to seize upon all the stocks of food, and transport them into magazines belonging to the republic, which should take upon itself the distribution to each individual; in short, all were bent upon devising, but unavailingly, some project by which sufficient resources might be instantaneously forthcoming. It was especially demanded that the convention should continue its functions, and not resign its powers to the new legislature which ought to succeed it, but that the constitution should be veiled as the statue of the law, until the general defeat of the enemies of the republic.

It was at the Jacobin Club these ideas were successively propounded. Robespierre, no longer striving to moderate the exaggerated tone of opinion, but on the contrary fostering it, insisted with particular force on the necessity of maintaining the National Convention in its functions; and he therein gave sound advice. The dissolution at this moment of an assembly which had taken upon itself the entire government, and in which divisions had ceased, in order to replace it by a new and inexperienced assembly, which would be again torn by factions, was much too hazardous an experiment. The provincial delegates, surrounding Robespierre, exclaimed that they had sworn to remain together until the convention had adopted measures of public welfare, and that they would constrain it to continue in power. Audoin, the son-in-law of Pache, afterwards spoke, and proposed to demand the levy en masse, and the general arrest of the suspected. Thereupon the delegates of the primary assemblies digested a petition, and the following day, the 12th, proceeded to present it at the bar of the convention. In this document they prayed that the convention might itself undertake to save the republic; that no amnesty should be granted; and that the suspected should be apprehended, sent in the van against the enemy, and the people levied en masse march behind them. Part of these propositions were adopted. The arrest of the suspected was decreed in principle; but the project of a national levy, appearing too violent a measure, was remitted for consideration to the committee of public welfare. The Jacobins were dissatisfied with this slight concession, and continued strenuously to uphold in their club that the exigency required not a partial but a universal movement.

On the following day the committee made its report, and recommended a decree much too vague, and a proclamation infinitely spiritless and insipid.

"The committee," said Danton, "has not declared all; it has not declared that if France be vanquished, if she be desolated, the rich will be the first victims to the rapacity of the tyrants; it has not declared that the vanquished patriots will rend and consume with fire this republic rather than see it fall into the hands of their insolent conquerors! Such are the truths these selfish rich must be taught. What are your hopes," added Danton—"you who will do nothing to save the republic? Do you reflect upon what will be your lot should liberty succumb? A regency directed by an imbecile, an infant king whose minority will be long; in short, the dismemberment of our provinces, and a frightful convulsion! Yes, ye wealthy, you will be taxed, you will be squeezed, more, a thousand times more, than you are asked to contribute in order to save your country and perpetuate liberty! The convention has in its hands the popular thunder; let it make use of it, and hurl it at the head of tyrants. It has the delegates of the primary assemblies, it has its own members; let it send both of them to operate a general arming."

The proposed enactment was again remitted to the committee. The next day, the Jacobins once more dispatched the delegates of the primary assemblies to the convention. These reiterated their demands, repudiating any partial recruiting, but insisting upon the national levy, "because," they urged, "half measures are fatal, and the whole nation is more easily electrified than a portion of its citizens."—"If you require," they added, "one hundred thousand soldiers, they will not be found; but millions of men will respond to a general invocation. Let there be no dispensation for any citizen physically competent to bear arms, whatever may be his calling; let agriculture alone preserve the labourers necessary to draw from the earth its alimentary products. Let the course of trade be temporarily stayed, let all business stagnate, let the great, the absorbing and universal object of the French be—to save the republic!"

The convention could no longer resist so energetic an appeal. Itself partaking the enthusiasm of the petitioners, it directed its committee to retire and draw up, on the very instant, the resolution for the levy en masse. The committee reappeared in a few minutes, and submitted the following formula, which was adopted amidst universal transport:—

"Art. 1. The French people declare, by the medium of their representatives, that they are prepared to rise in one aggregate mass for the defence of their liberty and constitution, and to deliver the soil from their enemies.

Art. 2. The committee of public welfare will present to-morrow the mode of organisation for this great national movement."

By other articles, eighteen representatives were named, to proceed over the whole of France, and direct the delegates of the primary assemblies in their requisitions of men, horses, munitions, and victuals. This vast impulse given, all became possible. When once it was resolved that entire France, men and things, belonged to the government, that government was placed in a position enabling it to accomplish all that it might deem useful or indispensable with reference to existing danger, and as impelled by its own increasing capacity and vigour. Of course, it was not necessary to levy the population en masse, and interrupt production, even the labours essential to human subsistence; but it was necessary that the government should have the power to insist upon every sacrifice, so that it did not exact more than might be sufficient for the exigencies of the moment.

The month of August, then, was the epoch of those renowned decrees which put all France in motion, all its resources in activity, and terminated to the advantage of the revolution its last and most terrible crisis.

The stupendous task imposed was to draw the population into the field, to provide it with arms, and liquidate, by some new financial measure, the expense of this vast displacement; to bring the paper money into relation with the price of food and commodities; to distribute armies and generals in the manner best adapted to each theatre of war; and, finally, to satisfy revolutionary anger by signal and terrible executions. We are about to show what the government did to meet at once both these urgent wants and these evil passions, which it could not avoid appeasing, since they were inseparable from the energy which rescues a nation in the climax of danger.

To demand from each locality a determinate contingent in men was unsuitable to the circumstances; it would have involved a doubt of the enthusiasm of the French, and that enthusiasm was to be presumed for the very purpose of exciting it. That German mode of imposing so many men, like so much dross, on each district, was, moreover, in contradiction with the principle of a national levy. A general enrolment by the system of drawing lots was equally inappropriate. In such a plan, all not being called out, each would seek to gain exemption, and deplore the chance which compelled him to serve. On the other hand, an actual levy en masse exposed France to universal disorder, and was laughed to scorn by the moderates and counter-revolutionists. In this difficulty, the committee of public welfare devised a scheme the best adapted to the circumstances of the moment, which consisted in placing the whole population in a state of disposition, dividing it by generations, and draughting these generations according to age and the exigencies arising. "From this moment," bore the decree,* "until that in which all enemies shall have been driven from the territory of the republic, all Frenchmen shall be in permanent requisition for the service of the armies. The young men will go to battle; the married will manufacture arms and transport supplies; the women will make tents, clothes, and tend the hospitals; the children will prepare lint from old linen; the old men will congregate in public places to stimulate the courage of the warriors, and uphold hatred to kings and love to the republic."

All young men, unmarried or widowers without children, from the age of eighteen to twenty-five, were to compose the first levy, called the first requisition. They were directed to assemble forthwith, not in the chief towns of the departments, but in those of the districts, for, since the date of federalism, alarm was felt at any large muster in departments, which might suggest a feeling of strength and ideas of revolt. Another motive likewise existed for the regulation, derived from the difficulty of amassing, in the chief towns, food and other supplies adequate to satisfy such large bodies. The battalions formed in the district-towns were immediately to commence military exercises, and hold themselves ready to depart at a moment's notice. The generation from twenty-five to thirty was enjoined to prepare for active service, and in the interim to perform the duty of a home force. The residue, from thirty to sixty, was disposable at the pleasure of the representatives commissioned to operate this gradual levy. But notwithstanding these general arrangements, the aggregate and instantaneous levy of the entire population was ordained in certain of the more threatened localities, such as La Vendée, Lyons, Toulon, along the Rhine, et cetera.

The means employed to arm, lodge, and subsist the levies, were in accordance with the circumstances. All horses and beasts of burden with which agricultural and manufacturing industry could dispense, were declared under requisition, and placed at the disposal of the army purveyors. The best weapons were to be given to the generation destined for immediate service; fowling-pieces and pikes were appropriated to the duty of the interior. In the departments where manufactories of arms could be established, the public places and promenades, and the large buildings included in the national domains, were to be used in constructing workshops. The principal establishment of this description was at Paris. Forges were planted in the gardens of the Luxembourg, and machines for boring cannon on the banks of the Seine. All gunsmith artisans were put under requisition, as well as clock and watchmakers, who had but indifferent employment at the moment, and could be made useful in certain parts of gun fabrication. Thirty millions were placed at the disposition of the minister at war for this manufactory alone. These extraordinary measures were to be pursued until a supply of one thousand muskets daily were produced. This immense establishment was fixed at Paris, because, under the immediate vigilance of the government and the Jacobins, indolence became impossible, and all the marvels of dispatch and energy were ensured. And, in truth, the interval was not long before this manufactory fulfilled its stipulated duties.

Saltpetre proving deficient, it was thought possible to extract it from the mould of cellars. A resolution was accordingly adopted to have them all inspected, in order to judge whether the soil in which they were dug contained any such particles. Each individual, therefore, was called upon to allow his cellars to be visited and dug up, so that the soil might be separated when it contained saltpetre.

The houses which had become national property were set apart as barracks and magazines.

The different measures taken to provide food for these great armed masses were equally extraordinary in their character. The Jacobins held the creed, that the republic, obtaining a general statement of the quantities of corn in the country, should purchase the whole, and constitute itself the distributor thereof, both giving to the soldiers who had taken up arms for it, and selling to other citizens at a moderate price. This tendency to undertake all operations, to supersede nature herself, when her dispositions were not according to their desires, was not so blindly followed as the Jacobins would have wished. Nevertheless, injunctions were forwarded that the statements respecting the quantities of food, already ordered from the municipalities, should be promptly concluded and sent to the minister of the interior, in order that a general statistical table of deficiencies and resources might be prepared. It was furthermore ordained that the thrashing of the grain should be completed where any still remained in sheaf; and that if obstinate individuals refused to expedite this process, the municipalities should themselves cause it to be performed; that the farmers and holders of corn should pay their overdue contributions, and two-thirds of those for the year 1793, in kind; and, lastly, that the farmers and tenants of property become national should likewise furnish their rents in kind.

The execution of these measures was necessarily to be as extraordinary as themselves. Limited powers, wielded by local authorities which would have been incessantly thwarted by resistances, and which, moreover, could not, in the nature of things, have manifested uniform energy and alacrity, were utterly inappropriate, both as regarded the measures themselves and their indispensable urgency. The dictatorial authority of the commissioners of the convention, was again the only medium which could be efficiently employed. They had been previously engaged in accelerating the first levy of 300,000 men decreed in March, and that mission they had promptly and successfully accomplished. When sent to the armies, they kept watch upon the generals and their operations, sometimes contradicted trained officers, but on all occasions stimulated zeal, and communicated a resolute determination. When immured in fortified towns, they had sustained sieges with heroic fortitude, as at Valenciennes and Mayence; when distributed through the interior, they had powerfully contributed to stifle federalism. They were consequently again employed in this emergency, and invested with unlimited powers to execute the decreed requisitions of men and things. Having under their orders the deputies of the primary assemblies, with authority to direct them according to pleasure, and delegate to them a part of their powers, they held as their instruments men zealously devoted, accurately informed of the state of each locality, and possessing no sway but such as they themselves might permit for the advantage of this extraordinary service.

There were already various representatives in the interior, as in La Vendée, at Lyons, and at Grenoble, commissioned to eradicate the remains of federalism, and now eighteen more were named, with instructions to divide France amongst them, and take measures, in concert with those already executing missions, to get into marching train the youths of the first requisition, to arm them, to lay in stores for their subsistence, and to direct them upon the expedient points, according to the advice and demands of the generals. They were furthermore empowered to complete the unqualified submission of the federalist administrations.

These military arrangements were only a portion of the difficulties to be encountered and overcome. The expenses occasioned by the war, and all the preparations to meet it, required some financial operations, extraordinary of course, like all the rest. We are acquainted with the situation of France under its financial aspect. A national debt in a loose and disorderly state, comprising loans of every variety in form and date, in direct hostility with the debts contracted under the republic; depreciated assignats, labouring under a most unequal competition with specie, foreign paper, commercial and banking stock, and quite incompetent to avail the government in defraying the public expenditure, or the people in acquiring the commodities essential to existence;—such is the summary of the fiscal condition. What course should be adopted in so dismal a conjuncture? Ought money to be borrowed, or assignats issued? To borrow was out of the question, amid the confusion already prevailing in the public debt, and the want of confidence in the engagements of the republic. To issue assignats was easy; the national press only needed to be set in motion. But the smallest outlay would require an enormous emission of paper, or at all events five or six times more than its nominal value, whereby the great calamity of its depression would be necessarily augmented, and a further enhancement in the price of commodities provoked. We shall proceed to expound the policy wherewith genius inspired the men now charged with the safety of France.

The first and most indispensable step was to infuse order into the debt, and terminate that division into contracts of all forms and epochs, which, from their differences in origin and nature, gave occasion to an obnoxious and counter-revolutionary system of stock-jobbing. A knowledge in these old obligations, their verification and their classification, required a particular study, and were attended with abominable complication in the accounts. It was only at Paris that a stockholder could receive his dividends, and sometimes the division of his capital amongst the various portions of the debt obliged him to present himself before twenty different cashiers. The state obligations were composed of the funded debt, the debt exigible at a fixed term, and the debt exigible at current periods as compensation; consequently, the exchequer was daily subjected to expiries, and obliged to procure funds to meet the engagements falling due. "We must uniformise and republicanise the debt," said Cambon; and he proposed to convert all the bonds held by the state creditors into an enrolment on the pages of a register, which should be styled the Great Book of the Public Debt. This inscription, and the certificate thereof delivered to the creditors, were to be henceforth their only titles. In order to allay apprehension respecting the safety of this book, a duplicate was to be deposited in the archives of the treasury; and, at all events, it would not be more exposed to fire or other accidents than the deeds of notaries. The creditors were, therefore, within a stipulated interval, to present their securities, in order that they might be inscribed and subsequently burnt. The notaries were enjoined to produce all the titles wherewith they had been intrusted, and an imprisonment of ten years was imposed on any who, before the surrender, should take or deliver copies. If the fundholder allowed six months to elapse without causing his name to be enrolled, he lost his dividends; if he permitted a year to expire, he was denuded and lost his capital.

"In this manner," said Cambon, "the debt contracted by despotism will be no longer distinguishable from that which has been contracted since the revolution; and I defy his highness Despotism, if he should ever be resuscitated, to recognise his old debt when it shall be confounded with the new. This operation once accomplished, you will see the capitalist, who desires a king because he has a king for his debtor, and who is afraid of losing his security if his debtor be not re-established, become fond of the republic when it ranks as his debtor, because he will be afraid of losing his capital by its destruction."

This was, however, far from being the only advantage of the arrangement; it held out others equally great, and first gave a foundation to the system of public credit. The capital stock of each fundholder was converted into a perpetual annuity at the rate of five per cent. Thus, the creditor for a sum of one thousand livres was inscribed in the great book for an annuity of fifty francs. By this means, the old debts, whereof some bore an usurious interest and others were subjected to unjust deductions or grievous imposts, were all placed on an uniform and equitable scale; the state, changing its debt into a perpetual rent-charge, was no longer exposed to inconvenient demands, and could never be obliged to reimburse capital so long as it punctually discharged the interest. Furthermore, an easy and advantageous mode of satisfying its obligations was presented to the state, by the redemption of the annuity altogether, whensoever it should fall below its value: for example, when an annuity of fifty livres, representing a capital of one thousand francs, was worth but eight hundred or nine hundred livres, the state would gain, as Cambon propounded, a tenth or a fifth, as the case might be, of the capital stock, by re-purchasing out and out. This kind of extinguishment was not yet organised by means of a fixed redemption, but the process itself was contemplated, and the science of public credit began to be more accurately understood.

Thus the inscription in the great book simplified the forms of title, linked the stability of the state debt to that of the republic, and converted the stocks into perpetual annuities, whereof the capital was not exigible, and the interest identical for all portions. This idea was simple, and borrowed in part from the English; but it required high courage in confronting difficulties to apply it to France, and there was the further merit of its introduction at the most fitting moment. Unquestionably, an appearance of force may be objected to an operation destined thus abruptly to change the nature of titles and funds, to reduce interest to an uniform rate, and smite with forfeiture the creditors who should repudiate the conversion; but, for a state, justice consists in the best order possible; and this great and energetic simplification of the debt was in perfect harmony with a hardy and sweeping revolution, of which the main design was to subject all things to one common standard of natural law.

The project of Cambon united with this boldness of spirit a scrupulous respect for engagements contracted with foreigners, to whom pledges of reimbursement at stipulated periods had been given. It provided that, in consequence of assignats not having currency out of France, foreign creditors should be paid in specie and at stated dates. Moreover, the communes having incurred particular liabilities, and their creditors being greatly incommoded by their breach of punctuality in liquidating them, the state took their debts upon itself, sequestrating their property only to the extent of the sums appropriated to the redemption. The project was adopted in all its particulars,* and executed with the same ability that marked its conception. The capital of the debt, when thus reduced to uniformity, was converted into a mass of annuities amounting to two hundred millions yearly. In order to replace the old imposts of different kinds with which it had been charged, it was deemed expedient to burden it with an indefeasible tax of one-fifth, which reduced the aggregate of interest to one hundred and sixty millions. In this manner all was lucidly and simply organised; a prolific source of stockjobbing was destroyed, and confidence revived, because a partial bankruptcy, with regard to such or such peculiar descriptions of stock, could no longer possibly occur, and a general bankruptcy for the whole debt was not to be presumed.

From this time it became more easy to have recourse to a loan. We shall see in what manner such a measure was called in aid of the assignats.

The national domains always formed the only fund upon which the revolution could rely for its extraordinary expenses. This fund, as represented by the assignats, was floating in the circulation. The essential object was to force sales, in order to draw in assignats, and thus enhance their value by rendering them more scarce. Victories were the surest, but certainly not the easiest, way to hasten sales. As a substitute, divers expedients had been suggested. For instance, purchasers had been permitted to scatter their payments over several years. But this indulgence, introduced to encourage the peasants in becoming proprietors, was found practically to stimulate sales, doubtless, but no returns of assignats. In order the more certainly to diminish the quantity in circulation, it had been determined to pay the compensation for offices, partly in assignats, and partly in certificates of liquidation. The compensation sums amounting to less than three thousand francs were to be discharged in assignats; the others, in certificates of liquidation, which had not the currency of money, could not be divided into amounts of less than ten thousand francs, nor otherwise transferred than as checks payable to bearer, and were receivable in payment of national domains. By this device was greatly lessened the proportion of national property transmuted into a forced currency; all that might be converted into certificates of liquidation consisted of indivisible sums, not easily transferable, fixed exclusively in the hands of the rich, and completely withdrawn from circulation and the arts of jobbers.

To expedite still more the sale of the national estates, on the creation of the great book it was resolved that inscriptions of annuity should be received to the extent of a moiety in all payments for such possessions. This boon was eminently calculated to facilitate sales and resumptions of assignats.

But all these measures were insufficient, and the mass of paper money was still much too considerable. The Constituent Assembly, the Legislative Assembly, and the convention, had successively decreed the emission of 5,100,000,000 of assignats; 484,000,000 had not been yet issued, and remained in store, consequently there had been put into circulation merely 4,616,000,000. A portion had returned by sales; purchasers being allowed to pay in instalments, there were due for dispositions effected from twelve to fifteen millions. In all, 840,000,000 had been repaid into the exchequer, which had been burnt, leaving in actual circulation, in the month of August 1793, 3,776,000,000 of assignats.

A preliminary expedient was to sweep the assignats bearing the royal effigy from the currency, they being in greater request, and enjoying higher credit than the republican assignats, which they proportionally injured and deteriorated. Although denuded of current value, their validity was still recognised; they were, in fact, metamorphosed into drafts to bearer, and might be received either in payment of contributions, or in payment of national domains, until the 1st of January next ensuing. After the lapse of that date, they were to be without any value whatsoever. These assignats comprised an amount of 558,000,000. This proceeding would necessarily cause them to disappear from the circulation within four months; and as it was well known that they were all in the hands of counter-revolutionary speculators, a sense of justice was evinced in not annulling them, but simply insisting upon their prompt liquidation.

It will be recollected that during the month of May, when it was declared in principle that there should be armies distinguished as revolutionary, a decree was at the same time adopted establishing a forced loan of 1,000,000,000 upon the rich, to defray the expenses of a war whereof they, as aristocrats, were deemed the authors, and to which they refused to devote either their persons or fortunes. This loan, assessed as we shall hereafter explain, was intended, according to Cambon's project, to withdraw 1,000,000,000 of assignats from circulation. In order to allow an option to citizens of patriotic sentiments, and ensure them certain advantages, a voluntary loan was opened; those who came forward to fill it receiving an inscription of annuity at the rate already fixed of five per cent., thus obtaining interest for their contributions. With this inscription, they were entitled to claim exemption from the forced loan, or, at all events, to the extent of the sum subscribed in the voluntary list. The rich of malecontent dispositions, who awaited the compulsion of the forced loan, received a certificate which bore no interest, and which, of course, only formed, like the annuity inscription, a republican obligation, wanting the five per cent. Again, as, according to the new law, inscriptions were available in the proportion of a moiety in paying for national property, voluntary lenders, receiving an annuity inscription, enjoyed the faculty of speedily reimbursing themselves by purchasing national domains; whereas, on the contrary, the certificates of the forced loan could not be taken in payment for property purchased of the state, until two years after the peace. It was necessary, said the project of Cambon, to interest the rich in the prompt termination of the war, and in the pacification of Europe.

The forced or voluntary loan was calculated to bring in 1,000,000,000 of assignats, which were to be burnt. By the contributions in arrear, there would furthermore be recalled 700,000,000, of which 558,000,000 in royal assignats were already struck from the currency, and only received in satisfaction of taxes. It was therefore certain, that in two or three months there must be withdrawn from the circulation, first the 1,000,000,000 of the loan, and secondly, the 700,000,000 of imposts in arrear. The floating sum of 3,776,000,000 would consequently be reduced to 2,076,000,000. Supposing, as was probable, that the faculty of converting inscriptions of debt into national domains would lead to additional purchases, by that method, perhaps, five or six hundred millions might be further redeemed. The total mass would then, in all probability, be reduced to fifteen or sixteen hundred millions. Thus, by reducing for the moment the floating mass more than a half, the assignats would be restored to their legitimate value, and the 484,000,000 remaining in store would become disposable. The 700,000,000 paid in for taxes, whereof 558,000,000 were to receive the republican impression and be re-issued, would likewise recover their value, and might be used during the following year. For the time, at least, the depreciation of assignats would be removed, and that was the essential consideration. If the republic should be eventually saved, victory would at once enhance their value, permit fresh emissions from the treasury, and expedite the realisation of the residue of the national domains, a residue which was very considerable, and daily augmenting by emigration.

The mode of executing the forced loan was, from its nature, necessarily prompt and arbitrary. How estimate fortunes without error, without injustice, even in times of tranquillity, when ample opportunity is afforded for proper deliberation, and for comparing proofs and probabilities? What is scarcely possible under the most favourable circumstances, was of course utterly impracticable in a time of violence and precipitation. But at a period when it was found indispensable to convulse an entire population, and to smite so many heads, could much disquietude be excited lest a mistake might occur in the calculation of wealth, or any inaccuracy in the assessment? For the forced loan, therefore, as for the requisitions, a species of dictatorship was instituted, and conferred on the communes. Every individual was obliged to declare the amount of his income. In each commune, the council-general named authenticators, who decided, upon their knowledge of local affairs, whether the declarations were probable; and if they suspected them to be false, they had the power to double them. In the income of each family were set apart one thousand francs for each individual—husband, wife, and children; the excess was judged to constitute superfluous revenue, and as such taxable. The imposition amounted to a tenth on taxable incomes, ranging from one thou sand to ten thousand francs. Thus, a superfluity of one thousand francs paid one hundred francs; a superfluity of two thousand francs paid two hundred francs, and so in proportion. All superfluous revenue exceeding ten thousand francs, was absorbed by an imposition of equal amount; whereby every family, which, beyond the one thousand francs allowed to each individual, and the ten thousand francs of superfluity subjected to a tenth, enjoyed a still larger income, was bound to contribute the whole excess to the loan. Thus, for example, taking the case of a family comprising five individuals, and possessing a revenue of fifty thousand livres, five thousand were deemed necessary, and ten thousand stricken with a tax of one-tenth, which, reducing the latter to nine thousand, gave fourteen thousand as the whole allowance; and it was called upon to abandon, for this year, the remaining thirty-six thousand to the forced or voluntary loan. To take a year's superfluity from the opulent classes of society was assuredly not so overwhelming a hardship, when so many thousands were torn from their homes, and sent to bleed in fields of battle, and especially when the actual contribution, which might have been extorted unconditionally as an indispensable war-tax, was acknowledged by a republican certificate convertible either into state annuities or into portion of national domains.*

This great operation, therefore, consisted in extracting from the circulation one thousand millions of assignats, by taking them from the rich, or, in other words, in depriving these one thousand millions of the property of money and of all current value, and making them a simple charge on the national possessions, which the rich might exchange or not as they fancied, into a corresponding portion of these possessions. In this manner they were constrained either to become purchasers or to furnish the same amount in assignats as if they had actually become so. It was, in short, a forced investment of one thousand millions of assignats.

To these measures, intended more especially to sustain the credit of the national paper-money, others were superadded. After destroying the rivalry of the old state obligations and the assignats bearing the royal effigy, it was held expedient to stifle the competition of the stocks of financial and commercial companies. A decree was consequently passed abolishing the Company of Life Assurances, the Company of Discounts (Caisse d'Escompte), and all others, in fact, whose capital was distributed into bonds to bearer, negotiable securities, and inscriptions in a book transferable at pleasure. It was ordained that their affairs should be wound up within a short given period, and that for the future none but the government could create similar establishments. An immediate report on the India Company was ordered, that institution requiring, from its importance, a more particular examination. It was impossible to prevent the existence of bills of exchange on foreign countries, but all Frenchmen were declared traitors to their country who should place their funds in the banks or establishments of countries with which the republic was at war. Furthermore, fresh severities were denounced against the evasions practised with regard to bullion, and generally against the traffic carried on in the precious metals. A penalty of six years' imprisonment had been already decreed against whomsoever should buy or sell specie, that is to say, receive or give it for a larger sum in assignats; and in the same manner a fine had been imposed on every buyer or seller of commodities, who should stipulate for a different price according as the payment was to be made in specie or in assignats. But these delinquencies being of difficult detection, revenge was sought by augmenting the punishment. Every individual convicted of refusing assignats in payment, or of giving or receiving them at any depreciation howsoever slight, was condemned in an amercement of three thousand livres and an imprisonment of six months for the first offence, and, in the event of a repetition, to a double penalty and twenty years' incarceration. Lastly, as copper money was indispensable in the markets, and could not be easily supplied, it was ordered that the bells should be used for coining decimes, demi-decimes, &c., worth two sous, one sou, &c.

But whatsoever means might be employed to rescue the assignats from depression, and annihilate the competitors who were so injurious to them, it was a hopeless expectation to elevate them to the level of general prices; wherefore it became necessary to force down the value of commodities. This was the more imperative, inasmuch as the people implicitly believed that the high prices were owing to the malignity of the dealers; their faith in the prevalence of forestalling was sincere, and whatever might be the opinion of the legislators, they could not moderate, in this particular matter, the passions of a population which they were instigating to the utmost in all others. Hence there was no doubt but that the regulations already issued respecting corn must be extended to every variety of produce. A decree was passed classing engrossment in the number of capital crimes, and punishing it with death. The definition of an engrosser was "one who withdrew from circulation commodities of the first necessity, and failed to expose them publicly to sale." The articles declared "of the first necessity" were bread, wine, animal food, corn, meal, vegetables, fruits, coal and charcoal, wood, butter, candles, hemp, flax, salt, leather, liquors, salted and preserved provisions, cloths, woollens, and all haberdasheries except silks. The forms to be observed in putting such a decree into execution were unavoidably vexatious and inquisitorial. Every dealer was enjoined to make preliminary declarations of what he possessed in his stores. The correctness of these declarations was to be tested by means of domiciliary visits. Any fraud or prevarication was punished, like the chief crime itself, with death. Commissioners, nominated by the communes, were empowered to enforce the production of invoices, and according to those vouchers to fix a price, which, leaving a moderate profit to the trader, should not exceed the resources of the people. If, however, added the decree, the exorbitancy of the invoice cost should preclude any profit to the merchant, the sale must notwithstanding proceed at a price within reach of the purchaser. Thus, in this enactment, as in that enjoining the declarations touching corn and its maximum, to the communes was unreservedly delegated the power of assigning prices according to the state of affairs in each locality. After a brief interval, the rulers of the epoch were led to further generalise these measures, and in their extension to render them yet more violent, as we shall have occasion to record.

The military, administrative, and financial operations adopted in this eventful period were, then, as ably conceived as the situation of the country permitted, and as energetic as the danger which called them forth was imminent. The whole population, divided into generations, was at the disposition of the representatives, even the feeblest being exigible, either to manufacture arms or tend the wounded. All the old state debts, amalgamated into one republican debt, were doomed to undergo an identical fate, and to bear no greater value than the assignats. The interminable rivalries of the ancient obligations, the royal assignats, and the stocks of companies, were swept away; capitals were prevented from centering on those favoured securities by assimilating the whole; and assignats not flowing back into the coffers of the state with the desired rapidity, one thousand millions were abstracted from the rich, which were struck from the condition of money into a simple charge on the national domains. Lastly, for the purpose of establishing a forced relation between the current money and articles of the first necessity, the communes were invested with authority to drag forth all stores of grain and commodities, and compel their sale at a suitable price in each locality. Never did any government take at one time measures equally comprehensive and daring in conception; and they only will accuse their authors of violence who choose to overlook the danger of an universal invasion, and the necessity of supporting the country on national possessions which found no purchasers. The entire system of forced measures was derived from those two causes. At the present day, a superficial and giddy generation snarls at these operations, finding some unduly violent, others opposed to the approved maxims of political economy, and in all its animadversions crowning profound ignorance of the era and of the situation with black ingratitude. Let us revert to facts, and at length do justice to those men who made such gigantic efforts and underwent such inordinate perils to save France.

After these general measures upon matters of finance and administration, came others more specifically adapted to each theatre of war. The extraordinary measures long since resolved upon with regard to La Vendée, were at length decreed. The character of that war was by this time well understood. The strength of the rebellion did not lie in organised troops whom victories could dissipate, but in a population which, apparently peaceable and occupied in agricultural labours, flew suddenly to arms upon a given signal, and overwhelmed particular points in a concentrated mass, surprising by impetuous and unforeseen attacks the republican forces, or, in case of defeat retreating into the woods and fields, and resuming the pursuits of rural life with such outward placidity, as to baffle the eye of discernment in detecting the recent soldiers from the other peasants. An obstinate contest of six months, distinguished by repeated risings sometimes amounting to nearly one hundred thousand men, and by exploits of surpassing temerity, the formidable renown acquired by the insurgents, and the confirmed opinion that the greatest danger threatening the revolution was in this cankering civil war, were motives sufficiently powerful to fix the most anxious attention of the government on La Vendée and provoke resolutions eminently energetic and vindictive. The remark had long been current that the only mode of subjecting that unfortunate district was not to fight it, but to destroy it, since its armies were at once no where and every where. Such were the doctrines embodied in a terrible decree,* whereby La Vendée, the remaining Bourbons, and foreigners, were simultaneously doomed to the direst chastisement. In fulfilment of this decree, the minister of war was ordered to send into the revolted departments combustible materials to consume the forests, copses, and brushwood. "The forests shall be levelled," said these orders, "the haunts of the rebels destroyed, the crops cut down by bands of labourers, the cattle seized, and the whole transported out of the district. The old men, women, and children, shall be also conducted out of the country, and their maintenance provided for with the regards due to humanity." The generals and representatives on missions were furthermore enjoined to collect around La Vendée supplies sufficient to subsist large masses, and immediately thereafter to evoke in the surrounding departments, not a gradual levy as in other parts of France, but a prompt and universal levy, and thus pour one entire population upon another. The selection of men was in accordance with the character of these measures. We have seen Biron, Berthier, Menou, and Westermann, compromised and superseded for having upheld a system of discipline, and Rossignol, the disturber of that discipline, liberated from custody by the agents of the minister. The triumph of the Jacobin system was complete. Rossignol, from the simple colonel of a regiment, was suddenly exalted into the command-in-chief of the army on the coasts of Rochelle. Ronsin, the chief of those emissaries of the minister who carried into La Vendée all the passions of the Jacobins, and maintained the creed that there was no occasion for experienced generals, but for generals thoroughly republican; that the war required was not a regular but an exterminating system of warfare; and that every man of the new levy was a soldier, and every soldier capable of being a general—Ronsin, the chief of these agents, was in four days made a captain, a colonel, and a general of brigade, and joined in commission with Rossignol, wielding all the powers of the minister himself, in order to preside over the execution of this new order of tactics. At the same time directions were given that the garrison of Mayence should be forwarded with all speed from the Rhine to La Vendée. Distrust was so prevalent and undiscriminating, that the generals of that intrepid garrison had been put under arrest for having capitulated. Merlin, whose heroic character always commanded the highest consideration, was fortunately present to testify to their zeal and courage. Kléber and Aubert-Dubayet were restored to their soldiers, who were disposed to liberate them by main force, and they proceeded to La Vendée, where they were destined by their ability to repair the disasters occasioned by the agents of the minister.

It is a truth indispensable to be borne in mind, that passion is never either sage or enlightened, but that passion alone can save nations in great extremities. The appointment of Rossignol betrayed a strange audacity, but it bespoke at the same time a fixed determination; it showed that half measures were no longer to be permitted in this corroding war of La Vendée, and obliged all the local administrations which were still wavering to declare themselves. Those furious Jacobins, scattered through the armies, often threw them into disorder; but they, nevertheless, communicated that energy of resolution, without which there would have been no armament, no supplies, no means of any sort. They exhibited great injustice towards many generals, but they suffered none to relax or hesitate. We shall shortly see their blind ardour, when combined with the prudence of cooler men, produce striking and happy results.

Kilmaine, who had executed the brilliant retreat which saved the army of the north, was forthwith superseded for Houchard, formerly general of the army of the Moselle, and recommended by a high reputation for valour and zeal. In the committee of public welfare some changes occurred. Thuriot and Gasparin resigned in consequence of indisposition. The one was succeeded by Robespierre, who at length forced admission into the government, his vast influence being eventually recognised and submitted to by the convention, which had hitherto refrained from nominating him on any committee. The other made way for the celebrated Carnot, who, when formerly commissioned to the army of the north, had given proofs of eminent military talents.

These various administrative and military measures were accompanied by measures of vengeance, according to the established practice of illustrating acts of energy by acts of cruelty. We have already mentioned that, upon the demand of the delegates of the primary assemblies, a resolution had been passed against the suspected. It remained to frame a law embodying this resolution. Daily clamours were raised for its production, because, it was vociferated, the decree of the 27th March, which put aristocrats out of the pale of the law, was not sufficient for the emergency. That decree, in fact, required a trial, and another was desired authorising the imprisonment, without trial, and merely to secure their persons, of all citizens suspected for their opinions. Whilst awaiting this decree, it was determined that the possessions of all those who were placed without the pale of the law should belong to the republic. More stringent enactments respecting aliens were likewise demanded. They had already been declared under the surveillance of committees styling themselves revolutionary; but regulations of much greater severity were contemplated.

At this time the idea of a foreign conspiracy, whereof Pitt was supposed the mover, more than ever occupied the public mind. A pocket-book, found under the walls of one of the frontier towns, contained letters written in English, which had passed between English agents residing in France. Reference was made in these letters to considerable sums remitted to secret agents disseminated through the camps, fortresses, and principal cities. Some were instructed to form connexions with the generals for the purpose of corrupting them, and to gather exact accounts of the state of the troops, the fortifications, and the magazines; others were commissioned to gain admittance into the arsenals and public stores with phosphoric matches, and to watch opportunities for setting them on fire. "Contrive to raise the rate of exchange," said these letters, moreover, "to two hundred livres the pound sterling. Assignats must be discredited as much as possible, and all those refused which want the royal effigy. Enhance the price of commodities. Give orders to your merchants to engross all articles of primary necessity. If you can persuade Cott—ti to purchase tallow and candles at any price, see that the public be made to pay five francs a-pound. My lord is well pleased at the manner in which B—t—z has acted. We hope the assassinations will be conducted with prudence. Disguised priests and women are the fittest for such an operation."

These letters merely proved that England had some military spies in the French armies, and some emissaries in the commercial towns, with the view of aggravating the calamities of scarcity, and that certain of them, perhaps, obtained money by pretending to contemplate opportune assassinations.* But such designs were scarcely to be dreaded, and their probable effects were unquestionably exaggerated by the usual boasting of agents employed in similar manœuvres. It is true conflagrations had happened at Douay in Valenciennes, in the sail-yards of Lorient at Bayonne, and in the parks of artillery near Chemillé and Saumur. It is possible that these agents were the authors of such disasters, but they assuredly had not directed either the poniard of the guardsman Pâris against Lepelletier, or the knife of Charlotte Corday against Marat; and if they operated in foreign paper and assignats, if they purchased goods by means of the credits opened in London by Pitt, they exercised but a trifling influence on the commercial and financial situation of France, which depended on causes much more general and important than any such vile intrigues could be. Nevertheless, these letters, taken in conjunction with several fires, two assassinations, and the stockjobbing in foreign paper, excited universal horror. The convention denounced the English government in a formal decree to all nations, and proclaimed Pitt the enemy of the human race. At the same time it ordained that all aliens domiciled in France, subsequent to the 14th July 1789, should be put under arrest without further delay.†

The convention, yielding to the full impetuosity of wrath, likewise enjoined the prompt conclusion of the proceedings against Custine, and consigned Biron and Lamarche to immediate trial. The impeachment of the Girondists was urged with renewed fierceness, and the revolutionary tribunal directed to take up their case in the briefest interval. Finally, indignation fell on the surviving Bourbons, and on the unfortunate family which deplored in the tower of the Temple the fate of the late king. It was decreed that all the Bourbons remaining in France should be banished, except those who were under the ban of the law; and that the Duke of Orleans, who had been transferred to Marseilles in the month of May, and whom the federalists had abstained from calling to judgment, should be re-conducted to Paris in order to appear before the revolutionary tribunal.‡ His death was calculated to silence those who accused the Mountain of designing to create a king. The miserable Marie-Antoinette, notwithstanding her sex, was like her consort doomed to the scaffold. She was generally regarded as the instigator of all the plots hatched in the old court, and as infinitely more culpable than Louis XVI. She had the misfortune, above all, to be a daughter of Austria, which at this moment was deemed the most formidable of all the hostile powers. According to the custom of bearding with chief effrontery the most dangerous enemy, it was judged desirable to select this moment, when the imperial armies were already marching on the French soil, to smite the head of Marie-Antoinette. She was accordingly transferred to the jail of the Conciergerie to await her trial, like an ordinary criminal, before the revolutionary tribunal. The Princess Elizabeth, destined to banishment, was retained to give evidence against her sister-in-law. The two children were to be kept and reared by the republic, which would decide, on the conclusion of peace, what was fitting to be done for their behoof. Hitherto, the expenditure at the Temple had been ordered with a certain profuseness which recalled the rank of the captive family; it was directed to be henceforth limited to bare necessity. Lastly, as a consummation to all these acts of revolutionary vengeance, a decree consigned the royal sepulchres at Saint-Denis to destruction.

Such were the measures that the imminent dangers in the month of August 1793 provoked for the defence and vengeance of the revolution.

CHAPTER XXVI.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN AUGUST AND SEPTEMBER 1793.—TOULON DELIVERED TO THE ENGLISH.—DEFEAT OF THE DUKE OF YORK.—REVERSES IN LA VENDEE.—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.—TRIAL OF CUSTINE, AND HIS EXECUTION.

After the retreat of the French from Cæsar's camp to the camp of Gavarelle, the allies had another opportunity of pursuing their discouraged army, which had been unfortunate from the opening of the campaign. Since the month of March, in fact, beaten at Aix-la-Chapelle and Neerwinden, it had lost Dutch Flanders, Belgium, the camps of Cæsar and Famars, and the fortresses of Condé and Valenciennes. One of its generals had passed over to the enemy, and the other had been slain. Thus, from the battle of Jemappes, it had been distinguished only for retreats, meritorious in themselves, doubtless, but by no means exhilarating. Without forming the bold enterprise of a direct march on Paris, the allies might have annihilated this nucleus of an army, and left themselves at liberty to take all such places as their cupidity prompted. But shortly after the capture of Valenciennes, the English, appealing to the convention concluded at Antwerp, insisted upon the siege of Dunkirk. Accordingly, whilst the Prince of Cobourg, remaining in the vicinity of his camp at Hérin, between the Scarpe and the Scheldt, undertook to occupy the French, and contemplated the additional possession of Quesnoy, the Duke of York, marching with the English and Hanoverian army by Orchies, Menin, Dixmude, and Furnes, proceeded to establish himself before Dunkirk, between Langmoor and the sea. Two sieges to be prosecuted by the allies, therefore, afforded a welcome respite to the French army. Houchard, having assumed the command at Gavarelle, hastily mustered all the disposable forces to fly to the relief of Dunkirk. To debar the English from gaining a port on the continent, to contend individually with the great antagonists of France, to deprive them of all advantage from the war, and to furnish fresh weapons to the opposition in England against Pitt—such were the reasons that made Dunkirk be considered as the most important point in the whole

* [This assumption, and the nonsensical letters upon which it is ostensibly founded, will be treated with derision. It is a pity that M. Thiers should so far forget the dignity of the historian as to stoop to such preposterous calumnies.]

† Decree of the 1st August.

‡ These measures were also adopted on the 1st of August.

theatre of war. "The safety of the republic lie there," wrote the committee of public welfare to Houchard; and Carnot, perceiving that the troops assembled between the frontier of the north and that of the Rhine, that is to say, on the Moselle, were little use in their present position, obtained an ordinance that a reinforcement should be drafted from that army and sent into Flanders. Twenty or twenty five days thus elapsed in preparations, a very natural delay on the part of the French, who had to concentrate troops, lying dispersed at great distances, but somewhat inconceivable on the part of the English who had only four or five marches to accomplish in order to reach the walls of Dunkirk.

We left the two armies of the Moselle and the Rhine essaying to advance, when a little too late, towards Mayence, and failing to prevent the capture of that town. Thereafter, they had fallen back on Saarbruck, Hornbach, and Weissembourg. To enable the reader to understand these different movements, it will be essential to give an idea of the theatre of war. The French frontier is somewhat oddly fashioned on the north and east. The Scheldt, the Meuse, the Moselle, the chain of the Vosges, and the Rhine, run towards the north, forming almost parallel lines. The Rhine, when it reaches the extremity of the Vosges, takes a sudden turn, ceases to flow in a parallel direction with those lines, and terminates them by turning the foot of the Vosges and receiving in its course the Moselle and the Meuse. The allies, on the northern frontier, had advanced between the Scheldt and the Meuse; between the Meuse and the Moselle they had made no progress, because the feeble corps left by them between Luxumbourg and Trèves had been unable to attempt any thing, but they were in a position of greater capacity between the Moselle, the Vosges, and the Rhine. We have stated that they had planted themselves on the heights of the Vosges as a man bestrides a horse, part on the eastern flank and part on the western. The plan open to both parties was, as we have previously explained, perfectly simple. Considering the ridge of the Vosges as a river whose passages it had been deemed necessary to occupy, an army could transfer all its masses to one bank, overwhelm the enemy on that side, and then return to annihilate him on the other. However, neither to the French nor to the allies did any such idea present itself; and since the fall of Mayence, the Prussians, stretching along the western flank, fronted the army of the Rhine. The French had retired into the famous lines of Weissembourg. The army of the Moselle, to the number of 20,000 men, was posted at Saarbruck, on the Saar; the corps of the Vosges, amounting to 12,000, was stationed at Hornbach and Kettrick, and connected along the mountain range with the extreme left of the army of the Rhine. The army of the Rhine, 20,000 strong, guarded the Lauter, from Weissembourg to Lauterbourg. Such are the lines of Weissembourg: the Saar flows from the Vosges into the Moselle, the Lauter from the Vosges into the Rhine, and both form a single line which cuts almost diagonally the Moselle, the Vosges, and the Rhine. An army became master of it by occupying Saarbruck, Hornbach, Kettrick, Weissembourg, and Lauterbourg. This was what the French had done. They had scarcely 60,000 men on all that frontier, since it had been found necessary to detach succours to Houchard. The Prussians had contrived to waste two months in approaching them, but had eventually advanced to Pirmasens. Being reinforced by 40,000 men relieved from the siege of Mayence, and having effected a junction with the Austrians, they might have readily crushed the French on one or other of the flanks; but a coolness had arisen between Austria and Prussia on the iniquitous topic of the partition of Poland. Frederick William, who was still in the camp on the Vosges, declined to second the impatient ardour of old Wurmser. This veteran, despite his years, full of impetuosity, made every day fresh attacks on the lines of Weissembourg; but his partial onslaughts were productive of no decisive effect, and ended in nothing but the useless sacrifice of human life. Such then, once more, was the state of affairs on the Rhine, during the early days of September.

In the south, events had taken more full development. The long uncertainty of the Lyonnese had finally terminated in open resistance, and the siege of their city was rendered inevitable. We remember that they offered to submit and recognise the constitution, but refused to explain themselves respecting the decrees which enjoined them to send the imprisoned patriots to Paris, and to dissolve the new sectional authority. Speedily, indeed, they set those decrees at nought in the most signal manner possible, by sending Chalier and Riard to the scaffold, by making incessant preparations for war, abstracting money from the public coffers, and intercepting the convoys destined for the armies. Numerous partisans of the emigrants had insinuated themselves amongst them, who terrified their imaginations by depicting in horrible colours the re-establishment of the old Mountaineer municipality. They flattered them, moreover, with the speedy arrival of the Marseillese, who, they represented, were ascending the Rhine, and with the advance of the Piedmontese, who were described as on the point of debouching from the Alps with 60,000 men. Although the Lyonnese, as sincere federalists, bore equal hatred to the alien and the emigrant, the Mountain and the old municipality inspired them with such mortal dread, that they were ready to expose themselves to the danger and ignominy of a foreign alliance rather than confront the ire of the convention.

The Saône, flowing between the Jura and the Côte-d'Or, and the Rhone, issuing from the Valais between the Jura and the Alps, unite at Lyons. That opulent city is situated at their confluence. Ascending the Saône from the town of Maçon, the country was entirely republican, and the deputies Laporte and Reverchond, having mustered a few thousands of the requisitionary force, cut off the communication with the Jura. Dubois-Crancé, with the reserve of the army of Savoy, appeared on the side of the Alps, and guarded the upper course of the Rhone. But the Lyonnese were entirely masters of the lower course of the river, and of its right bank to the mountains of Auvergne. They prevailed in the whole Forez, made frequent incursions into it, and pillaged Saint-Etienne of arms. A skilful engineer had erected excellent fortifications around their town, and a foreigner had cast for them pieces to line the ramparts. The population was distributed into two portions: the young men followed General Précy in his excursions, and the married men, the fathers of families, guarded the town and its intrenchments.

At length, in the beginning of August, Dubois-Crancé, who had suppressed the federalist revolt at Grenoble, prepared to march on Lyons, conformably to the decree which enjoined him to reduce that rebellious city to obedience. The army of the Alps was composed at the utmost of 25,000 men, and it was soon to have on its quarters the Piedmontese, who, ultimately profiting by the advanced season of August, were making ready to debouch by the great chain. This army had been recently weakened, as we have seen, by two detachments, one drafted to reinforce the army of Italy and another sent to reduce the Marseillese. The Puy-de-Dôme, which was to have furnished recruits, had kept them back to stifle the revolt of the Lozère, whereunto previous reference has been made. Houchard had retained the legion of the Rhine, which was originally destined for the Alps; and the minister perpetually promised a reinforcement of a thousand horse which never appeared. Nevertheless, Dubois-Crancé detached 5000 men of the regular troops, and joined to them 7000 or 8000 of the young conscripts. He advanced with these forces to take up a position between the Saône and the Rhone, so as to occupy their upper courses, to intercept the supplies which the Lyonnese received by water, to preserve his communications with the army of the Alps, and to cut off those of the besieged with Switzerland and Savoy. By these dispositions, he still left the Forez to the Lyonnese, and, moreover, the important heights of Fourvières; but in his situation it was impossible to do otherwise. The most essential point was to occupy the two streams of water, and intercept Lyons from Switzerland and Piedmont. In order to complete the blockade, Dubois-Crancé awaited the arrival of the fresh troops which had been promised him, and of the siege artillery, which he was obliged to draw from the Alpine fortresses. The transport of that artillery required the aid of 5000 horses.

On the 8th August he summoned the city, imposing as conditions the complete disarming of all the citizens, their retirement to their own houses, the surrender of the arsenal, and the formation of a provisional municipality. But the secret royalists in the commission and the staff continued even at this moment to deceive the Lyonnese, alarming them with the prospective incubus of a Mountaineer municipality, and assuring them that 60,000 Piedmontese were on the point of debouching on their town. An engagement which took place between two advanced posts, and terminated to the advantage of the Lyonnese, exalted them to an insane pitch, and decided their resistance and their calamities. Dubois-Crancé commenced the fire on the side of the Croix-Rousse, between the two rivers where he had taken his position; and from the first day his artillery made terrible devastation. Thus, one of the most important manufacturing towns in France was exposed to the horrors of a bombardment, which bombardment had to be prosecuted almost before the very eyes of the Piedmontese, moving down the Alps.

In the mean time, Carteaux had marched on Marseilles, and succeeded in clearing the Durance by the middle of August. The Marseillese had fallen back from Aix upon their own city, having formed the design of defending the gorges of Septèmes, through which winds the road from Aix to Marseilles. On the 24th General Doppet attacked them with Carteaux's advanced guard. A warm action ensued; but a section, which had always been in opposition to the others, passed over to the side of the republicans, and decided the engagement in their favour. The gorges were carried; and on the 25th, Carteaux entered Marseilles with his little army.

This event led to another, the most disastrous that had yet befallen the republic. The city of Toulon, which had always manifested a tendency to the most violent republicanism so long as its municipality had been maintained, had undergone a marked change since the establishment of the new authority of the sections, which was speedily to effect a signal revulsion in the state of matters. The Jacobins, rallying round the municipality, were clamorous against the aristocratic officers of the navy, incessantly complaining of the delay in repairing the fleet, of its long uselessness in harbour, and loudly demanding the punishment of the officers, to whom they attributed the ill success of the expedition against Sardinia. The moderate republicans maintained, on the other hand, that the old officers were alone capable of commanding the vessels; that the ships could not be repaired with greater dispatch; that to send them out against the Spanish and English fleets would be highly imprudent; and, lastly, that the officers whose punishment was so fiercely insisted upon were not traitors, but simply unfortunate in the chances of war. The moderates gained the ascendancy in the sections. Speedily a multitude of secret agents, intriguing for behoof of the emigrants and the English, crept into Toulon, and urged the inhabitants much farther than they ever thought of proceeding. These agents were in communication with Admiral Hood, and had obtained assurances that the allied squadrons would cruize in the offing, and be ready to appear at the first signal.

In the first place, following the example of the Lyonnese, they brought to trial and executed the president of the Jacobin Club, a person called Sévestre. Thereafter they restored the service of the refractory priests, and caused to be disinterred and borne in triumph the bones of some victims who had perished during the disturbances for the royalist cause. The committee of public welfare having ordered the fleet to stop all vessels bound for Marseilles, in order to famish that city, the navy prevented the execution of such orders, and claimed the gratitude of the sections of Marseilles for the contravention. Eventually they began to speak of the dangers to which the town was exposed in resisting the convention, and of the necessity of securing aid against its fury; and to hint the possibility of obtaining the assistance of the English by proclaiming Louis XVII. The purveyor of the navy was, it appears, the chief instrument of the conspiracy; he appropriated the money in the public coffers, sent to gather contributions along the coasts, even to the department of L'Herault, and wrote to Genoa with instructions to keep back cargoes of grain, in order to render the situation of Toulon more critical. The staffs were all remodelled; an officer of marines, compromised in the Sardinian expedition, was taken out of prison and invested with the command of the place; an old bodyguardsman was placed at the head of the national guard, and the forts were intrusted to returned emigrants; lastly, means were taken to secure the co-operation of Admiral Trogoff, an alien whom France had loaded with favours. A negotiation was opened with Admiral Hood, under pretext of treating for an exchange of prisoners; and just after Carteaux had entered Marseilles, when terror was at its height in Toulon, and when eight or ten thousand Provençals, the most counter-revolutionary of the whole country, had taken refuge within its walls, the ignominious proposal was submitted to the sections to receive the English, who would take possession of the place for behoof and in the name of Louis XVII. The navy incensed at the infamy in agitation, sent a deputation to the sections to remonstrate against so villanous an expedient. But the counter-revolutionists of Toulon and Marseilles, moved to extraordinary arrogance, scornfully repudiated the reclamations of the navy, and procured the acceptance of the proposition on the 29th August. Immediately afterwards the signal was given to the English. Admiral Trogoff, putting himself at the head of the partisans for delivering the port, hoisted the white flag, and issued orders for the fleet to join him. The brave Rear-Admiral Saint-Julien, proclaiming Trogoff a traitor, displayed at his masthead the flag of commander, and attempted to rally all who remained faithful. But at this moment the traitors, already in possession of the forts, threatened to blow Saint-Julien and his vessels out of the water, whereupon he felt it incumbent to seek safety in flight, accompanied by a few officers and sailors. The remainder were persuaded to submit, without very well knowing what designs were in cogitation. At length, Admiral Hood, who had manifested considerable hesitation, made his appearance; and, under pretence of accepting the port of Toulon in trust for Louis XVII., entered it for the ulterior purpose of burning and destroying it.

During this interval, no movement had occurred in the Pyrenees; in the west, preparations were in progress for executing the measures decreed by the convention.

We left all the columns in Upper Vendée re-organising at Angers, Saumur, and Niort. The Vendéans had meanwhile seized upon the bridges of Cé, and, in the terror they inspired, Saumur was put in a state fit to stand a siege. The column of Luçon and Sables was alone capable of acting offensively. It was commanded by a certain Tuncq, one of the generals reputed to belong to the military aristocracy, and whose dismissal was strenuously demanded from the minister by Ronsin. In association with him were the two representatives Bourdon de L'Oise and Goupilleau of Fontenay, animated with the like sentiments, and strongly opposed to Ronsin and Rossignol. Goupilleau, especially, being born in the district, was disposed, from family and friendly relations, to conciliate the inhabitants, and spare them the rigours contemplated by Ronsin and his adjuncts.

The Vendéans, whom the column of Luçon disquieted, resolved to direct their victorious troops against it. Besides, they were anxious to carry succour to the division of M. de Roirand, which, at that time stationed before Luçon, and isolated between the two main armies of Upper and Lower Vendée, was dependent on its own resources alone, and stood greatly in need of prompt support. Accordingly, in the beginning of August, they pushed several detachments towards Luçon, which were utterly discomfited by General Tuncq. They determined to make a more decisive effort. All their leaders, D'Elbée, Lescure, Larochejacquelein, and Charette, mustered their forces to the number of 40,000 fighting men, and on the 14th August again presented themselves in the neighbourhood of Luçon. Tuncq had only 6000 soldiers under his orders. Lescure, trusting to the great superiority of strength, gave the fatal advice to attack the republican army in the open field. Lescure and Charette took the command of the left wing, D'Elbée that of the centre, and Larochejacquelein that of the right. Lescure and Charette charged with admirable vigour on the republican right, but in the centre, the soldiers, unaccustomed to contend on even terms with regular troops, showed hesitation. Larochejacquelein, having mistaken his way, failed to reach the republican left in proper time. General Tuncq, sending his light artillery, at the opportune moment, upon the staggering centre, threw it into complete disorder, and, in a few minutes, the whole of the Vendéans, 40,000 in number, were put to flight. Never had they experienced so disastrous an overthrow. They lost all their artillery, and retired precipitately to their homes, overwhelmed with consternation.

At this identical moment arrived the order for cashiering General Tuncq, in accordance with Ronsin's demands. Bourdon and Goupilleau, highly indignant at such unworthy treatment, maintained him in his command, writing to the convention, at the same time, urging it to revoke the decision of the minister, and lodging fresh complaints against the disorganising party at Saumur, which, they alleged, propagated nothing but confusion, and was bent on superseding all the competent generals in favour of ignorant demagogues. After the dispatch of this document, Rossignol himself, pursuing an inspection of the different columns under his command, arrived at Luçon. His interview with Tuncq, Bourdon, and Goupilleau, was a mere exchange of reproaches; notwithstanding two victories, he was dissatisfied that any engagement should have been fought without his sanction, for he held, with some show of reason doubtless, that all serious encounters were to be avoided until the general re-organisation of the different armies. The parties separated; but shortly afterwards, Bourdon and Goupilleau, being informed of certain acts of rigour committed by Rossignol in his progress, had the hardihood to issue an ordinance degrading him from his command. Thereupon, the representatives sitting at Saumur, Merlin, Bourbotte, Chondieu, and Rewbell, annulled the ordinance of Goupilleau and Bourdon, and reinstated Rossignol. The dispute was carried before the convention: Rossignol once more triumphed over his adversaries, and was confirmed in his authority; Bourdon and Goupilleau were recalled, and Tuncq suspended.

Such was the situation of affairs when the garrison of Mayence arrived in La Vendée. A difference of opinion prevailed as to the plan of operations it was expedient to adopt, and as to the direction in which that valiant garrison should act. Ought it to be attached to the army of Rochelle, and placed under the orders of Rossignol; or to the army of Brest, and confided to Canclaux? Such was the question. Both commanders longed to possess it, because it was sure to prove predominant wheresoever it might appear. All parties were agreed on the necessity of enveloping the country by simultaneous attacks, which, directed from all the points of the circumference, should meet in the centre. But as the column possessing the Mayencers would have to take a more decisive offensive, and drive the Vendéans back upon the other columns, it was of great importance to determine from what quarter it was most advisable to assail them with the chosen troop. Rossignol and his friends maintained, that the most advantageous course was to lead the Mayencers from Saumur, in order to sweep the Vendéans back upon the sea and the Lower Loire, where they might be entirely destroyed; that the columns of Angers and Saumur, being extremely weak, required the assistance of the Mayencers to enable them to act at all, since, if left to themselves, it would be impracticable for them to advance into the country and attempt a junction with the other columns of Niort and Luçon; that they could not even stop the Vendéans when they were beaten back, or prevent them from spreading over the interior; and, lastly, that by allowing the Mayencers to advance by Saumur, no valuable time would be lost, whereas, by preferring Nantes, they would be obliged to make a considerable circuit, and waste unprofitably ten or fifteen days. Canclaux, on the other hand, was deeply impressed with the danger of leaving the sea open to the Vendéans. An English squadron had been recently descried off the shores of the west, and it was natural to imagine that the English intended to effect a descent in the Marais. Such was, at the time, the general persuasion, and although it proved to be erroneous, it filled all minds with apprehension. As the case stood, the English had only then sent an emissary into La Vendée. He had arrived under disguise, and inquired the names of the leaders, their intentions, and their precise aim; so profound was the ignorance in Europe touching the internal circumstances of France! The Vendéans had replied by a demand for money and warlike stores, and by a promise to appear with 50,000 men on any point where it might be proposed to attempt a disembarkation. All schemes of this sort were therefore as yet remote, but it was the universal belief they were on the very verge of execution. Hence the argument of Canclaux, who urged the expediency of employing the Mayencers on the side of Nantes, in order thus to cut the Vendéans off from the sea, and throw them back on the upper country. Should they spread themselves in the interior, added Canclaux, they would be very soon destroyed; and as to any loss of time, the consideration was without weight, inasmuch as the army of Saumur was in such a condition as to be incapable of acting in less than ten or twelve days, even with the aid of the Mayencers. One reason not adduced was, that the garrison of Mayence, already trained in the art of war, preferred serving with men of its own profession, and inclined to Canclaux, an experienced general, rather than to Rossignol, an ignorant intruder, and to the army of Brest, distinguished for glorious feats, rather than to that of Saumur, known only for its reverses. The representatives, being favourable to the cause of discipline, also leaned to the same opinion, fearing to compromise the army of Mayence by mingling it with the Jacobin and disorganised soldiers of Saumur.

Philippeaux, the most determined antagonist of the Ronsin party amongst the representatives, repaired to Paris and obtained an ordinance from the committee of public welfare in favour of Canclaux's plan. Ronsin caused the order to be revoked; and it was eventually settled that a council of war should be held at Saumur to decide on the employment of the forces. The council assembled on the 2d September. It included several representatives and generals. Sentiments were, as might be expected, much divided. Rossignol, who had unbounded faith in his own opinions, offered Canclaux to resign the command to him if he would allow the Mayencers to march from Saumur. The advice of Canclaux, however, prevailed in the council; the Mayencers were attached to the army of Brest, and it was determined that the principal attack should be directed from the Lower upon the Upper Vendée. The plan of the campaign was signed, and pledges were exchanged to start, on a given day, from Saumur, Nantes, Sables, and Niort.

The greatest discontent prevailed in the party of Saumur. Rossignol possessed energy and sincerity, but was deficient both in mental acquirements and bodily robustness, and in spite of his devoted zeal, he was quite incapable of acting beneficially. He evinced less resentment at the decision adopted by the council than his partisans, Ronsin, Momoro, and all the ministerial agents. These lost no time in writing to Paris with complaints against the plan just resolved upon, lamenting, moreover, the calumnies in circulation against the sans-culotte generals, and the prejudices instilled into the army of Mayence; thus evincing dispositions which foreboded badly for their zeal in seconding the project decided upon at Saumur. Ronsin carried his spleen to such an extent as to stop the distribution of provisions to the Mayencers, under pretext that, having passed from the army of Rochelle to that of Brest, they ought to be supported by the purveyors of the latter. The Mayencers forthwith took their departure for Nantes, and Canclaux made the necessary dispositions to ensure the execution of the plan adopted by the council in the early part of September.

Such is the general summary of events on the various theatres of war, in the course of August and beginning of September. It now behoves us to trace the great operations resulting from these different preparations.

The Duke of York had arrived before Dunkirk with 21,000 English and Hanoverians and 12,000 Austrians. Marshal Freytag was at Ost-Capelle with 16,000 men; the Prince of Orange at Menin with 15,000 Dutch. These two latter corps were planted as an army of observation. The remainder of the allies, scattered around Quesnoy, and even to the Moselle, amounted to about 100,000 men. Thus 160,000 or 170,000 men were distributed along that immense line, occupied in making sieges and guarding all the passages. Carnot, who now began to direct the operations of the French, had already formed a dim perception that the approved method of battling on all points was injudicious, and that the better course was to concentrate a mass upon a decisive point at the fitting moment. He had therefore advised the removal of 35,000 men from the Moselle and the Rhine to the north. His counsel had been followed, but only 12,000 could be spared for Flanders. Nevertheless, with this reinforcement, and the different parties encamped at Gavarelle, Lille, and Cassel, the French might have formed a mass of 60,000 men, and, in the scattered condition of the enemy, have struck some signal blows.

To be convinced of this truth, we need only to cast our eyes upon the scene of warfare. Following the coast of Flanders to enter France, we first stumble on Furnes and then on Dunkirk. These two towns, washed on one side by the ocean, and bounded on the other by the vast marsh of the Grande-Moër, can only communicate by means of a narrow tongue of land. The Duke of York, arriving by Furnes, which first presents itself coming from the frontier, had planted himself on this tongue of land, between the sea and the Grande-Moër, with the view of besieging Dunkirk. Freytag's corps of observation had not been posted at Furnes so as to protect the rear of the besieging army; it was, on the contrary, a considerable distance from that position, in advance of the marsh and Dunkirk, so disposed as to intercept any succours which might come from the interior of France. The Dutch, under the Prince of Orange, being stationed at Menin, three days' march from that point, became utterly useless. A mass of 60,000 men, marching rapidly between the Dutch and Freytag, might reach Furnes in the rear of the Duke of York, and then manœuvring between the hostile corps, successively overwhelm Freytag, the Duke of York, and the Prince of Orange. For such a purpose, one compact mass and expeditious movements were alone necessary. But in those days captains thought only of pushing straight forward, opposing one detachment with another of similar force. The committee of public welfare had, however, almost conceived the plan of which we speak. It had given directions to form a single corps and march on Furnes. Houchard appreciated the idea for a brief moment, but receded from it, and resolved simply to advance against Freytag, drive him back on the rear of the Duke of York, and subsequently endeavour to interrupt the siege.

Whilst Houchard was hastening his preparations, Dunkirk opposed a vigorous resistance. General Souham, seconded by young Hoche, who behaved in this siege with great intrepidity, had already repulsed several attacks. The besiegers could not very easily open trenches in a sandy soil, wherein the sappers found water at a depth of three feet. The flotilla which was to have left the Thames to bombard the place did not appear, but on the contrary a French flotilla, issuing out of Dunkirk harbour and mooring along the shore, did great execution upon the besiegers, pent up upon their narrow neck of land, in want of water fit to drink, and exposed to every variety of danger. The opportunity was tempting for a prompt and decisive blow. The month of August was nearly at an end. Following the antiquated system of tactics, Houchard commenced by a demonstration on Menin, which resulted merely in a bloody and useless combat. After considerately giving this preliminary alarm, he advanced by several routes towards the line of the Yser, a small stream of water which separated him from Freytag's corps of observation. Instead of proceeding to plant himself between the observing and the besieging armies, he intrusted to Hédouville the task of marching on Rousbrugghe, with the view simply of disturbing the retreat of Freytag upon Furnes, and he in person pushed in front of Freytag, advancing with all his forces by Houtkerche, Herseele, and Bambeke. Freytag had disposed his corps over an extensive line, and had with him only a portion of his force when he received Houchard's first shock. He gave battle at Herseele; but, after a warm engagement, he was obliged to repass the Yser and fall back on Bambeke, and subsequently from Bambeke on Rexpœde and Killem. By thus recoiling beyond the Yser, he left his wings compromised in advance. The division of Walmoden was thrown to a considerable distance from him on his right, and his own retreat was menaced by Hédouville towards Rousbrugghe.

Freytag then resolved, the same day, to move again in advance and retake Rexpœde, in order to keep open his communication with Walmoden. He reached Rexpœde as the French were entering it. A fiercely contested combat ensued, in the course of which Freytag was wounded and taken prisoner. The day beginning to wane, however, and being apprehensive of a night attack, Houchard retired out of the village, and left in it only three battalions. Walmoden, who was falling back with his compromised division, arrived at this moment, and determined to make a brisk attack on Rexpœde, in order to force a passage. A sanguinary conflict was the result, fought in the dead of night; the passage was forced, Freytag delivered, and the enemy retreated in a mass on the village of Hondtschoote. This village, situated over against the Grande-Moër, and on the road to Furnes, was one of the points by which it was necessary to pass on retiring upon Furnes. Houchard having abandoned the essential project of manœuvring towards Furnes, between the besieging and the observing corps, he had no other course left than to keep continually pushing forward on Marshal Freytag, and to storm the village of Hondtschoote. The 7th was passed in reconnoitring the positions of the enemy, defended by a formidable artillery, and on the 8th the decisive attack was resolved upon. At dawn, the French army moved forward upon the whole line to attack in front. The right, under the orders of Hédouville, stretched between Killem and Beveren; the centre, commanded by Jourdan, marched directly from Killem upon Hondtschoote; the left attacked between Killem and the canal of Furnes. The action began in the copses which covered the centre. On both sides, the greatest force was culminated on the same point. The French repeatedly returned to the attack of the positions, and finally succeeded in becoming masters of them. Whilst they triumphed in the centre, the intrenchments were carried to the right, and the enemy adopted the resolution of retiring on Furnes by the route of Houthem and Hoghestade.

Whilst these events were passing at Hondtschoote, the garrison of Dunkirk made a vigorous sortie under the conduct of Hoche, and placed the besiegers in a predicament of great peril. The day after the action, they held a council of war, wherein, taking into consideration that they were threatened in the rear, and that the naval armament which was intended to have bombarded the town had never made its appearance, they determined to raise the siege and retire on Furnes, where Freytag had just arrived. They consequently effected a junction with that general on the evening of the 9th September.

Such were those three days, which had for object and for result the repelling of the observing corps upon the rear of the besieging corps, by following a direct line of march. The final struggle gave its name to this operation, and the battle of Hondtschoote was considered as the salvation of Dunkirk. The operation, in fact, broke the long chain of French reverses on the northern frontier, subjected the English to an inglorious check, defeated the most cherished of their hopes, rescued the republic from a calamity than which none could have been felt more sensibly, and imparted fresh courage to the people of France.

The victory of Hondtschoote was hailed with infinite joy at Paris, where it inspired the youth with additional ardour, and gave ground of hope that the national energy was not destined to be fruitless. Reverses are of little moment if they be blended with successes, so that the vanquished may not be entirely deprived of hope and courage. The alternation tends, indeed, to augment energy, and heighten the enthusiasm of resistance.

When the Duke of York betook himself to Dunkirk, the Prince of Cobourg had resolved an attack upon Quesnoy. That place was destitute of all the means necessary to defence, and Cobourg pressed it with unrelenting vigour. The committee of public welfare, equally attentive to that portion of the frontier as to the others, had immediately ordered the reserve columns to move from Landrecies, Cambray, and Maubenge. Unhappily, these columns were unable to act simultaneously; one was immured in Landrecies; and another, being surrounded on the plain of Avesnes, although thrown into the form of a square, was broken, after a highly creditable resistance. Accordingly, Quesnoy was obliged to capitulate on the 11th of September. This loss was but a trifling drawback from the gain in the delivery of Dunkirk, yet it threw a dash of sadness upon the joy elicited by that event.

Houchard, after having driven the Duke of York to concentrate his forces with those of Freytag at Furnes, had nothing to induce him to attempt any further enterprise in that direction. He could merely have charged with an equal force soldiers better disciplined than his own, without any of those favourable or pressing circumstances which justify a general in hazarding a doubtful battle. In this situation, he had nothing more engaging to occupy him than to fall foul of the Dutchmen, who lay scattered in several detachments around Menin, Halluin, Roncq, Werwike, and Ypres. Houchard, proceeding with caution, sent orders for the camp at Lille to make a sally on Menin, whilst he himself should operate by Ypres. During two entire days the advanced posts of Werwike, Roncq, and Halluin, were warmly contested. On both sides exemplary valour, but mediocre judgment, was evinced. The Prince of Orange, although pressed on all sides, and having lost his advanced posts, resisted with great obstinacy, fortified by the intelligence he had received of the surrender of Quesnoy and the approach of Beaulieu, who was bringing him succours. Eventually, on the 13th September, he was constrained to evacuate Menin, after losing, during these encounters, from two to three thousand men and forty pieces of cannon. Although the French army had certainly not secured all the advantages possible in its position, and, disregarding the instructions of the committee of public welfare, had acted in bodies too subdivided, it had nevertheless succeeded in accomplishing the occupation of Menin.

On the 15th it left Menin, and marched on Courtray. At Bisseghem it encountered Beaulieu. An engagement ensued, which promised to result in the advantage of the French; but the sudden appearance of a squadron of cavalry on one of the wings, spread an alarm which was founded on no real danger. The whole army swerved, and finally fled in the utmost disorder to Menin. Nor did this inconceivable rout end there; the panic was communicated to all the camps, to all the posts, and the entire French army flew for refuge under the guns of Lille. This panic-terror, whereof many previous examples had occurred, and which proceeded from the youth and inexperience of the troops, perhaps from perfidious cries of "Sauve qui peut" (Every man for himself), caused the loss of many substantial advantages, and the recoil even to Lille. The tidings of this disaster, when borne to Paris, produced a very dismal impression, stripping Houchard of all the credit of his late victory, and arousing against him feelings of the utmost wrath, whereof he averted a portion on the committee of public welfare itself. A new series of checks speedily followed, and threw France back into the perilous predicament whence she had for an instant emerged by the victory of Hondtschoote.

The Prussians and the Austrians, planted on the two slopes of the Vosges, in front of the two French armies of the Rhine and the Moselle, had at length made some serious demonstrations. The veteran Wurmser, more ardent than the Prussian commanders, and discerning all the advantages of possessing the passes of the Vosges, determined upon occupying the important post of Bodenthal, towards the Upper Lauter. Accordingly, he detached a corps of 4000 men, which, effecting a passage across frightful mountains, succeeded in surprising Bodenthal. On their part, the representatives commissioned to the army of the Rhine, yielding to the universal impulse which everywhere provoked a spirit of redoubled energy, resolved upon a general sortie from the lines of Weissembourg on the 12th September. The three generals, Desaix, Dubois, and Michaud, simultaneously charging the Austrians, made fruitless efforts, and were driven back into the lines. Moreover, all the attempts directed against the Austrian corps thrown on Bodenthal were completely parried. However, a plan for a fresh attack was digested for the 14th. Whilst General Ferette should march on Bodenthal, the army of the

Moselle, acting on the other flank, was to attack Pirmasens, occupying a position corresponding with that of Bodenthal, and in which Brunswick was stationed with a part of the Prussian army

General Ferrette perfectly succeeded in the object of his enterprise; his soldiers assaulted the positions of the Austrians with heroic temerity, carried them in spite of all resistance, and recovered the important defile of Bodenthal. But the result was somewhat different on the opposite flank. Brunswick was keenly alive to the importance of Pirmasens, which closed the defiles; he held under his command a considerable force, and occupied excellent positions. Whilst the army of the Moselle forced the rest of the Prussian army on the Saar, 12,000 men were thrown from Hornbach on Pirmasens. The only hope of the French was to carry Pirmasens by surprise; but descried, and played upon by a galling fire from their first advance, nothing remained for them but to retire. Such, at least, was the wish of their commander; but the representatives repudiated the suggestion, and ordered the attack in three columns and by three ravines which met at the height whereon Pirmasens is situated. Already the French soldiers, animated with the truest gallantry, had pushed forward a considerable interval; the column on the right was even on the point of clearing the ravine in which it marched, and turning Pirmasens, when a double fire, opened on both flanks, suddenly arrested its progress. The French resisted for some time, but the fire poured upon them with redoubled fury, and they were finally driven back along the ravine wherein they had entangled themselves. The other columns were repelled in like manner, and all fled along the narrow valleys in the utmost disorder. The army was obliged to retire to the post whence it had originally moved. Most fortunately, the Prussians never thought of pursuing it, and failed even to occupy its camp of Hornbach, which it had quitted to march on Pirmasens. The French lost in this affair twenty-two pieces of cannon, and 4000 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners. This check of the 14th September might lead to consequences of the greatest moment. The allies, flushed with success, contemplated operating with all their forces, and made dispositions to march on the Saar and the Lauter, in order thus to force the lines of Weissembourg. With which designs we must leave them for a time.

The siege of Lyons was tardily prosecuted. The Piedmontese, debouching by the Upper Alps into the valleys of Savoy, had effected a diversion, and obliged Dubois-Crancé and Kellermann to divide their forces. The latter had advanced into Savoy, whilst the former, remaining before Lyons with insufficient forces, kept up an incessant but fruitless discharge of artillery and shells on that unfortunate city, which, resolved to undergo every extremity, bade defiance to all the horrors of a blockade and bombardment, and was to be reduced only by an attack of overpowering force.

On the Pyrenean frontier, the French had in the mean time sustained a severe check. Since the last recorded events, they had remained in the environs of Perpignan, whilst the Spaniards occupied their camp of Mas-d'Eu. These, confident in their numbers, their discipline, and the talents of their general, were full of ardour and hope. We have already described the theatre of war. The two nearly parallel valleys of the Tech and the Tet fall from the great mountain chain and expand towards the sea. Perpignan is in the latter of these valleys. Ricardos had crossed the first line of the Tech, as his position at Mas-d'Eu implies, and had resolved to pass that of the Tet considerably above Perpignan, so as to turn that fortress and constrain the French army to abandon it. With this view he deemed it essential, in the first place, to secure Villefranche. That little fastness, situated in the upper part of the Tet, would serve to protect his left wing against General Dagobert, who, at the head of 3000 men, was pursuing a successful career in Cerdagne. Accordingly, in the early part of August, he detached General Crespo with a few battalions in that direction, who no sooner presented himself before Villefranche than its commandant basely threw open the gates to him. Crespo placed a garrison in his conquest, and rejoined Ricardos.

During this interval, Dagobert with his inconsiderable force overran Cerdagne, repelled the Spaniards to Seu-d'Urgel, and even contemplated driving them as far as Campredon. However, the weakness of Dagobert's detachment, and the possession of Villefranche, rendered Ricardos indifferent to the successes of the French on his left wing, and he persisted in his scheme of taking the offensive. On the 31st August he made a threatening demonstration towards the camp under Perpignan, and passed the valley of the Tet above Soler, driving before him the French right wing, which fell back to Salces, some leagues in the rear of Perpignan, and quite close to the sea. Thus the French were thrown into a position of the utmost danger, one portion of them being detained at Perpignan and the other forced to the edge of the sea at Salces. Dagobert, it is true, had gained fresh advantages in Cerdagne, but too unimportant to alarm Ricardos. The representatives Fabre and Cassaigne, who had retired with the army to Salces, resolved to call Dagobert in substitution of Barbantane, with the hope of restoring fortune to the French flag. Whilst awaiting the arrival of the new general, they projected a combined movement between Salces and Perpignan, in order with all speed to extricate the army from its perilous position. They accordingly ordered a column to advance from Perpignan and take the Spaniards in the rear, whilst they, quitting their present stations, should attack them in front. On the 15th September, therefore, General Davoust left Perpignan with 6000 or 7000 men, at the same time that Perignon moved from Salces upon the Spanish force. At a given signal, the French commanders charged the hostile camp on both sides, and the Spaniards, unable to resist the multifarious assault, were obliged to fly beyond the Tet, leaving behind them twenty-six pieces of cannon. They forthwith resumed their old quarters at Mas-d'Eu, occupying the same camp whence they had marched to execute their bold but unproductive enterprise.

Such was the situation of affairs when Dagobert reached the French camp and assumed the command. That experienced warrior, now in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and uniting all the fire of youth with the exemplary discretion characteristic of age, hastened to signalise his arrival by an attempt upon the camp of Mas-d'Eu. He divided his attacking force into three columns; the first, diverging from his right and marching by Thuir upon Sainte-Colombe, was intended to turn the Spaniards; the second, acting in the centre, was appointed to charge in front, and bear them down before it; lastly, the third, operating on the left, was to plant itself in a wood and intercept the retreat. This latter division, commanded by Davoust, made a faint attack and fled in disorder. The Spaniards were thus enabled to direct their whole strength upon the two other columns of the centre and right. Ricardos, judging the principal danger lay to the right, moved his greatest force in that direction, and succeeded in repulsing the French. In the centre, Dagobert, animating the troops by his presence, carried the intrenchments in front of him, and was on the point of deciding the victory, when Ricardos, returning with the victorious corps from the right and left, overwhelmed his adversary with all his combined forces. Still the intrepid Dagobert resisted, however, until a battalion threw down its arms, and cried, "Long live the king!" Dagobert, greatly incensed, pointed two pieces of ordnance on the traitors, and fired desperately upon them, whilst he rallied around his person a band of faithful warriors; with these few hundred soldiers he eventually retired, the enemy, intimidated by his undaunted front, not venturing to pursue him.

Assuredly that brave commander had merited high eulogium for his firmness amidst such difficulties, and if his column on the left had acted with better spirit, if his battalions in the centre had not shamefully disbanded, his dispositions would have been followed with complete success. Notwithstanding this obvious truth, the gloomy suspicions of the representatives attributed the whole disaster to him. Disgusted at such outrageous injustice, he immediately returned to his subaltern command in Cerdagne. The French army was in this manner once more driven back upon Perpignan, and exposed to the imminent risk of losing the important line of the Tet.

In La Vendée, the plan of campaign settled on the 2d September had been put into execution. The division of Mayence was destined, as we have related, to act by Nantes. The committee of public welfare, which had received alarming intelligence touching the designs of the English upon the west, fully approved the idea of directing the main strength towards the coasts. Rossignol and his party were extremely chagrined at this sanction, and addressed letters to the ministry, indicating a spirit prophetic of but a reluctant co-operation in the plans agreed upon. The division of Mayence forthwith marched to Nantes, where it was received with public rejoicings, and other lively demonstrations of joy. A sumptuous banquet was prepared, for which the guests sharpened their appetites by a preliminary skirmish with the hostile parties hovering upon the banks of the Loire. If the column of Nantes felt delight at being united with the celebrated garrison of Mayence, the latter was not less gratified at serving under Canclaux, and in concert with his detachment, already renowned for the defence of Nantes, and for a variety of honourable achievements.

The essence of the plan laid down consisted in columns starting from all the points of the theatre of war, meeting in the centre, and there crushing the enemy. Canclaux, general of the army of Brest, taking his departure from Nantes, was to descend the left bank of the Loire, wind round the large lake of Grand-Lieu, sweep Lower Vendée, then re-ascend towards Machecoul, and reach Leger on the 11th or 13th. His arrival at this last point would be the signal for marching to the columns of the army of Rochelle, which were appointed to overrun the country from the southern and eastern extremities. It will be recollected that the army of Rochelle, under the supreme command of Rossignol as general-in-chief, was composed of several divisions—that of Sables, commanded by Mieszkousky, that of Luçon by Beffroy, that of Niort by Chalbos, that of Saumur by Santerre, and that of Angers by Duhoux. The instant Canclaux should arrive at Leger, the column of Sables was enjoined to get under movement, attain Saint-Fulgent on the 13th, Herbiers on the 14th, and finally, Mortagne on the 16th, there to join Canclaux. The columns of Luçon and Niort were, in conjunction, to advance upon Bressuire and Argenton, reaching that height by the 14th; lastly, the columns of Saumur and Angers, moving from the Loire, were likewise to arrive on the 14th in the vicinity of Vihiers and Chemillé. Thus, according to this scheme, the whole country would be traversed by the 14th and 16th, and the rebels hemmed in by the republican troops between Mortagne, Bressuire, Argenton, Vihiers, and Chemillé. Their destruction might be then deemed inevitable.

Twice repulsed from Luçon with considerable loss, the Vendéans had it greatly at heart to retrieve the disgrace. They assembled in force before the republicans had executed their project, and whilst Charette assailed the camp of Naudières on the side of Nantes, they attacked the division of Luçon, which had pushed forward as far as Chantonay. These two enterprises took place on the 5th September. The attempt of Charette on Naudières was repelled, but the assault on Chantonay, unexpected and well-combined, threw the republicans into deplorable confusion. The young and valorous Marceau effected prodigies to obviate a disaster, but his division, after losing its baggage and artillery, retreated pell-mell to Luçon. This check was capable of deranging the concerted plan, inasmuch as the disorganisation of one of the columns left a void between the division of Sables and that of Niort; but the representatives made all possible efforts to repair the mischief by infusing order into the discomfited battalions, and couriers were dispatched to Rossignol with swift intimation of the occurrence.

All the Vendéans were at this moment gathered at Herbiers, around their generalissimo D'Elbée. The spirit of discord was at work amongst them, as amongst their adversaries, for the human heart is every where the same, and nature certainly does not reserve disinterestedness and manifold virtues for one party, leaving to the other exclusively pride, selfishness, and all vice. The Vendéan chiefs, equally with the republican, were envious and jealous of each other. The generals entertained little regard for the superior council, which affected a species of sovereignty. Possessing the actual force, they were not at all disposed to yield the supremacy to a power which owed its ephemeral existence to themselves alone. Moreover, they viewed D'Elbée with feelings of repugnance, and alleged that Bonchamps was much better calculated to form a generalissimo than he. Charette, on his part, was anxious to remain the sole master of Lower Vendée. Thus they were ill prepared to act in common, and to concert a plan in opposition to that of the republicans. An intercepted dispatch had recently apprised them of the project conceived by their enemies. Bonchamps was the only leader amongst them who proposed a bold system of operations, and manifested profound ideas. He held that it would be impossible to resist, for any considerable period, the forces of the republic when concentrated in La Vendée; that it behoved them to emerge from those woods and hollows, wherein they might be interminably buried, without ever knowing, or being known, of the allies; and, consequently, that instead of waiting to be exterminated, they ought to leave Vendée in a close column and advance into Brittany, where their presence would be hailed with gladness, and where the republic had no expectation of being assailed. According to his views, the Vendéans would have marched to the shores of the ocean, seized upon a port, opened a communication with the English, received an emigrant prince amongst them, moved upon Paris, and thus prosecuted at once offensive and decisive hostilities. This counsel, which is attributed to Bonchamps, was not followed by the Vendéans, whose ideas were still as confined, and their repugnance to quit their native district as strong as ever. The principal leaders thought only of dividing the country into portions, in order to exercise individual sway in each. Thus Charette had Lower Vendée, M. de Bonchamps the banks of the Loire on the side of Angers, M. de Larochejacquelein the remainder of Upper Anjou, and M. de Lescure all the insurgent part of Poitou. M. d'Elbée retained his nominal title of generalissimo, and the superior council its disregarded authority.

On the 9th, Canclaux commenced his movement; he left a strong reserve in the camp of Naudières, under the orders of Grouchy and Haxo, to protect Nantes, and pushed the column of Mayence towards Leger. In the mean time, the old army of Brest, under the orders of Beysser, making the circuit of Lower Vendée by Pornic, Bourneuf, and Machecoul, was appointed to rejoin the cohort of Mayencers at Angers.

These movements, directed by Canclaux, were executed without encountering any serious obstacles. The cohort of Mayence, whereof Kléber commanded the advanced guard and Aubert-Dubayet the main body, drove all enemies before it. Kléber, as merciful as intrepid, caused his troops to encamp without the villages to prevent spoliations. "In winding," says he, "along the beautiful lake of Grand-Lieu, we enjoyed a charming landscape, and views equally delightful and diversified. Numerous flocks, abandoned to themselves, were roaming at hazard over an immense plain. I could not avoid sighing at the fate of those unfortunate inhabitants, who, misled and fanaticised by their priests, rejected the benefits of a new order of things to incur certain destruction." Kléber used unremitting exertions to protect the country from the excesses of the soldiery, and usually succeeded. A civil commission had been joined with the staff to put into execution the decree of the 1st of August, which ordained the devastation of the country and the removal of the population. The soldiers, meanwhile, were forbidden to apply the torch, as the means of destruction were only to be employed according to the express injunctions of the generals and the members of the civil commission.

Leger was reached by both divisions on the 14th, and the column of Mayence united with that of Brest, commanded by Beysser. In the interim, the column of Sables, under the orders of Mieszkouski, had advanced to Saint-Fulgent, in accordance with the settled plan, and already extended its posts to those of Canclaux's army. The division of Luçon, retarded for an interval by its defeat at Chantonay, had hung back; but, owing to the indefatigable efforts of the representatives, who had given it a new general, Beffroy, it had finally moved forward. That of Niort was at Châtaigneraie. Thus, although the general movement had been delayed for a day or two on all the points, and Canclaux had not arrived at Leger until the 14th, whereas he ought to have been there on the 12th, the delay being common to all the divisions, the combination was not affected, and the plan of the campaign was in the course of successful execution. But, whilst these operations were in progress, the news of the defeat sustained by the division of Luçon had reached Saumur; Rossignol, Ronsin, and the whole staff, had taken the alarm, and fearing that similar misfortunes might happen to the two other columns of Niort and Sables, the strength of which they judged inadequate, they determined to recall them immediately to their former posts. This order was in the highest degree imprudent, but it was not given in bad faith or with the intention of uncovering Canclaux and exposing his wings; the fact was, they had no confidence in his plan, and were well inclined, at the first impediment, to proclaim it impossible and to abandon it. This was doubtless what induced the staff of Saumur to order the retrograde movement of the columns of Niort, Luçon, and Sables.

Canclaux, pursuing his march, gained fresh ground. He attacked Montaigu on three points: Kléber by the road to Nantes, Aubert-Dubayet by that to Roche-Servière, and Beysser by that to Saint-Fulgent, charged simultaneously, and speedily dislodged the enemy. On the 17th Canclaux took Clisson, and perceiving no symptoms of Rossignol's co-operation, he resolved to halt and confine himself to reconnoitring until he acquired further information.

Canclaux, therefore, on the 18th September, had established himself in the environs of Clisson, having left Beysser at Montaigu, and dispatched Kléber with the advanced guard to Torfou. The counter orders issued from Saumur had reached the division of Niort, and been communicated to the two other divisions of Luçon and Sables, whereupon they forthwith retired, throwing by their retrograde movement the Vendéans into amazement and Canclaux into great perplexity. The Vendéans mustered nearly 100,000 men under arms. A very large body was assembled towards Vihiers and Chemillé, in front of the columns of Saumur and Angers; a still more considerable number towards Clisson and Montaigu, observing Canclaux. The columns of Angers and Saumur, seeing their enemies so numerous, exclaimed that it was the army of Mayence which thus drove them back upon them, and denounced a plan which exposed them to such formidable hazards. Their clamours, however, were groundless; for the Vendéans were every where in sufficient force to occupy the republicans on all points. At that very moment, so far from charging the columns of Rossignol's army, they were marching on Canclaux; D'Elbée and Lescure were in the act of quitting Upper Vendée to confront the Mayencers.

By a singular complication of circumstances, Rossignol, upon learning Canclaux's successes and his advance into the very centre of La Vendée, countermanded his first orders to retreat, and enjoined his columns to resume their movement in advance. The divisions of Saumur and Angers, being stationed within a short distance, were the first to act in obedience to these orders, and engaged in skirmishes with the enemy, the one at Doué, the other at the bridges of Cé. No decisive advantage resulted to either party. On the 18th, the Saumur column, commanded by Santerre, attempted to advance from Vihiers to a little village called Coron. In consequence of most wretched dispositions, artillery, cavalry, and infantry were confusedly crowded in the streets of this village, which was, moreover, within range of commanding heights. Santerre, perceiving the fatal error, was eager to repair it, and ordered the troops to fall back, with the view of drawing them up in form of battle on an eminence; but Ronsin, who, in the absence of Rossignol, arrogated a superior authority, upbraided Santerre with beating a retreat, and opposed his manœuvre. At this moment, the Vendéans made a furious charge upon the republicans, and a frightful disorder was communicated to the whole division. It contained a large proportion of recruits enlisted under the impulse of the tocsin, who broke from their ranks, and imparting their terror to the rest, all fled precipitately from Coron to Vihiers, to Doué, and to Saumur. The following day, the Vendéans marched against the Angers division, commanded by Duhoux. Equally fortunate as before, they repelled the republicans beyond Erigné, and once more obtained possession of the bridges of Cé.

The same activity was manifested in attacking Canclaux. Twenty thousand Vendéans, occupying positions near Torfou, fell on Kléber's advanced guard, which counted at the utmost 2000 men. Kléber placed himself amidst his soldiers, and encouraged them to resist this multitude of assailants. The ground on which he fought was a road commanded by heights; but, despite the disadvantage of his position, he retired with order and firmness. Unluckily, a piece of artillery having been dismounted, some confusion spread through the ranks, and those brave battalions gave way for the first time. At this sight, Kléber, as the only means of stopping the enemy, planted an officer with some soldiers at the end of a bridge, saying to them, "My friends, you must sell your lives." They obeyed the injunction with admirable heroism. In the mean time, the main body arrived and restored the combat; the Vendéans were driven back a considerable distance, and retribution taken for their early success.

All these events had occurred on the 19th. The order to resume the movement in advance, which had succeeded so ill with the Saumur and Angers divisions, had not yet reached, on account of the greater distance, the Luçon and Niort columns. Beysser was still at Montaigu, forming Canclaux's right wing, and completely unmasked. Canclaux, desirous to cover Beysser, ordered him to leave Montaigu and draw nearer the main body, directing Kléber, at the same time, to move towards Beysser for the purpose of protecting his manœuvre. Beysser, lacking foresight, had not taken sufficient precautions to guard his detachment in Montaigu. Messieurs de Lescure and Charette surprised it, and would have certainly annihilated it, but for the intrepidity of two battalions, who, by indomitable stubbornness, succeeded in arresting the rapidity of the pursuit. The artillery and the baggage were lost; and the remnant of this shattered cohort fled to Nantes, where the reserve left in protection of the town was prompt in extending succour. Canclaux now came to the determination of likewise retrograding, to avoid remaining so far advanced in a hostile country, exposed to the whole force of the Vendéans. He accordingly fell back on Nantes with his valiant Mayencers, who were not molested, owing as well to their own imposing attitude as to the conduct of Charette, who refused to join D'Elbée and Bonchamps in the pursuit of the retiring republicans.

The causes which had prevented the success of this expedition are obvious. The staff at Saumur was dissatisfied with a plan which adjudged the cohort of Mayence to Canclaux, and the check of the 5th September was a sufficient pretext for feigning discouragement and abandoning the plan altogether. A counter-order was immediately given to the columns of Sables, Luçon, and Rochelle. Canclaux, who had advanced without impediment, thus found himself uncovered, and the affair of Torfou rendered his position still more difficult. Upon learning his progress, however, the army of Saumur marched from that town, and Angers to Vihiers and Chemillé; and if it had not been so speedily put to flight, it is probable that the retreat of the wings would not have marred the ultimate success of the enterprise. Thus, too much eagerness to throw up the concerted plan of operations, the bad organisation of the new levies, and the might of the Vendéans, who gathered to the amount of 100,000 fighting men, were the causes of these fresh reverses. But there was neither treachery on the part of the Saumur staff, nor any radical defect in Canclaux's plan. The effect of the disaster was most calamitous; for the continued resistance of La Vendée aroused sanguine hopes in the counter-revolutionists, and singularly aggravated the perils of the republic. For the rest, if the legions of Brest and Mayence were not intimidated, the army of Rochelle was again completely disorganised, and all the conscripts brought forward by the levy en masse returned to their homes, propagating their own dejection far and wide.

The two parties in the army lost no time in accusing each other. Philippeaux, ever the most eager, instantly wrote to the committee of public welfare, in a strain of passionate invective, attributing the counter-order given to the columns of the army of Rochelle to treachery. Choudieu and Richard, commissioners at Saumur, retorted in the most injurious language, and Ronsin hastened in person to unfold the inherent vices in the plan of campaign before the minister and the committee of public welfare. Canclaux, he urged, by acting with too strong a force in Lower Vendée, had thrown upon Upper Vendée the whole insurgent population, and had provoked the defeat of the Saumur and Angers columns. Moreover, returning calumny for calumny, Ronsin answered the reproach of treachery by the charge of aristocracy, and denounced at once the two armies of Brest and Mayence as filled with suspected and ill-intentioned men. Thus continually grew in virulence the quarrel between the Jacobin party and the party which upheld the policy of discipline and a regular system of warfare.

The inexplicable rout of Menin, the abortive and costly attempt upon Pirmasens, the reverses at the foot of the Pyrenees, and the disastrous issue of the last expedition in La Vendée, were known in Paris almost at the same time, and caused in that city a most dismal impression. The particulars of these untoward events were communicated in quick succession between the 18th and 25th September, and, as usual, excessive alarm stirred up violent passions. We have already stated that the most ardent agitators were accustomed to meet at the Cordelier Club, where less restraint was imposed on language than even at the Jacobin Club, and that they ruled over the war department, under the nominal sway of the imbecile Bouchotte. Vincent was their leader at Paris as Ronsin in La Vendée, and they seized this calamitous occasion to renew their wonted clamours. Placed beneath the convention, they would have willingly shaken off its inconvenient authority, which they encountered in the armies in the persons of the representatives, and at Paris in the committee of public welfare. The representatives on missions restrained them from executing the revolutionary measures with all the violence they were eager to develop; the committee of public welfare, regulating paramountly all operations according to views comparatively elevated and impartial, perpetually thwarted them, being, therefore, of all obstacles, that which chiefly moved their ire: thus it chanced that the idea often occurred to them, that they ought to demand the establishment of the new executive power after the form prescribed by the constitution.

To put the constitution in force, as frequently and malevolently insisted upon by the aristocrats, would be attended with incalculable danger. It involved a fresh general election, replacing the convention by another assembly, necessarily inexperienced, unknown to the country, and composed of heterogeneous draughts from all the factions. The enthusiastic revolutionists, aware of this peril, shrunk from proposing the renewal of the national representation, but restricted their demands to the enforcement of the constitution so far only as consorted with their own views. Nearly all of them occupying places in the public offices, they simply desired the formation of the constitutional ministry, which would be independent of the legislative power, and consequently of the committee of public welfare. Vincent, therefore, had the assurance to submit a petition to the Cordeliers, claiming the organisation of the constitutional ministry, and the recall of the deputies out on missions. The motion occasioned the greatest excitement. Legendre, the friend of Danton, and already classed amongst those whose energy seemed on the wane, vainly strove in opposition; the petition was adopted, save the article demanding the recall of the deputies on missions. The utility of those representatives was so manifest, and something so personal against the members of the convention appeared in the clause, that it was felt prudent to drop it. This petition excited an extraordinary tumult in Paris, and seriously affected the incipient authority of the committee of public welfare.

Besides these violent adversaries, the committee had others in the new moderates, who were accused of reviving the system of the Girondists, and trammelling revolutionary energy. These, emphatically pronouncing against the Cordeliers, Jacobins, and military disorganisers, besieged the committee with incessant complaints, and even railed at it for not denouncing the anarchists with sufficient vigour.

Thus, the committee had the two new parties which were beginning to be formed arrayed against it. According to inveterate usage, these parties took advantage of every calamity to found accusations; and both being cordial in condemning its operations, censured it, each after its peculiar fashion.

The flight of Menin on the 15th was already fully known; the final discomfiture in La Vendée began to be darkly hinted at. Uncertain rumours were propagated of defeats at Coron, Torfou, and Montaigu.* Thuriot, who had refused to serve as a member on the committee of public welfare, and who was upbraided with being one of the new moderates, mounted the tribune one morning in the convention to protest against intriguers and disorganisers, from whom propositions of extreme violence regarding provisions had just emanated. "Our committees and the executive council," said he, "are harassed and worried by a pack of intriguers, who pretend patriotism only because it is profitable to them. Yes, the time is come when we must repudiate these men of rapine and the torch, who think the revolution has been made for them, whilst the honest and pure support it only for the happiness of the human race." The propositions controverted by Thuriot were rejected. Briez, one of the commissioners sent to Valenciennes, then read a critical essay on the military operations. He held that at no time had the warfare been brisk and conformable to the French genius; that the fighting had always been in detail, and in petty masses; and that the causes of the reverses were to be found in this defective system. Proceeding, without openly attacking the committee of public welfare, he seemed to insinuate that it had failed to apprise the convention of all circumstances; that, for example, a corps of 6000 Austrians had been near Douay, which might have been enveloped but had not been so. The convention, after having attentively listened to Briez, added him to the committee of public welfare. At this moment, detailed intelligence from La Vendée, contained in a letter from Montaigu, arrived. The alarming tidings excited a general emotion. "Instead of giving way to dejection," exclaimed one of the members, "let us swear to save the republic!" At these words the whole assembly rose, and once again swore to save the republic, whatsoever perils might threaten it.

The members of the committee of public welfare, who had not yet appeared at the sitting, entered the hall immediately afterwards. Barrère, the usual reporter, claimed to be heard. "Every suspicion," said he, "directed against the committee of public welfare is a victory gained by Pitt. We must avoid giving our enemies the too signal advantage of ourselves, discrediting the power appointed to save us." He subsequently made known the measures taken by the committee. "For several days," he continued, "the committee has had grounds for suspecting that serious faults were committed at Dunkirk, where the English might have been exterminated to the last man, and at Menin, where no exertion was made to obviate the strange effects of the panic. The committee has superseded Houchard, as well as the general of division Hédouville, who failed to do at Menin what he ought to have done; and the conduct of those two generals will be forthwith investigated. The committee next intends to purify all the staffs and departments in the armies; it has placed the fleets on a footing which will permit them to measure strength with the enemy; it has just raised 18,000 men; and it has ordered a new system of attack in masses. Finally, it is in Rome itself that it designs to attack Rome; and 100,000 men, disembarking in England, will extinguish Pitt's system in London. The committee of public safety, therefore, has been wrongly accused; it has never ceased to merit the confidence you have hitherto reposed in it."

Robespierre then appeared in the tribune. "For some time," said he, "efforts have been made to defame the convention, and the committee to which its authority is delegated. Briez, who ought to have died in the breach at Valenciennes, comes unblushingly to Paris, from the scene of his cowardice, to serve Pitt and the coalition, by bringing the government into odium. It is not enough," he added, "that the convention continues to us its confidence; it must proclaim the fact in solemn form, and rescind its vote regarding Briez, whom it has added to our number." Applause hailed this demand; the assembly decided that Briez should not be joined to the committee of public welfare, and resolved by acclamation that that committee retained the full confidence of the national convention.

The moderate party was in the convention alone, and there the debate we have just recorded had ended in its repulse; but the most formidable adversaries of the committee, that is to say, the ardent revolutionists, were to be found in the Jacobin and Cordelier Clubs. From them it was deemed expedient to seek prompt deliverance. Robespierre accordingly visited the Jacobins, and exerted all his ascendancy over them. He explained the conduct of the committee, vindicated it from the twofold attacks of the moderates and the exaggerators, and inculcated the peril of petitions demanding the formation of the constitutional ministry. "It is necessary," said he, "that some government should succeed the one we have destroyed. The plan of organising at this moment the constitutional ministry, means nothing else than a scheme for dissolving the convention itself, and decomposing the government in presence of the hostile armies. Pitt alone can have originated such an idea. His agents have propagated it, and seduced patriots of pure faith; whilst the credulous and suffering people, always prone to complain of the government, which is unable to remedy all their griefs, have become the ready echo of their calumnies and insidious suggestions. You, Jacobins!" exclaimed Robespierre, "too sincere to be gained, too enlightened to be seduced, will defend the Mountain which they assail; you will support the committee of public welfare which they calumniate the better to compass your ruin; and thus with you it will triumph over all the devices of the enemies of the people."

Robespierre was loudly cheered, and in his person the whole committee. The Cordeliers were rebuked, and their petition consigned to oblivion. Vincent's rash attack, therefore, being thus victoriously repelled, recoiled upon his own head, and left the committee unscathed.

Nevertheless, it was felt incumbent to adopt some resolution touching the new constitution. To give place to new revolutionists, equivocal, unknown, and in all probability divided, since they would be drawn from all the factions agitating beneath the convention, was fraught with danger. Hence it became necessary to declare boldly to all the parties that the supreme power would be usurped, and that before abandoning the republic to itself and to the action of the laws that had been framed for it, it must be governed revolutionarily until it was finally rescued. Numerous petitions had already besought the convention to remain at its post. On the 10th October, Saint-Just, speaking in the name of the committee of public welfare, proposed new measures of government. He drew a most dismal picture of France, darkening it with the saddest colours of his own sombre imagination; and with the aid of those eminent talents he possessed, and of facts unfortunately too real, he produced a species of terror in the minds of his hearers. He then presented, and induced the convention to adopt, a decree containing the following provisions:—

By the first article, the government of France was declared revolutionary until the peace; which signified that the constitution was provisionally suspended, and an extraordinary dictatorship instituted until the expiration of all dangers. This dictatorship was conferred on the convention and the committee of public welfare. "The executive council," ran the decree, "the ministers, generals, and constituted bodies, are placed under the superintendence of the committee of public welfare, which will render accounts every week to the convention." We have already explained how superintendence was converted into supreme authority, from the ministers, generals, and functionaries, who were obliged to submit their operations to the committee, having finished by no longer venturing to act upon their own judgment, and waiting for orders from the committee itself. The decree proceeded to declare—"The revolutionary laws must be executed rapidly. The inertness of government being the cause of the reverses, the periods for the execution of those laws will be fixed. The non-observance of those periods will be punished as a crime against liberty." Regulations on the subject of food were added to these measures of government, "for bread is the right of the people," said Saint-Just. The general table of existing resources, now definitively completed, was to be sent to all the authorities. The exigency of each department was to be approximatively estimated and guaranteed, whilst the superfluity was subjected to requisitions, either for the armies or for districts which lacked the exigency. These requisitions were to be controlled by a subsistence commission. Paris was to be, like a fortified town, provisioned for a year, dating from the 1st of March ensuing. Lastly, it was decreed that a tribunal should be instituted to inquire into the conduct and fortunes of those who had disbursed the public money.

By this great and important declaration, the government, consisting of the committee of public welfare, the committee of general safety, and the extraordinary tribunal, was consolidated and rendered permanent during the continuance of danger. The effect was tantamount to declaring the revolution in a state of siege, and applying to it the extraordinary laws of that condition, whilst it should endure. The establishment of this revolutionary government was accompanied by various measures long demanded, and now become unavoidable. A revolutionary army, that is to say, a force specifically devoted to enforcing the execution of the government mandates in the interior, had been a subject of frequent reclamation. It had been decreed some time previously, but it was finally organised by a new decree passed on the 3d of September. It was composed of 6000 soldiers and 1200 artillerymen. It was intended to be moveable, and to march from Paris into towns where its presence might be necessary, there to remain in garrison at the expense of the wealthiest inhabitants. The Cordeliers desired one for each department; but their ideas were controverted by the argument, that to give an individual force to each department would savour of a return to federalism. The same Cordeliers, moreover, insisted that the detachments of the revolutionary army should be followed by a guillotine on wheels. No limit can be assigned to the extravagant conceptions of the people when once fairly left to themselves. The convention, however, repudiated these demands, and adhered to its decree. Bouchotte, being charged with the composition of this army, levied it from all those characters abounding in Paris who followed no occupation, and were ready to become the janissaries of the prevailing power. He filled the staff with Jacobins, but especially with Cordeliers, and deprived La Vendée and Rossignol of Ronsin, to place him at the head of this revolutionary army. He submitted the list of the staff to the Jacobins, and made each officer undergo the ordeal of a scrutiny. Not one of them, in fact, was confirmed by the minister without being sanctioned by that society.

The formation of a revolutionary army was coupled with a law against the suspected, so repeatedly bespoken, and ordained in principle the same day as the national levy. The extraordinary tribunal, although organised so as to smite on simple probabilities, did not sufficiently satisfy the revolutionary imagination. Power was craved to incarcerate those whom it might be difficult to send to the scaffold; hence the cry for enactments authorising their persons to be secured. The decree placing aristocrats beyond the pale of the law was too vague, and required the formality of a trial. The object desired was, that, on the mere denunciation of the revolutionary committees, an individual declared to be suspected might be immediately thrown into prison. Accordingly, the convention decreed the provisional arrest, until the peace, of all suspected individuals.* Considered as such were—1st, Those who, either by their conduct, by their intercourse, by their words, or by their writings, had shown themselves partisans of tyranny or federalism, and enemies of liberty.

2d, Those who could not give a satisfactory account, in the manner prescribed by the law of the 20th March last, of their means of existence, and of the performance of their civic duties.

3d, Those to whom certificates of civism had been refused.

4th, Public functionaries suspended or degraded from their functions by the national convention or its commissioners.

5th, Late nobles, and the husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, brothers, sisters, and agents of emigrants, who had not constantly manifested their attachment to the revolution.

6th, Those who had emigrated in the interval between the 1st July 1789 and the publication of the law of the 8th April 1792, although they had returned to France within the stipulated periods.

The prisoners were to be confined in the national buildings, and detained at their own expense. They were allowed the privilege of removing into these houses such furniture as they might require. The committees empowered to order arrests, could only do so by a majority of their members, and under restriction of transmitting to the committee of general safety a list of the suspected, and the reasons for each arrest. Their duties becoming thenceforth very arduous, and almost continuous, constituted a species of profession, which it was held just to remunerate. They consequently received, from that time forth, a salary under the title of an indemnity.

At the urgent entreaties of the commune of Paris, these regulations were completed by an additional measure, which rendered this law of the suspected still more formidable: this was the revocation of the decree prohibiting domiciliary visits during the night. From that moment, every proscribed citizen was threatened at all hours, and no longer enjoyed an interval of repose. By immuring themselves during the day in the ingenious and confined hiding-places which necessity had suggested, the suspected had hitherto possessed the faculty of breathing freely during the hours of darkness; now, even that boon was denied them, and the arrests, multiplied day and night, speedily filled all the prisons of France.

The sectional meetings were accustomed to be held daily; but the working part of the community had not time to attend them, and in its absence revolutionary motions were indifferently supported. The convention enjoined, on the express proposition of the Jacobin Club and the commune, that those meetings should take place for the future only twice a-week, and that each citizen giving his attendance thereat, should receive forty sous per sitting. No expedient could be better adapted for securing the populace, than assembling them at intervals, not too quickly recurring, and liberally rewarding their presence. The ardent revolutionists were incensed at a regulation which fettered their zeal, and limited its manifestations to two days out of seven. They accordingly drew up an energetic petition, expostulating against what they decried as an invasion upon the rights of the sovereign, he being debarred from sitting in council as often as it pleased his fancy. Young Varlet was the author of this petition; but it was unheeded, sharing in that respect the same fate as divers other demands inspired by the revolutionary mania.

Thus the machine was complete in the two most important ramifications with reference to a country at hazard, war and police. In the convention, a committee directed the military operations, selected the generals and agents of every kind, and wielded, by means of the decree of permanent requisition, a disposing power over both men and things. It exercised these functions, either by itself, or by the representatives dispatched on missions. Under this committee, the committee styled that of general safety had the control of the superior police, and employed, as its superintending agents, revolutionary committees instituted in each municipality. Individuals slightly suspected of hostility, or even of indifference, were incarcerated; others, more seriously compromised, were struck by the revolutionary tribunal, but fortunately in small number, for that court had not yet pronounced many condemnations. A special army, the veritable moving guard or gendarmerie of the dominant system, enforced the orders of the government, whilst the people, paid for frequenting the sections, were always ready to support it. Thus war and police all centred in the committee of public welfare. Absolute master, holding at discretion the fortunes of all citizens, and empowered to consign their persons to military service, to the dungeon, or to the scaffold, it was invested, in defence of the revolution, with an unlimited and terrible despotism. True, it was enjoined to render a weekly account of its transactions to the convention; but that account was invariably approved, for all criticism was confined to the Jacobins, whom it swayed since Robespierre had become a component member. In opposition to this exorbitant power, there were simply the moderates, shrinking backward, and the new exaggerators, harking onward, but neither the one nor the other calculated to excite much apprehension.

We have seen that Robespierre and Carnot had been named on the committee of public welfare, in lieu of Gasparin and Thuriot, who retired from ill health. Robespierre had carried with him his powerful influence, and Carnot his military science. The convention wished to have coupled Robespierre with Danton, his colleague and rival in renown; but the latter, fatigued with exertion, averse to the tedious details of administration, and moreover disgusted with the calumny of faction, declined serving on any committee. He had already done enough for the revolution: he had sustained drooping courage in the hours of danger; he had furnished the first idea of the revolutionary tribunal, the revolutionary army, the permanent requisition, the tax upon the rich, and the subsidy of forty sous per sitting to the members of sections; he was the author, in short, of all the measures which, rendered howsoever cruel in the execution, nevertheless imparted that energy to the revolution which eventually saved it. At this period, Danton began to be no longer so necessary, for as to mere physical danger, since the first invasion of the Prussians, it had become, as it were, one of the elements of revolutionary existence. The inexorable vengeance to be wreaked on the Girondists was abhorrent to him; he had recently espoused a young wife, of whom he was deeply enamoured, and whom he had endowed with the gold of Belgium, as his detractors averred, and with the compensation awarded him for his old office of advocate to the council, according to the more favourable version of his friends; he was, like Mirabeau and Marat, labouring under an inflammatory malady; finally, he was desirous of repose: wherefore he demanded leave to visit Arcis-sur-Aube, his birthplace, to enjoy the charms of nature, for his spirit could luxuriate in such recreation. He had been advised to seek this temporary retreat, in order that calumny might in the interim waste its force. The triumph of the revolution could be now consummated without him; two months of war and energy would suffice; and he proposed to return after the victory, and make his potential voice be heard in favour of the vanquished and of a better order of things. Such the vain illusion of indolence and discouragement! To abandon for two months, for even one, a revolution so supremely rapid, was to become, with regard to it, a stranger devoid of influence.

Thus Danton refused to enter the committee of public welfare, and obtained leave of absence. Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois were nominated as members, and bore to its deliberations, the first his cold and implacable disposition, and the other his impetuosity of character, and his sway over the turbulent Cordeliers. The committee of general safety was remodelled. Of its eighteen members, nine were lopped off, those whose severity of temper was sufficiently accredited being retained.

Whilst the government was thus taking organisation in the strongest possible manner, all its resolutions manifested redoubled energy. The vigorous measures adopted in the month of August had not yet produced their anticipated results. La Vendée, although attacked in pursuance of a regular plan, had successfully resisted; the defeat of Menin had almost wholly lost the advantages of the victory at Hondtschoote; fresh efforts, then, were indispensable. Revolutionary enthusiasm inspired the idea that the will must have, in war as in all other matters, a decisive influence; and, for the first time, injunctions were laid upon an army to conquer within a given period.

The full extent of danger to the republic in the war of La Vendée was appreciated. "Destroy La Vendée," said Barrère, in a report, "and Valenciennes and Condé will be no longer in the power of the Austrian. Destroy La Vendée, and England will no longer turn its eyes on Dunkirk. Destroy La Vendée, and the Rhine will be delivered from the Prussians. Destroy La Vendée, and Spain will find itself pressed and conquered by the southerns, joined to the victorious cohorts of Mortagne and Cholet. Destroy La Vendée, and a part of the army of the interior will reinforce that intrepid army of the north, so often betrayed, so often disorganised. Destroy La Vendée, and Lyons will no longer resist, Toulon will rise against the Spaniards and the English, and the spirit of Marseilles will rebound to the height of the republican revolution. In a word, every blow you strike at La Vendée will reverberate in the rebellious cities, in the federalist departments, on the invaded frontiers! La Vendée—the watchword is still La Vendée! It is there you must strike, between this and the 20th October, before the winter, before the roads become impracticable—before the brigands find impunity in the climate and the season!

The committee, casting a rapid and comprehensive glance, discovers all the vices at work in La Vendée in this short summary:—

Too many representatives
Too much moral division;
Too many military divisions;
Too much want of discipline in success;
Too many false reports in the relation of events;
Too much avidity and love of money in a portion of the leaders and administrators."

After hearing this exposition, the convention reduced the number of representatives on missions, united the two armies of Brest and Rochelle into one, to be called the army of the west, and gave the command of it, not to Rossignol or to Canclaux, but to Léchelle, general of brigade in the division of Luçon. Lastly, it assigned the day upon which the war of La Vendée was to be ended, and that day was the 20th October. The following proclamation accompanied the decree:—*

"THE NATIONAL CONVENTION TO THE ARMY OF THE WEST.

Soldiers of liberty!—The brigands of La Vendée must be exterminated before the end of October! The safety of the country demands it; the impatience of the French nation commands it; its courage shall accomplish it. The national gratitude attends at this epoch all whose valour and patriotism consolidate imperishably liberty and the republic."

Measures not less prompt and vigorous were taken with regard to the army of the north, with the view of retrieving the disgrace at Menin, and conducing to a new career of victory. Houchard, already superseded, was placed under arrest. General Jourdan, who had commanded the centre at Hondtschoote, was appointed general-in-chief of the armies of the north and of Ardennes. He had orders to assemble at Guise large masses, to make an onslaught upon the enemy. Attacks in detail were condemned to universal odium. Without investigating the plan or operations of Houchard around Dunkirk, it was sufficient that he had not fought in masses, for that mode of combat was exclusively demanded, being better adapted, it was alleged, to the impetuosity of the French character. Carnot had left Paris for Guise to be near Jourdan, and to put in execution a new system of war altogether revolutionary. Three additional commissioners were joined to Dubois-Crancé, charged to raise levies en masse and precipitate them upon Lyons. They were enjoined to renounce the system of methodical attacks, and at once to assault the refractory city. Thus, on all sides, redoubled efforts were made to conclude the campaign victoriously.

But rigour was the invariable accompaniment of energy. The trial of Custine, too long delayed, according to the Jacobins, was at length commenced, and conducted with all the violence and barbarity of the new judicial forms. No general-in-chief had as yet appeared on the scaffold; a certain impatience was felt to smite a lofty personage, and make the leaders of armies quail before popular supremacy; above all, a desire had long lurked to visit upon some general the defection of Dumouriez, and Custine was recommended for the atonement, by the circumstance of his opinions and tendencies constituting him in popular estimation another Dumouriez. Advantage had been taken of the moment when, holding the command of the army of the north, Custine had visited Paris to concert his future operations with the minister, to accomplish his arrest. He was at first thrown into prison, but after a short interval a decree was craved and obtained for his arraignment at the bar of the revolutionary tribunal.

Let us recall the campaign of Custine on the Rhine. Intrusted with a division of the army, he had found Worms and Spire indifferently guarded, because the allies, in their eagerness to march on Champagne, had given no heed to any thing on their wings and in their rear. German patriots, flocking from all directions, offered him their towns; he advanced, took Spire and Worms, which were delivered into his hands, and neglected Manheim, which lay on his route, from respect for the neutrality of the elector-palatine, and from a presentiment, likewise, that its possession would not be easily compassed. He at length reached Mayence, seized upon it, gladdened all France with his unexpected conquests, and procured a command which rendered him independent of Biron. At this moment, Dumouriez had repulsed the Prussians, and driven them back on the Rhine. Kellermann was at Treves. Custine ought then to have descended the Rhine to Coblentz, effected a junction with Kellermann, and thus rendered himself master of the course of the river. A combination of reasons pointed out this plan. The inhabitants of Coblentz invoked the presence of Custine, those of Saint-Goard and Rheinfels stretched out their hands to him; in short, no limit can be assigned to his probable career had he frankly resigned himself to the course of the Rhine. It was quite possible for him to have descended even into Holland. But, from the interior of Germany, other patriotic voices came to beguile his ear; for the belief was prevalent, from his bold advance, that he had at least 100,000 men under his command. To penetrate the hostile land and carry his standards beyond the Rhine, was too tempting an exploit to the fancy and vanity of General Custine. He rushed onward to Frankfort, where he paused to levy contributions and exercise other impolitic severities. Fresh solicitations there assailed him. There were madmen who urged him to advance to Cassel, in the midst of electoral Hesse, for the alluring purpose of grasping the treasures of the elector. The wiser counsels of the French government exhorted him to return upon the Rhine and march towards Coblentz. But he heeded not, completely absorbed in the idea of revolutionising Germany.

Nevertheless, Custine was not insensible to the peril of his position. Reflecting that, if the elector-palatine should break his neutrality, his rear would be endangered from Manheim, he would have willingly taken that fortress, which was offered to him, but he durst not venture upon the step. As to being attacked in Frankfort, which he could not hope to hold, he was loath to abandon that city and return upon the line of the Rhine, as that step led of course to an inglorious surrender of his pretended conquests, and exposed him to the obligation of sharing in the operations of the other generals by descending to Coblentz. In this situation he was surprised by the Prussians; lost Frankfort; fell back on Mayence; halted uncertain whether he should retain that place or not; threw into it some artillery drawn from Strasburg; gave tardy orders for provisioning it; was once more surprised by the Prussians amidst these uncertainties; retreated from Mayence, and, seized with terror, conceiving himself pursued by 150,000 men, retired into Upper Alsace, almost under the guns of Strasburg. Stationed on the Upper Rhine with a considerable army, he had it in his power to march on Mayence and place the besiegers between two fires, but he could never muster sufficient hardihood for the enterprise; at length, shocked at his own inactivity, he hazarded a disastrous attack on the 15th May, was discomfited, and sulkily betook himself to the army of the north, where he consummated his ruin by talking in a strain of moderation, and inculcating a policy of undoubted prudence, to wit, retaining the army in Cæsar's camp for the purpose of re-organising it, instead of leading it forth to unavailing bloodshed under the idea of relieving Valenciennes.

Such was the career of Custine. In it were assuredly numerous faults, but no treason. His trial was opened, and as deponents against him were summoned representatives acting on missions, agents of the executive power, inveterate foes to generals, discontented officers, members of clubs in Strasburg, Mayence, and Cambray, and, lastly, the terrible Vincent, the tyrant of the war-offices under Bouchotte. Here was an array of accusers, heaping unjust and contradictory charges—charges altogether foreign to a military inquiry, but founded on accidental misfortunes, for which the general was not blameable, and which could with no regard to fairness be imputed to him. Custine replied with a peculiar soldierly vehemence to all these accusations, but he was overborne. Jacobins from Strasburg upbraided him with not endeavouring to take the gorges of Porentruy, when Luckner ordered him to do so; and he proved fruitlessly that it was impossible. A German reproached him with not having occupied Manheim, which he had offered him. Custine sought exoneration by alleging the neutrality of the elector and the difficulties of the project. The inhabitants of Coblentz, Rheinfels, Darmstadt, Hanau, and all the towns which had been anxious to open their gates to him, and which he had declined to occupy, inveighed against him with one accord.

When accused of refusing to march on Coblentz, he offered but a lame defence, and calumniated Kellermann, who, he asserted, had objected to second him. To the charge of refusing to occupy other towns, he answered with reason that he was invoked by numberless persons in Germany, and that if he had met every demand upon him, he must have occupied upwards of a hundred leagues of ground. By a singular contradiction, whilst he was blamed for not having taken one town, or drawn contributions from another, he was specifically criminated for having taken Frankfort, plundered the inhabitants, failed to make the necessary dispositions for resisting the Prussians, and exposed the French garrison to the risk of being massacred.

The chivalric Merlin de Thionville, one of those who deposed against him, justified him on that point with equal candour and good sense. Had he even left 20,000 men in Frankfort, asseverated Merlin, he could not have retained its possession; he was bound to retire on Mayence, and his only default consisted in not doing so earlier. But at Mayence, exclaimed a crowd of other witnesses, he had made no essential preparations; he had collected neither victuals nor munitions; he had thrown in the artillery whereof he despoiled Strasburg, merely to ensure its capture by the Prussians, together with a garrison of 20,000 men and two deputies. Custine proved that he had given orders for supplies; that the artillery was scarcely sufficient; and that it had not been uselessly accumulated for the purpose of being captured by the Prussians. Merlin supported all the assertions of Custine, but could not be brought to pardon his pusillanimous retreat, or his inaction on the Upper Rhine, whilst the garrison of Mayence was effecting prodigies. Here Custine had nothing to offer in extenuation. He was next reproached with having burnt the magazines in Spire when retiring; an absurd reproach, for a retreat once unavoidable, it was better to consume the magazines than leave them for the enemy. He was likewise accused of shooting volunteers at Spire, on account of pillaging; to which he answered, that the convention had approved his conduct. Then he was impugned for having deliberately spared the Prussians; for having voluntarily exposed his army to be defeated on the 15th May; for having tardily repaired to his command in the north; for having attempted to strip Lille of its artillery to convey it to Cæsar's camp; for having prevented the relief of Valenciennes; for not having opposed obstacles to the disembarkation of the English—accusations excelling one another in absurdity? Lastly, it was objected to him—"You pitied Louis XVI.; you were melancholy on the 31st May; you would have fain hanged Dr Hoffmann, president of the Jacobins at Mayence; you have prevented the distribution of Père Duchêne's journal and of the Mountain journal in your army; you have stated that Marat and Robespierre were public disturbers; you have been surrounded by aristocratic officers; you have never had at your table good republicans." These reproaches were fatal, and comprehended the real crimes for which he was persecuted.

The trial, meanwhile, proceeded tediously; the various imputations were so vague that the tribunal hesitated. Custine's daughter, and several persons who were interested in his behalf, had made exertions to save him; for at this period, although the terror was already great, friends still ventured to evince some interest in victims. The revolutionary tribunal itself was speedily denounced at the Jacobin Club. "It is painful to me," said Hebert to the Jacobins, "to have to denounce an authority which was the hope of the patriots, which at first merited all their confidence, and which will soon become their abomination. The revolutionary tribunal is on the point of absolving a miscreant, in whose favour, it is true, the prettiest women in Paris are soliciting all the world. Custine's daughter, as cunning a comedian in this city as her father was at the head of armies, sees every body, and promises every thing to obtain his pardon." Robespierre also, on his part, inveighed against the spirit of chicanery and the passion for formalities which had suddenly seized upon the tribunal; and averred that simply for having purposed to unfurnish Lille, Custine richly deserved to die.

Vincent, summoned as a witness, had ransacked the repositories of the war-office, and produced the letters and orders wherewith Custine was reproached, but which were certainly far from constituting crimes. Fouquier-Tinville summed up the case with a parallel between Custine and Dumouriez, which was decisive against the unfortunate general. Dumouriez, he alleged, had advanced rapidly into Belgium, to abandon it with equal rapidity, and deliver to the enemy soldiers, magazines, and representatives. Even so had Custine advanced rapidly into Germany, abandoned soldiers at Frankfort and at Mayence, and laid his plans for delivering to the enemy, with the latter town, 20,000 men, two representatives, and the whole park of artillery which he had wickedly taken from Strasburg. Like Dumouriez, also, he reviled the convention and the Jacobins, and sentenced brave volunteers to be shot, under pretext of maintaining discipline. At this parallel the scruples of the tribunal vanished. Custine spoke for two hours in justification of his military operations. Tronçon-Ducoudray defended his administrative and civil conduct, but unavailingly. The tribunal pronounced the general guilty, to the great joy of the Jacobins and Cordeliers, who filled the court, and gave loud demonstrations of their satisfaction. He had not been condemned unanimously, however. Upon the three questions, there had been against him successively ten, nine, and eight voices out of eleven. The president having asked him whether he had any thing further to say, he looked around him, and not perceiving his defenders, he replied, "My defenders are gone—I die resigned and innocent."

He was executed the following morning. A warrior, and distinguished for high personal courage, he was startled at sight of the guillotine. However, falling on his knees at the foot of the ladder, and repeating a short prayer, his presence of mind revived, and he met death with fortitude. Such was the end of this unfortunate commander, who lacked neither ability nor boldness of character, but combined therewith a remarkable degree of instability and presumption, and doubtless committed three capital faults—the first, by overstepping his veritable line of operation to move upon Frankfort; the second, by not returning to it when strongly urged; and the third, by remaining in cowardly inaction during the siege of Mayence. Still, none of these delinquencies merited death; but he underwent the fate which could not be inflicted on Dumouriez, and which he had not provoked like that general by formidable and criminal projects. His execution was a terrible example to all the generals, and a warning for them to render an absolute obedience to the injunctions of the revolutionary government.

After this act of implacability, all attempts were vain to check other immolations. The order for hastening the trial of Marie-Antoinette was forthwith renewed. The articles of impeachment against the irondists, so long demanded and never hitherto digested, were now presented to the convention. They were drawn up by Saint-Just. Petitions from the Jacobins poured in to constrain their adoption by the convention. They were directed not only against the twenty-two and the members of the commission of twelve, but also against seventy-three members of the right side, who had observed an unbroken silence since the victory of the Mountain, but were known to have framed a protest against the events of the 31st May and the 2d June. Certain frantic Mountaineers advocated an impeachment, that is to say, a consignment to death, against the twenty-two, the twelve, and the seventy-three; but Robespierre controverted such wholesale slaughter, and proposed a middle course, namely, to send before the revolutionary tribunal the twenty-two and the twelve, and to place the seventy-three under arrest. According as he advised, so it was ordered; the doors of the hall were instantly closed, the seventy-three arrested, and injunctions laid upon Fouquier-Tinville to give his attention to the unfortunate Girondists. Thus the convention, becoming daily more docile, allowed an ordinance to be wrung from it devoting a large portion of its members to certain death. In truth, it could no longer delay the ungrateful task, for the Jacobins had presented five petitions, the one more imperious than the other, to extort these last decrees of impeachment.

CHAPTER XXVII.

CAPTURE OF LYONS, AND TERRIBLE RETRIBUTION ON ITS INHABITANTS. — VICTORY OF WATIGNIES. — REDUCTION OF LA VENDEE.—REVERSES ON THE RHINE.

EVERY reverse aroused revolutionary energy, and that energy generated success. This had been constantly the case during this ever-memorable campaign. From the defeat of Neerwinden to the month of August, an unbroken series of disasters had eventually provoked desperate exertions. The annihilation of federalism, the defence of Nantes, the victory of Hondtschoote, and the relief of Dunkirk, had been the consequences of those exertions. Fresh reverses at Menin, Pirmasens, the Pyrenees, and Torfou and Coron in La Vendée, had again excited energy to the highest pitch, and decisive successes on all the theatres of war were speedily to follow.

The siege of Lyons was, of all the operations, that whereof the termination was demanded with the chiefest impatience. We left Dubois-Crancé encamped before that city, with 5000 men of the regular army, and from 7000 to 8000 conscripts. He was threatened with having quickly on his rear the Sardinians, whom the feeble army of the Great Alps could no longer keep in check. As we have already explained, he had planted himself on the north, between the Saône and the Rhone, in front of the redoubts of the Croix-Rousse, and not on the heights of Sainte-Foy and Fourvières, situated to the west, by which the principal attack might have been best directed. But there were substantial reasons for this preference. It was of primary importance to remain in communication with the Alpine frontier, where the bulk of the republican army was stationed, and whence the Piedmontese might approach to the succour of the Lyonnese. He had, moreover, the advantage in this position of occupying the upper course of the two rivers, and intercepting the supplies which came down the Rhone and the Saône. It is true the western side thus remained open to the Lyonnese, and they were enabled to make continual excursions towards Saint-Etienne and Montbrison; but the arrival of the contingents from the Puy-de-Dôme was daily announced, and whenever those new levies were mustered, Dubois-Crancé would be able to perfect the blockade on the western side, and select the true point of attack. In the mean time, he was content to press the enemy unremittingly, cannonade the Croix-Rousse on the north, and commence his lines to the east before the bridge of La Guillotière. The transport of munitions was difficult and tedious; they had to be brought from Grenoble, Fort Barreaux, Briançon, and Embrun, and thus made to traverse sixty leagues of mountainous roads. Such an extraordinary wainage could only have been accomplished by the mode of forced requisitions, and by devoting 5000 extra horses to the service; for the conveyance to Lyons was required of 14,000 bombs, 34,000 balls, 300,000 pounds of powder, 800,000 cartridges, and 130 pieces of ordnance.

At the first commencement of the siege, the Piedmontese were advertised to be on the move, and debouching from the Little Saint-Bernard and Mount Cenis. Kellermann immediately departed, on the pressing entreaties of the department of the Isère, and left General Dumay as his substitute before Lyons. But, in fact, Dumay only succeeded him in name, for Dubois-Crancé, at once a representative and a skilful engineer, alone directed all the operations of the siege. To accelerate the levy of the conscripts in the Puy-de-Dôme, Dubois-Crancé detached General Nicolas with a small body of cavalry; but that officer was enveloped in the Forez, and fell a prey to the Lyonnese. Dubois-Crancé then dispatched 1000 of his best troops with the representative Javognes. His mission was more fortunate; he repressed the aristocrats of Montbrison and Saint-Etienne, and levied 7000 or 8000 peasants, whom he conducted before Lyons. Dubois-Crancé stationed them at the bridge of Oullins, situated to the north-west of Lyons, so as to harass the communications of the besieged with the Forez. He next summoned the deputy Reverchon, who had assembled a few thousand conscripts at Mâçon, and planted him high up the Saône directly to the north. In this manner, the blockade began to be somewhat more rigorous; but the operations were slow, and attacks actively offensive impracticable. The fortifications of the Croix-Rousse, between the Rhone and Saône, before which the principal corps was extended, could not be carried by assault. Towards the east, and on the left bank of the Rhine, the Morand bridge was defended by a horseshoe redoubt most skilfully constructed. To the west, the all-important heights of Sainte-Foy and Fourvières could only be surmounted by a powerful army; and for the moment nothing more could be attempted than intercepting supplies, and beleaguering and bombarding the town. From the beginning of August to the middle of September, Dubois-Crancé had been incapable of effecting more, and at Paris his tardiness was reviled without its imperative causes being much regarded. Nevertheless, he had worked infinite mischief on the devoted city. His bombs had destroyed the magnificent square of Belle-Cour, the arsenal, the quarter of Saint-Clair, and the gate of the Temple, and seriously damaged the fine building of the Hospital, which rises so majestically on the banks of the Rhone. The Lyonnese did not the less resist with unabated obstinacy. A report had been propagated amongst them that 50,000 Piedmontese were on the point of debouching on their town; the emigrants were profuse in their promises, without venturing, however, to share their dangers; and those honest burghers, albeit sincere republicans, were, by their false position, reduced to the wretched extremity of desiring the dangerous and disgraceful aid of emigrants and aliens. Their real feelings transpired more than once in a manner not to be mistaken. Précy having proposed to mount the white cockade, had soon been convinced that the design was premature. A paper currency having been manufactured for the exigencies of the siege, and fleurs-de-lis being interwoven on the notes, it was found necessary to destroy them and adopt a different pattern. Thus the Lyonnese were republicans; but the dread of vengeance by the convention, and the false promises of Marseilles, Bordeaux, Caen, and, above all, the emigrants, had allured them into an abyss of error and calamity.

Whilst they thus cherished the hope of shortly descrying 50,000 Sardinians from their ramparts, the convention had ordered the representatives Couthon, Maignet, and Châteauneuf-Randon, to proceed into Auvergne and the neighbouring departments, for the purpose of stimulating a general levy, and Kellermann was scouring the valleys of the Alps, confronting the Piedmontese.

An admirable opportunity here again presented itself to the Piedmontese of accomplishing a bold and grand manœuvre, which could not have failed to be successful—namely, to concentrate their principal forces on the Little Saint-Bernard, and debouch on Lyons with 50,000 men. The map acquaints us that the three valleys of Sallenche, La Tarentaise, and La Maurienne, adjacent one to the other, wind almost spirally, and that, starting from the Little Saint-Bernard, they open upon Geneva, Chambéry, Lyons, and Grenoble. Meagre French corps were scattered in these valleys. To descend rapidly by one of them, and occupy their apertures, was a certain mode, according to all the principles of strategy, to intercept the detachments engaged in the mountains and make them lay down their arms. Any attachment on the part of the Savoyards towards the French was little to be dreaded, for assignats and requisitions had as yet acquainted them with liberty only through its dilapidations and severities. The Duke of Montferrat, intrusted with the expedition, took with him but 20,000 or 25,000 men, threw a corps to his right into the valley of Sallenche, descended with his main body into La Tarentaise, and left General Gordon to traverse La Maurienne with the left wing. His movement, commenced on the 14th August, endured until September, so considerate was he in his progress. The French, although greatly inferior in number, opposed a vigorous resistance, and contrived to spin out a retreat of eighteen days. Arrived at Moustier, the Duke of Montferrat paused to connect himself with Gordon, on the chain of the Grand-Loup, which separates the two valleys of La Tarentaise and La Maurienne, and never bethought himself of striding onward to Conflans, the point of junction to the valleys. Such dilatoriness, and his inadequate force, prove rather significantly that he had no serious intention of risking himself in an excursion to Lyons.

In the mean time, Kellermann, hastening from Grenoble, had levied the national guards of the Isère and the neighbouring departments. He had reanimated the Savoyards, who began to fear the vengeance of the Piedmontese government, and succeeded in mustering an army of nearly 12,000 strong. Then, detaching a reinforcement to the corps in the valley of Sallenche, he moved upon Conflans, at the issue of the two valleys of La Tarentaise and La Maurienne. All this he had accomplished by the 10th September. At this moment, the Duke of Montferrat received an express order to march forward. But Kellermann anticipated his excellency, and ventured to attack him in the position of Espierre, which he had taken up on the chain of the Grand-Loup, in order to preserve a communication between the two valleys. Unable to reach this position in front, he caused it to be turned by a detached corps. This corps, formed of soldiers half naked, made, nevertheless, heroic efforts, and by mere muscular strength raised cannon up heights almost inaccessible. To their amazement and consternation, the French artillery suddenly thundered upon the heads of the Piedmontese; Gordon immediately withdrew into the valley of La Maurienne upon Saint-Michel, and the Duke of Montferrat wheeled back into the heart of the valley of La Tarentaise. Kellermann, continuing to goad the Duke on his flanks, quickly induced him to re-scale the ridge to Saint-Maurice and Saint-Germain, and finally drove him, by the 4th October, beyond the Alps. Thus, the rapid and successful campaign which the Piedmontese might have compassed by debouching with twice the mass, and descending by a single valley on Chambéry and Lyons, proved a mere abortion, from the same reasons which had caused the failure of all the enterprises projected by the allies, and which conduced so providentially to the salvation of France.

Whilst the Sardinians were thus repulsed beyond the Alps, the three deputies dispatched into the Puy-de-Dôme to stimulate a general levy, stirred up the country by preaching a sort of crusade, and inculcating the fact that Lyons, far from defending the republican cause, was the head-quarters of the emigrant and foreign factions. The paralytic Couthon, possessing an activity of mind which his bodily infirmities could not repress, excited a general ferment. He was enabled to detach Maignet and Châteauneuf with a first column of 12,000 men, remaining himself behind to bring up another of 25,000, and to make the necessary requisitions of supplies. Dubois-Crancé placed the new levies on the western side towards Saint-Foy, and thus completed the blockade. He received at the same time a detachment from the garrison of Valenciennes, which, according to the terms of surrender, could only, like that of Mayence, serve in the interior. He took care to station companies of regular troops in front of the requisitionary soldiers, so as to form efficient heads of columns. His army might at this time amount to 25,000 conscripts and 8000 or 10,000 disciplined troops.

At midnight of the 24th, he succeeded in carrying the redoubt commanding the bridge of Oullins, which led to the foot of the Saint-Foy heights. On the following day, General Doppet, a Savoyard, who had distinguished himself under Carteaux in the expedition against the Marseillese, arrived to replace Kellermann. That officer had been previously superseded on suspicion of lukewarmness, the short interval of command requisite to complete his discomfiture of the Piedmontese being simply continued to him. General Doppet, lost no time in making arrangements with Dubois-Crancé for an assault on the heights of Saint-Foy. All the preparations were completed for the night between the 28th and 29th September. Simultaneous attacks were to be directed on the north at the Croix-Rousse, on the east in front of the Morand bridge, and on the south by the Mulatière bridge, which stands below the city at the confluence of the Saône and Rhone. The main enterprise was to take place by the Oullins bridge on Saint-Foy. It was not commenced till five in the morning of the 29th, an hour or two after the other three. Doppet, animating his soldiers, led them precipitately on the first redoubt, and then carried them into the second, with such vivacity as to allow no time for their courage to evaporate. The Great and the Little Saint-Foy were alike carried. Meanwhile, the column ordered to attack the Mulatière bridge succeeded in storming it, and advanced into the isthmus at the point whereof the two rivers unite. It was on the verge of penetrating into Lyons, when Précy, hastening to the spot with his cavalry, encountered and repulsed it, and saved the city. On his side, Vaubois, general of artillery, who had directed a most vigorous attack on the Morand bridge, penetrated into the horse-shoe redoubt, but was eventually compelled to abandon it.

Of all these attacks, one only had completely succeeded, but the most important, that on Saint-Foy. It now remained to pass from the heights of Saint Foy to those of Fourvières, which were much more regularly intrenched and difficult to be stormed. The opinion of Dubois-Crancé, who acted systematically and on scientific principles, was against risking the chances of a fresh assault, and for the following reasons. It was ascertained that the Lyonnese, reduced to subsist on ground peas, had food for a few days only, and must speedily surrender at discretion. They had shown distinguished bravery in the defence of the Mulatière and Morand bridges; and he concluded, that should an attack on the heights of Fourvières prove unsuccessful, such a check might disorganise the army, and render it incumbent to raise the siege. "The greatest favour," said he, "we can confer on brave men driven to despair, is to afford them an opportunity of saving themselves by a conflict. Let us leave them to fall by the effect of a few days' famine."

Couthon arrived at this moment, the 2d October, with a further levy of 25,000 peasants, drawn from Auvergne. "I am coming," he wrote, "with my rocks of Auvergne, and I will hurl them into the Faubourg of Vaise." He found Dubois-Crancé amidst an army under his absolute chieftainship, wherein he had established the rules of military subordination, and more frequently appeared in his uniform of a superior officer than in the garb of a representative of the people. Couthon was dissatisfied that a representative should cast aside equality for military rank, but, above all, he utterly discountenanced regular warfare. "I understand nothing of tactics," said he; "I come with the people; their holy wrath will overcome all obstacles. Lyons must be inundated with our masses, and carried by pure force. Besides, I have promised my peasants to let them free on Monday, as they must go home and attend to their vineyards." It was now Tuesday. Dubois-Crancé, full of professional prepossessions in favour of regular troops, manifested some contempt for these ill-armed and incongruous peasants: he proposed to select the youngest amongst them, to incorporate in the battalions already organised, and to dismiss the rest. Couthon would listen to no such prudential counsels, but extorted an immediate decision that Lyons should be attacked by assault on all quarters, by the 60,000 men encamped beneath its walls; for such was now the strength of the army with the last levy. He wrote at the same time to the committee of public welfare, urging the recall of Dubois-Crancé. In the council of war the assault was fixed for the 8th October.

The recall of Dubois-Crancé and of Gauthier, his colleague, arrived in the interval. The Lyonnese entertained the utmost horror for Dubois-Crancé, whom they had beheld for two entire months desolating their beloved city, and had stated they never would surrender to him. On the 7th, Couthon addressed to them a final summons, apprising them that it was he, Couthon, and the representatives Maignet and Laporte, whom the convention had intrusted with the prosecution of the siege. The fire was suspended until four in the afternoon, when it was resumed with extreme vigour. The preparations were proceeding for the assault, when a deputation came to negotiate in the name of the Lyonnese. It appeared that the object of this negotiation was to afford Précy, and two thousand of the inhabitants chiefly compromised, time to save themselves in a serried column. They accordingly profited by the opportunity, and issued forth through the suburb of Vaise, with the intention of retiring into Switzerland.

The conferences were scarcely opened ere a republican column penetrated into the suburb of Saint-Just. There was no further occasion to grant conditions, and, moreover, the convention would allow none. On the 9th the army entered the town, the representatives marching in the van. The inhabitants had concealed themselves, but all the persecuted Mountaineers poured out to greet the victorious troops, and composed for them a species of popular triumph. General Doppet enforced upon his soldiers the strictest discipline, and left to the representatives the task of wreaking revolutionary vengeance on the unfortunate city.

Meanwhile, Précy, with his 2000 fugitives, was advancing towards Switzerland. But Dubois-Crancé, having foreseen the probability of his seeking that asylum, had long ago caused all the routes to be blocked. The disconsolate Lyonnese were pursued, dispersed, and cut down by the peasants. Of the whole number, only eighty, with their leader Précy, succeeded in reaching the Helvetian territory.

The first act of Couthon after his entry was to reinstall the old Mountaineer municipality, and charge it to seek out and denote the rebels. He constituted a popular commission to try them by martial law. He then wrote to Paris that there were three classes of inhabitants—1st, the guilty rich; 2d, the selfish rich; 3d, the ignorant operatives, attached to no cause whatever, and incapable equally of good and evil. It was necessary to guillotine the first and raise their dwellings, to amerce the second in all their wealth, and to transport the last, and replace them by a republican colony.

The reduction of Lyons produced extravagant joy at Paris, and in some degree made amends for the disastrous tidings so constant in September. However, notwithstanding the ultimate success, complaints were urged against Dubois-Crancé for his delays, and he was held responsible for the flight of the Lyonnese by the suburb of Vaise—a flight which, after all, had only saved eighty persons. Couthon accused him, especially, with having assumed an absolute command over the army; with having appeared oftener in the costume of a superior officer than in that of a representative of the people; with having manifested the pride of a tactician; and, in short, with having done all in his power to support the system of regular warfare in preference to that of attacks en masse. An inquiry was immediately commenced by the Jacobins against Dubois-Crancé, the man whose activity and vigour had rendered such essential services at Grenoble, in the south, and before Lyons itself. At the same time, the committee of public welfare digested most rigorous decrees, designed to render the authority of the convention more formidable and more implicitly obeyed. The following enactment was reported by Barrère, and passed on the instant:—

"Art. 1. There shall be nominated by the national convention, on the presentation of the committee of public welfare, a commission consisting of five representatives of the people, who shall proceed to Lyons without delay, to ensure the seizure and military trial of all the counter-revolutionists who took up arms in that city.

2. All the Lyonnese shall be disarmed; their arms shall be given to those who are ascertained to have held aloof from the revolt, and to the defenders of the country.

3. The city of Lyons shall be destroyed.

4. There shall be excepted only the houses of the poor, the factories, the workshops of art, the hospitals, the public buildings, and those of education.

5. This city shall cease to be called Lyons. It shall be called the Enfranchised Borough.

6. On the ruins of Lyons shall be reared a monument whereon these words shall be read:—Lyons made war against liberty—Lyons is no more!" *

Intelligence of the capture of Lyons was immediately communicated to the two armies of the north and of La Vendée, from which decisive operations were sanguinely anticipated; and a proclamation exhorted them to imitate the army of Lyons. The army of the north was told—"The standard of liberty waves over the walls of Lyons, and purifies them. It is the presage of victory—victory is the reward of courage. It is prepared for you: strike, exterminate the satellites of tyrants! The country fixes its eyes upon you, the convention aids your generous zeal: yet a few days, and the tyrants will be no more—the republic will owe to you its happiness and its glory!" To the soldiers of La Vendée it was said—"And you also, brave soldiers, will gain a victory. Too long has La Vendée distressed the republic: march, strike, terminate! All our enemies must succumb at once; each army is on the way to conquer. Will you be the last to reap the laurel—to merit the glory of having extirpated the rebels and saved the country?"

Thus we see the committee omitted no expedient to turn the fall of Lyons to the best advantage. That event, in fact, was of the utmost importance. It delivered the east of France from the last traces of insurrection, and extinguished the hopes of the emigrants intriguing in Switzerland, and of the Piedmontese, who could not thenceforth reckon upon any favourable diversion. It repressed the Jura, assured the rear of the army of the Rhine, and permitted the transport to Toulon and the Pyrenees of succours in men and munitions, which had become quite indispensable. Finally, it intimidated all the towns in any degree disposed to rebel, and ensured their definitive submission.

It was on the northern frontier that the committee had resolved to display the greatest vigour, and that it imposed on the generals and troops the duty of evincing the most determined energy. Whilst Custine was consigned to the scaffold, Houchard, for not having accomplished all that was possible at Dunkirk, had been sent before the revolutionary tribunal. The late reproaches addressed to the committee, in the month of September, had constrained it to remodel all the staffs. It had in consequence completely recomposed them, and raised to the highest grades officers of subaltern rank.

* Decree of the 18th day of the first month of the second year of the republic.

Houchard, a colonel at the commencement of the campaign, and before it was finished a commander-in-chief, and now accused before the revolutionary tribunal; Hoche, a simple officer at the siege of Dunkirk, and now promoted to the command of the army of the Moselle; Jourdan, leader of a battalion, then commanding the centre in the battle of Hondtschoote, and finally nominated general-in-chief of the army of the north—were striking examples of the vicissitudes of fortune in the republican armies. These sudden promotions prevented soldiers, officers, and generals, from hȧving time to know each other and reciprocate confidence; but they presented a terrible idea of that wrath which swept over all grades, not only in the case of proved treason, but simply on suspicion, for insufficiency of zeal, for a half-victory; and hence there resulted an absolute devotion on the part of the armies, and boundless hopes for genius sufficiently bold to encounter the perilous hazards of command.

It is to this period we must refer the first advancement in the art of war. Undoubtedly, the principles of that science had been known and practised at all eras by captains who joined boldness of enterprise to hardihood of mind. Very recently, indeed, Frederick the Great had given an example of most admirable combinations in strategy. But so soon as the man of genius disappears, and gives place to ordinary men, the art of war relapses into circumspection and routine. They contend eternally in defence or attack of some line, and become skilful in calculating the advantages of ground, and adapting thereto the different varieties of force; but, with all these attainments, they dispute for whole years the possession of a province which an energetic commander might gain 'in one manœuvre; and this prudence of mediocrity wastes more blood than the temerity of genius, for it immolates men without results. Thus had acted the scientific tacticians of the coalition. Each battalion they confronted with another; all the routes menaced by their enemy they scrupulously guarded; but, when by one bold march they might have suppressed the revolution, they dared not advance a step lest they should uncover their flanks. The art of war was, like other things, to be regenerated. To form a compact mass, inspire it with confidence and determination, carry it promptly beyond a river or a chain of mountains, and smite an enemy in unsuspecting security, dividing his forces, isolating him from his resources, and occupying his capital, was a grand and difficult system, which required genius of the highest order, and could only be developed amidst a revolutionary ferment.

The revolution, by calling into activity all the human energies, produced the era of vast military combinations. In the first place, it stimulated in its cause enormous masses of men, far more considerable than were ever raised in the cause of kings. Next, it aroused an impatience for extraordinary achievements, excited disgust for slow and methodical warfare, and suggested the idea of sudden and powerful irruptions upon one point. "We must fight in masses!" was the universal shout—the cry equally of the soldiers on the frontiers and of the Jacobins in the clubs. Couthon, upon his arrival at Lyons, had replied to all the arguments of Dubois-Crancé by the one aphorism: "The assault en masse is indispensable." Finally, Barrère had presented an able and comprehensive report, in which he demonstrated that the cause of the reverses lay in the system of fighting by detail. It was thus by forming masses, infusing into them the spirit of audacity, freeing them from all antiquated routine, and inspiring them with the zeal and courage of innovation, that the revolution provoked the revival of grand warfare. Such a change could not be operated without disorder. Peasants and artisans, transported to the field of battle, carried with them ignorance, want of discipline, and an aptitude for panics, the necessary consequences of imperfect organisation. The representatives who went to stir up revolutionary excitement in the camps, often required impossibilities, and committed iniquities with regard to many brave commanders. Dumouriez, Custine, Houchard, Brunet, Canclaux, Jourdan, perished or retired before the torrent; but in a month, those handicraftsmen became, from Jacobin declaimers, docile and valiant soldiers; those representatives communicated extraordinary hardihood and determination to the armies; and, by means of changes, by the force of exigency, they succeeded in finding men of commanding genius equal to the circumstances.

Eventually a man arose to regulate this great movement—Carnot. Formerly an officer of engineers, latterly a member of the convention and of the committee of public welfare, and partaking in some sort its inviolability, he was able to introduce order into operations heretofore too unconnected, without incurring the risk of the guillotine, and, above all, to impart to them a combination such as no minister before him had been sufficiently obeyed to impose. One of the chief causes of all previous discomfitures was the confusion inseparable from a state of ferment. The committee being firmly established and rendered irresistible, and Carnot being invested with all the power of that committee, obedience was yielded to the deductions of a reflective mind, which, surveying the a gate of circumstances, enjoined movements pe co-ordinate with respect to one another, and all t ing to one identical object. Generals could no longer, as Dumouriez and Custine had done formerly, act each on his own quarter, drawing to himself the whole war and monopolising all the resources. Representatives could no longer order or check manœuvres, or modify superior orders. All were henceforth constrained to bow before the supreme fiat of the committee, and conform to the comprehensive plan it prescribed. Thus planted in the centre, soaring over all the frontiers, the mind of Carnot naturally expanded in proportion to its elevation: he conceived extensive plans, wherein prudence was equally conspicuous with boldness of enterprise. The instructions sent to Houchard furnish a signal evidence of the fact. Unquestionably, his plans sometimes laboured under the defect common to all plans digested in cabinets: when his orders arrived, they were not always adapted to the locality, or practicable at the moment; but they amply redeemed by unity of purpose any deficiency in details, and secured the French, during the following year, universal triumphs.

Carnot had proceeded to the northern frontier for the purpose of conferring with Jourdan. The resolution was taken to act with hardihood, and attack the enemy, despite his formidable aspect. Carnot demanded a plan from the general, to ascertain his views and reconcile them with those of the committee, or in other words with his own. The allies, having returned from Dunkirk towards the middle of their line, had mustered between the Scheldt and the Meuse, forming at that point a redoubtable mass, capable of effecting great things. We have already explained the theatre of war. Several lines intersect the space between the Meuse and the ocean, namely, the Lys, the Scarpe, the Scheldt, and the Sambre. The allies, by the capture of Condé and Valenciennes, had secured two important posts on the Scheldt. Quesnoy, whereon they had recently seized, gave them a basis between the Scheldt and the Sambre, but they had none as yet upon the Sambre itself. They had their eyes on Maubeuge, which, from its position on that river, would render them, to a considerable extent, masters of the space between it and the Meuse. Thus, at the opening of the next campaign, Valenciennes and Maubeuge would have formed an excellent basis of operations, and their campaign of 1793 would not have been quite so fruitless as the French were fain to deem it. Their final project for the season, therefore, consisted in occupying Maubeuge

On the part of the French, amongst whom the spirit of combination was beginning to manifest itself, it was held advisable to act by Lille and Maubeuge, on the two wings of the enemy, the demonstration on his two flanks being expected to lead to the recoil of his centre. By this plan, it is true, the French were exposed to the risk of having his whole force directed against one or other of their wings, since they left him all the advantage of his mass; but there was certainly less of servile routine in the conception than in those that had been previously started. Meanwhile, the exigency of the moment was to succour Maubeuge. Jourdan, leaving scarcely 50,000 men in the camps of Gavarelle, Lille, and Cassel, to form his left wing, mustered at Guise the utmost possible strength. He had composed a mass of about 45,000 men, already organised, and the new levies accruing from the permanent requisition he threw into regimental form with all practicable speed. But those levies were in such hopeless disorder, that he found it necessary to leave detachments of regular troops to guard them. Fixing, therefore, the general rendezvous for the recruits at Guise, Jourdan advanced in five columns to the relief of Maubeuge.

The enemy had already invested that place. Like the fortresses of Valenciennes and Lille, it was supported by an intrenched camp, situated on the right bank of the Sambre, in the same direction as that by which the French were advancing. Two divisions, those of Generals Desjardins and Mayer, guarded the course of the Sambre, the one above, the other below Maubeuge. The enemy, in lieu of advancing in two grand masses, sweeping Desjardins back on Maubeuge and repelling Mayer on Charleroi, where he must have been destroyed, passed the Sambre in meagre masses, and allowed the two divisions of Desjardins and Mayer to rally in the intrenched camp of Maubeuge. It was highly expedient to have separated Desjardins from Jourdan, and have thus prevented him from swelling the active army of the French; but by leaving Mayer to unite with Desjardins, both generals were permitted to form under Maubeuge with a corps of 20,000 men, well capable of foregoing the part of a mere garrison, especially on the approach of Jourdan with the main army. At the same time, the difficulty of victualling so numerous a body was a serious drawback on Maubeuge, and might, to a certain extent, excuse the allied generals for suffering the junction.

The Prince of Cobourg planted the Dutch, numbering 12,000, on the left bank of the Meuse, and applied himself to burn the magazines of Maubeuge with the view of augmenting the scarcity. He pushed General Colloredo to the right bank, and ordered him to invest the intrenched camp. In advance of Colloredo, Clairfayt, with three divisions, formed the corps of observation intended to oppose the march of Jourdan. The allies counted nearly 65,000 men.

With a moderate share of hardihood and genius, the Prince of Cobourg would have left at the utmost 15,000 or 20,000 men to overawe Maubeuge, and marched with 45,000 or 50,000 upon General Jourdan, whom he must have infallibly defeated; for, with the advantage of the offensive and of equal numbers, his troops could not fail to prevail over the French in their deficient organisation. Instead of adopting this plan, however, the Prince of Cobourg left about 35,000 men around the fortress, and remained in observation with about 30,000 in the positions of Dourlers and Watignies.

In this state of things, it was not impossible for General Jourdan to have pierced on one point the line occupied by the corps of observation, marched on Colloredo, who was prosecuting the investment of the intrenched camp, placed him between two fires, and, after overwhelming him, incorporated the entire army of Maubeuge, formed with it a mass of 60,000 men, and repulsed the whole allied force on the right bank of the Sambre. For this purpose, it was incumbent on him to make an undivided attack on Watignies as the weakest point; but by advancing exclusively in that direction, the French left open the Avesnes road leading to Guise, which was their base and the point of junction for all their depôts. Jourdan preferred a more prudential but less conclusive plan, and resolved to attack the corps of observation on four points, so as still to guard the road to Avesnes and Guise. On his left, he detached the division under Fromentin upon Saint-Waast, with orders to march between the Sambre and the right of the enemy. General Balland, with several batteries, was to plant himself in the centre, facing Dourlers, to keep Clairfayt in check by a vigorous cannonade. To the right, General Duquesnoy advanced upon Watignies, which formed the left of the enemy, a little in the rear of the central position of Dourlers. That point was held by but a feeble corps. A fourth division, that of General Beauregard, stationed still farther to the right, was appointed to second Duquesnoy in his attack on Watignies. These different movements were but slenderly combined, and did not bear upon decisive points. They were put in execution on the morning of the 15th October. General Fromentin occupied Saint-Waast; but not having taken the precaution to near the woods so as to shelter himself from a charge of cavalry, he was assailed and driven back into the ravine of Saint-Remy. In the centre, where Fromentin was deemed to be master of Saint-Waast, and where it was known that the right had succeeded in approaching Watignies, a resolution was taken to move forward, and, instead of merely cannonading Dourlers, to carry it by storm. It appears that this was the counsel of Carnot, who decided the attack in spite of General Jourdan. The French infantry rushed into the ravine which separated it from Dourlers, clambered up the reverse bank under a galling fire, and arrived on a level where it had in front formidable batteries and in flank a numerous cavalry ready to charge. At the same moment, a fresh corps, which had just contributed to put Fromentin to rout, threatened to envelop it on the left. General Jourdan incurred the greatest hazards to maintain the division, but it swerved, fell back with disorder into the ravine, and by great good fortune was allowed to resume its positions without being pursued. In this enterprise the French lost nearly 1000 men, and on the left Fromentin lost his artillery. General Duquesnoy on the right had alone succeeded, by contriving to approach Watignies.

After this attempt, the position became better understood by the French. They were convinced that Dourlers was too strongly defended to direct the principal attack on that point; but that Watignies, inadequately guarded by General Tercy, and situated to the rear of Dourlers, was easily to be carried; and that this village once occupied by the main strength of the army, the position of Dourlers would necessarily fall. Jourdan therefore detached 6000 or 7000 men to his right, in order to reinforce General Duquesnoy; he ordered General Beauregard, who was too far off with his fourth column, to wheel about from Eule upon Obrechies, so as to effect a concentric operation upon Watignies, in conjunction with General Duquesnoy; but he persisted in continuing his demonstration upon the centre, and in enjoining Fromentin to resume the movement on the left, for the purpose of embracing the whole of the enemy's front.

The next day, the 16th, the attack commenced. The French infantry, debouching by the three villages of Dinant, Demichaux, and Choisy, advanced on Watignies. The Austrian grenadiers, who connected Watignies with Dourlers, were forced back into the woods. The hostile cavalry was kept in check by light artillery appositely disposed, and Watignies was carried. General Beauregard, less fortunate, was surprised by a brigade which the Austrians had detached against him. His troops, exaggerating the strength of the enemy, broke rank and ceded a portion of the ground. At Dourlers and Saint-Waast, each party had held the other at bay; but Watignies was occupied, and the essential manœuvre accomplished. To ensure its possession, Jourdan again reinforced his right with 5000 or 6000 men. Cobourg, too readily startled at danger, retreated, notwithstanding the success obtained over Beauregard and the arrival of the Duke of York, who came by forced marches from the opposite side of the Sambre. It is probable that the apprehension of seeing the French army effect a junction with the 20,000 men in the intrenched camp, scared him from persisting in his occupation of the right bank of the Sambre. There is little doubt that if the army of Maubeuge, on the signal of the firing at Watignies, had attacked the investing corps, and sallied forth towards Jourdan, the allies might have been overwhelmed. The soldiers demanded to be led on with loud cries; but General Ferrand opposed the attempt, and General Chancel, who was erroneously deemed guilty of this refusal, was sent before the revolutionary tribunal. The successful attack on Watignies caused the siege of Maubeuge to be raised: it was called the victory of Watignies, and produced a very powerful impression on the public mind.

The allies were thus, after these operations, concentrated between the Scheldt and the Sambre. The committee of public welfare was eager to take instant advantage of the victory of Watignies whilst the discouragement it had thrown upon the enemy and the energy it had aroused in its own army were still rife; and it resolved to hazard a final effort, calculated, before the winter set in, to hurl the allies beyond the French soil, and leave them with the disheartening conviction of having made a completely abortive campaign. The opinions of Jourdan and Carnot were not in harmony with the ideas of the committee. They held that the rains, already abundant, the broken state of the roads, and the fatigue of the troops, were sufficient reasons for entering into winter-quarters; and they recommended that the bad season should be devoted to disciplining and organising the army. However, the committee insisted upon having the territory cleared, declaring that at this period of the year even a defeat could be attended with no important consequences. In accordance with the newly conceived idea of acting upon the wings, the committee ordained the troops to march by Maubeuge and Charleroi on one side, by Cysaing, Maulde, and Tournay on the other, and thus envelop the enemy on the land he had overrun. The ordinance was signed on the 22d October. Orders were issued in conformity; the army of Ardennes was to join Jourdan, and the garrisons in the strongholds were to be drawn out, and replaced by the new requisitions. We revert, meanwhile, to another quarter.

The war of La Vendée had been resumed with unabated ardour. We have seen that Canclaux had recoiled upon Nantes, and that the columns of the Upper Vendee had returned to Angers and Saumur. Before the new decrees which amalgamated the two armies of Rochelle and Brest, and conferred the supreme command on Léchelle, were known, Canclaux had arranged a fresh offensive movement. The soldiers known as the Mayencers were already reduced, by war and sickness, to 9000 or 10,000. The division of Brest, repulsed under the auspices of Beysser, was almost disorganised. Canclaux determined, nevertheless, upon a bold advance into the heart of La Vendée, and he conjured Rossignol to support him with his army. Rossignol forthwith assembled a council of war at Saumur on the 2d October, and procured a decision that the columns of Saumur, Thouars, and La Châtaigneraye, should unite on the 7th at Bressuire, and thence march to Châtillon, so that their inroad might be co-ordinate with that of Canclaux. At the same time, he ordered the two columns of Luçon and Sables to keep on the defensive, both on account of their recent discomfitures, and of the dangers threatening them from Lower Vendée.

In the interim, Canclaux had advanced on the 1st October to Montaigu, pushing reconnoitring parties as far as Saint-Fulgent, with the design of communicating on his right with the column of Luçon, in case it should compass the resumption of the offensive. Emboldened by the success of his march, he ordered the advanced guard, still under the command of Kléber, to push on to Tiffauges. Four thousand Mayencers encountered the army of D'Elbée and Bonchamps at Saint-Simphorien, put it to flight after a sanguinary conflict, and pursued it a considerable distance. During the same evening arrived the decree superseding Canclaux, Aubert-Dubayet, and Grouchy. The utmost discontent was manifested by the cohort of Mayence, and Philippeaux, Gillot, Merlin, and Rewbel, seeing the army deprived of an excellent general when exposed to imminent hazards in the centre of La Vendée, were highly incensed at so inopportune an ordinance. The measure itself, concentrating the entire command of the west in one person, was unquestionably beneficial; but some individual more competent to sustain the charge ought to have been selected. Léchelle was both ignorant and pusillanimous Kléber avers in his memoirs, and never once confronted a ball. A subaltern in the army of Rochelle, he underwent a rapid advancement, like Rossignol, on the credit of a high reputation for patriotism; but it was unknown that, devoid equally of Rossignol's natural talents and of his personal courage, his incapacity as a general was rivalled by his cowardice as a soldier. Whilst awaiting his arrival, Kléber held the command. The army remained in cantonments between Montaigu and Tiffauges.

Léchelle arrived on the 8th October, and a council of war was immediately held in his presence. Intelligence had just been brought of the march of the Saumur, Thouars, and La Châtaigneraye columns on Bressuire, whereupon it was resolved to persist in advancing upon Chollet, where a junction might be operated with the three columns assembled at Bressuire; and at the same time orders were signed to the remainder of the Luçon division to move towards the general rendezvous. Léchelle was incompetent to appreciate the reasonings of the generals, and signified his approval of their recommendations by saying—"We must march with majesty and in mass." Kléber folded up his map with ill-dissembled scorn. Merlin declared that ingenuity had been taxed to pick out the most ignorant of living mortals to take charge of the most endangered army. From this moment, Kléber was empowered by the representatives to direct the operations, contenting himself with the formality of rendering accounts to Léchelle from time to time. That prudential personage profited by the arrangement to keep between himself and the field of battle a considerate interval. Shrinking from exposure to danger, he cordially hated the valiant men who fought in his behalf, but at all events left them to fight when and where they pleased.

At this period, Charette, perceiving the dangers which threatened the chiefs of Upper Vendée, separated from them, alleging feigned grounds of discontent, and retired to the coast with the design of seizing upon the isle of Noirmoutiers. He became master of it, in fact, on the 12th October, by surprise, and by treachery on the part of the officer in command. He thus made sure of saving his own division, and of maintaining a communication with the English; but he left the party in Upper Vendée exposed to almost inevitable destruction. For behoof of the common cause, a more beneficial course was open to him: he might have attacked the cohort of Mayence in the rear, and possibly destroyed it. The leaders of the main army sent letter upon letter, urging him to the attempt, but they never received any answer.

Those unfortunate chiefs of Upper Vendée were closely pressed on all sides. The republican columns appointed to assemble at Bressuire had appeared on the prescribed day, and marched on the 9th from Bressuire upon Châtillon. On the road they encountered the army of M. de Lescure, and threw it into disorder. Westermann, reinstated in his command, was always at the head of the advanced guard with a few hundred resolute men. He entered Châtillon on the evening of the 9th. The whole army reached it the following day. During this movement, Lescure and Larochejacquelein had called to their aid the main Vendéan army, which was at no great distance from them; for, already much cooped up in the centre of the country, they fought at comparatively short intervening spaces. All the leaders, in solemn conclave, resolved to bear down upon Châtillon. They were in motion on the 11th. Westermann was already advancing from Châtillon on Mortagne, with 500 men of the advanced guard. At first he had no suspicion an entire army was on his hands, and asked from his superior in command but slight aid. But suddenly perceiving himself on the point of being enveloped, he was fain to beat a rapid retreat, and scampered into Châtillon with his whole troop. The greatest disorder instantly prevailed through the town, and the republican army abandoned it with precipitation. Westermann, joining the general-in-chief Chalbos, and calling around him a few intrepid soldiers, checked the flight, and even moved back to the immediate vicinity of Châtillon. At nightfall he said to some of his companions who had fled—"You have lost your honour to-day; it must be recovered." Thereupon he took a hundred troopers, seated a hundred grenadiers behind them, and in the dead of night, when the Vendéans, heaped confusedly in Châtillon, were stupified by sleep or wine, had the hardihood to enter the town and rush into the midst of an immense army in its cantonments. The confusion that ensued baffles description, and the carnage was terrific. The Vendéans, unable to recognise their comrades, fell foul of one another; and amidst the horrible disorder, women, children, and old men, were slaughtered indiscriminately. Westermann retired at the dawn of day with the thirty or forty soldiers who survived, and rejoined the bulk of the army a league from the town. With daylight a most dismal spectacle met the eyes of the Vendéans; horror-struck, they forthwith evacuated Châtillon, swimming with blood and enveloped in flames, and shrunk away in the direction of Chollet, precisely where the Mayencers were prowling. Chalbos, after re-establishing order in his division, re-occupied Châtillon on the 14th, and prepared again to move forward, with the view of accomplishing the desired junction with the army of Nantes.

The Vendéan leaders, therefore, D'Elbée, Bonchamps, Lescure, and Larochejacquelein, were now assembled with all their forces in the environs of Chollet. The Mayencers, who had begun to move on the 14th, were approaching that point; the column of Châtillon was only at a short distance; and the division of Luçon, which had been summoned, was likewise advancing, with orders to plant itself between the columns of Mayence and Châtillon. Thus, the moment of general junction was at hand. On the 15th the cohort of Mayence marched in two bodies to Mortagne, which had just been evacuated. Kléber, with the main army, formed the left, and Beaupuy the right. At the same moment the column of Luçon neared Mortagne, expecting to find a direction-battalion which Léchelle had been intrusted to station on its route. But that general, who was a mere incumbrance, had failed to acquit himself even of this trifling duty. The column was speedily surprised by Lescure, and found itself beset on all sides. Fortunately, Beaupuy, who was within a short distance by his position towards Mortagne, hastened to its relief, and succeeded in disengaging it. The Vendéans were finally repulsed. The ill-fated Lescure received a ball above the eyebrow, and fell into the arms of his soldiers, who bore him off the field and took to flight. The column of Luçon then joined that of Beaupuy. The youthful Marceau had just assumed the command of it. At the same time, Kléber sustained a contest on the left towards Saint-Christophe, and repulsed the enemy. On the evening of the 15th, all the republican troops bivouacked in the fields before Chollet, whither the Vendéans had retreated. The division of Luçon was about 3000 strong, making, with the cohort of Mayence, between 12,000 and 13,000 veteran troops.

The following morning, the 16th, the Vendéans, after a few rounds of artillery, evacuated Chollet, and fell back on Beaupréau. Kléber forthwith effected an entrance, and, prohibiting pillage under pain of death, enforced the observance of strict order. The column of Luçon manifested the same forbearance at Mortagne. Consequently, all the historians who have stated that Chollet and Mortagne were burnt, have laboured under error or propagated a falsehood.

Kléber lost no time in making his dispositions, for as to Léchelle, he was two leagues behind. The river Moine passes before Chollet; beyond is a hilly, unequal surface, forming a semicircle of heights. To the left of this semicircle stretches the wood of Chollet; in the centre of Chollet itself, and to the right, stands a lofty castle. Kléber placed Beaupuy, with the advanced guard, in front of the wood; Haxo, with the reserve of the Mayencers, behind the advanced guard, and in a manner to support it; and he stationed the column of Luçon, commanded by Marceau, in the centre, and Vimeux, with the remainder of the Mayencers, to the right, upon the heights. The column of Châtillon arrived in the night between the 16th and 17th. It amounted to between 9000 and 10,000 men, which rendered the total strength of the republicans about 22,000. On the morning of the 17th a council of war was held. Kléber disliked his position in front of Chollet, because it possessed but one point of retreat, the bridge over the Moine leading to the town. He advocated a march forward, with the view of turning Beaupréau and intercepting the Vendéans from the Loire. The representatives controverted his counsel, because the column just arrived from Châtillon required a day's repose.

In the mean time the Vendéan chiefs deliberated at Beaupréau, amidst a scene of distressing confusion. The peasants had collected around them their wives, children, and flocks, and composed an emigrant population of more than one hundred thousand souls. Larochejacquelein and D'Elbée upheld the plan of selling their lives on their own side the river; but Talmont and D'Autichamp, who had great influence in Brittany, impatiently urged the passage to the opposite shore. Bonchamps, who beheld a great enterprise in prospective by making an excursion on the northern coasts, and who had, it is understood, a project in concert with England, gave his voice for crossing the Loire. Nevertheless, he was sufficiently inclined to attempt a last effort, and wage one desperate struggle before Chollet. He sent a detachment of 4000 men to Varades, before moving to battle, in order to ensure a passage over the Loire in the event of discomfiture.

A battle was accordingly resolved upon. The Vendéans advanced, to the number of 40,000 men, upon Chollet, an hour after mid-day of the 18th October. The republican generals had no expectation of being attacked, and had just proclaimed a day of rest. The Vendéans were gathered into three columns—the first confronting the left of the republicans, where Beaupuy and Haxo exercised command; the second directed on the centre, held by Marceau; and the third on the right, confided to Vimeux. The Vendéans marched in line and rank like regular troops. All the wounded chiefs who could support the motion of a horse appeared in the midst of their peasants, and encouraged them on a day which was to decide their future fate and the possession of their homes. Between Beaupreau and the Loire, in every hamlet still remaining to them, mass was solemnised, and Heaven earnestly supplicated in behalf of their tottering cause.

The Vendéans moved forward and engaged the advanced guard of Beaupuy, planted, as already mentioned, in a plain before the wood of Chollet. Part of them advanced in close column, and charged in the manner of regular troops; others spread out as sharpshooters to turn the advanced guard, and even the left wing, by penetrating into the wood of Chollet. The republicans, overwhelmed by superior numbers, were forced to recoil; Beaupuy had two horses killed under him; he fell entangled in his stirrup, and was on the point of being taken, when he threw himself behind an ammunition-waggon, caught a third horse, and galloped off to his column. At this moment, Kléber hastened to the threatened wing. He ordered the centre and right not to weaken themselves, and directed Chalbos to bring one of his columns out of Chollet and speed to the aid of the left. He himself took up his station near Haxo, re-established confidence in his battalions, and led again into the thickest of the fire those who had fallen back upon the first onslaught. The Vendéans were repulsed in their turn, recovered, and repeated their desperate charge, and were again repulsed. Meanwhile the battle raged with equal fury in the centre and on the right. Vimeux, however, was so admirably stationed on the right that all the efforts of the enemy were fruitless in that direction.

But in the centre the Vendéans made greater progress than on the two wings, and penetrated into the hollow where Marceau was planted. Kléber flew thither to support the column of Luçon, and, at that very instant, one of Chalbos's divisions, which he had earlier summoned, issued out of Chollet to the number of 4000 men. This reinforcement was of essential importance at so critical a conjuncture; but, at sight of the plain enveloped in smoke and flame, that division, wretchedly organised like all those in the army of Rochelle, disbanded and ran back in disorder into Chollet. Kléber and Marceau remained in the centre with the single column of Luçon. Young Marceau, who commanded it, was not intimidated; he allowed the enemy to come within musket-shot, then suddenly unmasked his artillery, and, by so unexpected a fire, checked and swept down the Vendéans. They stood their ground for some time, rallying and closing rank under a dreadful shower of grape; but shortly they recoiled, and finally fled in disorder. At this moment their rout was general in the centre, on the left, and on the right. Beaupuy, with his reanimated advanced guard, pursued them with remorseless vigour.

The columns which had taken part in the battle were those of Mayence and Luçon alone. Thus 13,000 men had defeated 40,000. On both sides the greatest valour had been displayed; but regularity and discipline decided the advantage in favour of the republicans. Marceau, Beaupuy, and Merlin, who pointed the guns in person, had shown the utmost heroism, and Kléber had exhibited his usual judgment and promptitude on the field of battle. On the part of the Vendéans, D'Elbée and Bonchamps, after many feats of intrepidity, had been mortally wounded; Larochejacquelein then remained alone of all the chiefs, and he had omitted nothing to win participation in their glorious fate. The battle lasted from two until six o'clock.

Darkness had already fallen on the scene of carnage. The Vendéans fled with all speed, throwing away on the roads their heavy clogs. Beaupuy followed closely at their heels. To him was added Westermann, who, burning to escape the inaction of Chalbos's troops, had taken a regiment of cavalry, and hastened at full gallop after the fugitives. After keeping up the pursuit for a considerable distance, Beaupuy and Westermann halted and took counsel how they should refresh their soldiers "We shall find more bread at Beaupréau than at Chollet," said some; and they were actually rash enough to march on Beaupréau, where it was concluded by all that the Vendéans had retired in a mass. But the flight had been so rapid that one portion of them was already at Saint-Florent, on the edge of the Loire. The remainder, on the approach of the republicans, evacuated Beaupréau in disorder, and surrendered without a struggle a post they might have easily defended.

The following morning the whole army marched from Chollet to Beaupréau. Beaupuy's advanced guard, stationed on the road to Saint-Florent, suddenly perceived a multitude of individuals drawing near, uttering shouts of "The republic for ever! Bonchamps for ever!" Being interrogated, they replied by proclaiming Bonchamps their liberator. In fact, that young hero, stretched on a mattrass and about to expire from a shot in the abdomen, had demanded and obtained the lives of four thousand prisoners, whom the Vendéans dragged along with them, and whom they had destined to be shot. These prisoners now rejoined the republican army.

At this moment eighty thousand persons, comprising women, children, old men, and warriors, were congregated on the edge of the Loire, with the sad relics of their possessions, and struggling amongst themselves for the occupancy of some twenty boats to cross to the opposite side. The superior council, composed of the leaders still capable of expressing an opinion, deliberated whether they ought to separate or carry the war into Brittany. Some were desirous that they should disperse and seek concealment in La Vendée to await happier times: Larochejacquelein was of the number, and he held, moreover, they ought to die on the left bank of the Loire rather than pass to the right shore. However, the contrary opinion prevailed, and it was decided to keep together and move across the river. But Bonchamps had just breathed his last, and no one survived capable of accomplishing the projects he had formed with regard to Brittany. D'Elbée, in a dying state, had been sent to Noirmoutiers; Lescure, mortally wounded, was transported in a litter. Eighty thousand people, then, quitted their homes, to carry devastation into neighbouring lands, and there to perish—for what object? Just Heaven! for an absurd cause, forsaken on all sides, or at the most hypocritically defended! And at the very time this unfortunate population was thus generously exposing itself to so many evils, the allies scarcely bestowed a thought upon it; the emigrants were busy intriguing in the different courts, only a few amongst them fighting courageously on the Rhine, but in the ranks of the foreigner; and none had cared to send a soldier or a coin to that ill-fated La Vendée, renowned for numerous heroic achievements, and now vanquished, fugitive, and desolated.

The republican generals held a council at Beaupréau, wherein it was resolved to divide, one party proceeding to Nantes and the other to Angers, in order to shield those two towns from the danger of a sudden assault. According to this opinion of the representatives, not shared however by Kléber, La Vendée was utterly prostrated. "La Vendée has ceased to be," they wrote to the convention. That assembly had given the army till the 20th October to conclude the war, and it was terminated on the 18th. The army of the north had on the same day gained the battle of Watignies, and finished the campaign by raising the blockade of Maubeuge. Thus, on all sides, the convention apparently had but to decree victory to ensure it. Enthusiasm was at its height in Paris and throughout France, and the belief began to prevail that before the end of the season the republic would be victorious over all the thrones leagued against it.

One event only was calculated to mar this general joy, namely, the loss of the lines of Weissembourg on the Rhine, which had been forced on the 13th and 14th of October. After the check of Pirmasens, we left the Prussians and Austrians confronting the lines of the Sarre and the Lauter, and threatening every instant to storm them. The Prussians, having assailed the French on the banks of the Sarre, obliged them to fall back. The corps of the Vosges, repulsed beyond Hornbach, recoiled as far as Bitche, in the centre of the mountains; the army of the Moselle, thrown back on Sarreguemines, was separated from the corps of the Vosges and the army of the Rhine. In this state of affairs, it became easy for the Prussians, who had on the western ridge passed the common line of the Sarre and the Lauter, to turn the lines of Weissembourg on their extreme left. Thereupon those lines were necessarily doomed to fall. The event accordingly came to pass on the 13th October.

We have previously remarked that a coolness had arisen between Prussia and Austria; this had now given way to perfect cordiality. The King of Prussia had repaired to Poland, and left the command to the Duke of Brunswick, with orders to act in concert with Wurmser. On the 13th and 14th October, whilst the Prussians were marching along the line of the Vosges to Bitche, far beyond the eminence of Weissembourg, Wurmser moved to attack the lines of the Lauter in seven columns. The first, under the Prince of Waldeck, being ordered to cross the Rhine at Seltz and turn Lauterbourg, encountered invincible obstacles, as well in the nature of the ground as in the courage of a demi-battalion from the Pyrenees; the second, although it had cleared the lines below Lauterbourg, was repulsed; the others, after obtaining above and around Weissembourg advantages long counterpoised by a determined resistance on the part of the French, finally succeeded in occupying Weissembourg. The French retired to the post of Geisberg, situated a little in the rear of Weissembourg, and much more difficult to storm. Thus, the lines of Weissembourg could not yet be regarded as completely lost; but the tidings of the march of the Prussians on the western ridge obliged the French general to fall back on Haguenau and the lines of the Lauter, and consequently to yield a fragment of the Gallic soil to the allies. On this point, therefore, the frontier was invaded; but the successes in the north and La Vendée relieved the impression caused by so untoward a catastrophe. Saint-Just and Lebas were forthwith dispatched into Alsace to repress the movements which the Alsacian nobility and the emigrants were exciting in Strasburg. Numerous levies were likewise directed upon the same quarter; and the firm resolution to conquer, on that point as on all others, sufficed to calm public apprehension.

The dismal alarm that had prevailed during the month of August, before the victories of Hondtschoote and Watignies, before the reduction of Lyons and the retreat of the Piedmontese beyond the Alps, and before the successes in La Vendée, was greatly dissipated. At this moment, the frontier of the north, the most important and the most endangered, was delivered from the enemy, Lyons restored to the republic, La Vendee subjected, and all rebellion quelled in the interior, even to the frontier of Italy, where the seaport of Toulon still resisted, it is true, but resisted alone. One more advantage at the foot of the Pyrenees, at Toulon, and on the Rhine, and the republic was completely victorious; nor did this threefold success seem more difficult of accomplishment than those already secured. Undoubtedly, the mighty task was not fully perfected, but it might soon become so by a continuation of the same exertions, by a further development of the same resources; and though complete confidence was not yet re-established in the public apprehension, the dread of almost inevitable destruction had gradually subsided.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

PROSCRIPTIONS AT LYONS, MARSEILLES, AND BORDEAUX.—EXECUTION OF MARIE-ANTOINETTE, THE GIRONDISTS, THE DUKE OF ORLEANS, BAILLY, AND MADAME ROLAND.—INSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLICAN CALENDAR AND THE WORSHIP OF REASON.

The revolutionary measures adopted for the safety of France were executed throughout its confines with inexorable rigour. Imagined by men of most ardent temperaments, they were in principle sufficiently violent; but enforced at a distance from the leaders who had originated them, and by inferior instruments, whose blinder passions were so much the more brutal, in application they became additionally violent. A large portion of the citizens was compelled to quit home and pursuits; another portion was immured under the title of "suspected;" stores of food and merchandise were forcibly abstracted for the necessities of the armies; compulsory labour was imposed to accelerate transit; and in remuneration of articles confiscated or services extorted were given assignats only, or a credit upon the commonwealth, which was regarded as valueless. The assessment of the forced loan was despotically prosecuted; the surveyors of the communes said to one—"You have an income of ten thousand livres;" to another—"You have twenty thousand;" and all, without the privilege of remonstrance, were obliged to furnish the sum demanded. Pitiable vexations resulted from a system so purely arbitrary; but the armies at the same time were supplied with men, abundant stores were transported to the depôts, and the thousand million of assignats appointed to be withdrawn from the circulation were gradually falling into the exchequer. Operations so rapidly completed, the salvation of a state in such imminent hazard, necessarily involved a large amount of individual calamity.

In all the localities where pressing danger had required the presence of the conventional commissioners, the revolutionary measures had taken the most inexorable character. Near the frontiers and in the departments suspected of royalism or federalism, those commissioners had levied the population in a general mass; they had placed all things under requisition, and smitten the rich with revolutionary taxes beyond the general imposition resulting from the forced loan; they had accelerated the incarceration of the suspected, and sometimes, indeed, had consigned those forlorn individuals to revolutionary tribunals instituted upon their own fiat. Laplanche, envoy in the department of Le Cher, addressed the Jacobin Club in the following strain:—

"I have every where inscribed terror as the order of the day; I have every where imposed contributions on the rich and the aristocrats. Orleans has furnished me fifty thousand livres; and two days sufficed me at Bourges for a levy of two millions. Unable to be at all points, my delegates have made amends; an individual, named Mamin, worth seven millions, and assessed by one of them at forty thousand livres, complained to the convention, which approved my conduct; and if he had been taxed by me in person, he should have paid two millions. At Orleans I made my agents render a public account; it was in the bosom of the popular society they acquitted themselves of the task, and their account was sanctioned by the people. I have every where caused the bells to be melted, and have joined several parishes together. I have cashiered all federalists, immured all suspected, and put the sans-culottes in force. Priests had all their conveniences in the houses of seclusion; the sans-culottes slept on straw in the jails: the first have furnished me with mattrasses for the latter. In all directions I have made the priests marry. I have every where electrified hearts and minds. I have organised manufactures of arms, and inspected the workshops, the hospitals, and the prisons. I have dispatched several battalions of the general levy. I have reviewed many of the national guards, in order to republicanise them, and I have guillotined divers royalists.. In short, I have carried out my imperative mandate. I have throughout acted as a zealous Mountaineer, as a revolutionary representative."

It was more especially in the three principal federalist cities, Lyons, Marseilles, and Bordeaux, that the commissioners had impressed the deepest terror. The avenging decree fulminated against Lyons ordained that the rebels and their accomplices should be tried by a commission according to martial law, that the sans-culottes should be maintained at the cost of the aristocrats, that the dwellings of the rich should be destroyed, and that the name of the town should be changed. The execution of that decree was intrusted to Collot d'Herbois, Maribon-Montaut, and Fouché of Nantes.* These men had proceeded to the "Enfranchised Borough," taking with them forty Jacobins, for the purpose of organising a new club and properly inculcating the principles of the parent society. Ronsin had followed them with 2000 men of the revolutionary army, and they had immediately afterwards entered upon their revolting functions. The representatives gave the first blow with a hammer on the houses doomed to demolishment, and 800 workmen forthwith commenced to pull down some of the finest streets in the town. The proscriptions began at the same time. The Lyonnese suspected of having borne arms were guillotined or shot, to the number of fifty and sixty daily. The wretched inhabitants were plunged in terror; but the commissioners sent to punish them, rendered savage and frantic by multitudinous slaughter, believing at every shriek they heard that rebellion was again reviving, wrote to the convention that the aristocrats were not yet reduced; that they were merely awaiting an opportunity for resuming their plans; and that it was necessary, to avoid all further ground of apprehension, to transplant one part of the population and exterminate the other. As the means put in vogue were not held to be sufficiently rapid, Collot-d'Herbois conceived the idea of employing mines to destroy the buildings and grape-shot to dispatch the proscribed; and he wrote to the convention that he was preparing to make speedy use of means more prompt and more efficacious to chastise the refractory city.

At Marseilles, several victims had already fallen. But the wrath of the representatives was chiefly directed against Toulon, the siege whereof they were at this period prosecuting.

In the Gironde, vengeance was wreaked with unbridled fury. Isabeau and Tallien had planted themselves at Réole, where they were occupied in forming the nucleus of a revolutionary army wherewith to enter Bordeaux, and, in the interim, they attempted to disorganise the sections of that town. For that purpose, they made use of a section of pure Mountaineer principles, which, eventually contriving to frighten all the others, had successively broken up the federalist club and superseded the departmental authorities. Thereupon the deputies had made a triumphal entry into Bordeaux, and forthwith re-established the Mountaineer municipality and authorities. As a corollary to that proceeding, they issued an ordinance importing that the government of Bordeaux should be military, all the inhabitants disarmed, a special commission named to try federalists and aristocrats, and an extraordinary tax immediately levied upon the rich to defray the expenses of the revolutionary army. This ordinance was put in execution without a moment's delay; the citizens were disarmed, and a multitude of heads struck off.

It was at this very moment that the fugitive deputies, who had embarked in Brittany for the department of the Gironde, arrived at Bordeaux. They all proceeded to seek an asylum in the residence of a female relative of Guadet, in the grotto of Saint-Emilion. An indistinct rumour was circulated that they were concealed in that quarter, and Tallien made indefatigable efforts to discover them. In this design he had been hitherto unsuccessful, but he unfortunately contrived to seize Biroteau, who had fled from Lyons with the view of embarking at Bordeaux. That deputy had been already declared out of the pale of the law. Tallien therefore contented himself with proving his identity, and then consigned him to the guillotine. Duchâtel was likewise discovered; but as he had not been outlawed, he was transferred to Paris to be tried by the revolutionary tribunal. He was accompanied by the three friends, Riouffe, Girey-Dupré, and Marchenna, who had, as we have previously recorded, zealously attached themselves to the fortune of the Girondists.

Thus all the chief cities of France were visited with the implacable vengeance of the Mountain. But Paris, crowded with the most illustrious victims, was soon to become the scene of yet more appalling cruelties.

Whilst preparations were in progress for the trial of Marie-Antoinette, late Queen of France, of the Girondists, the Duke of Orleans, Bailly, and a long list of generals and ministers, the prisons were filled with the suspected. The commune of Paris had arrogated, as we have already stated, a species of legislative authority over the various matters of police, food, commerce, religion; and to each decree of the convention it appended an explanatory ordinance, extending or limiting its objects. At the instance of Chaumette, for example, it had given the definition of the term "suspected," as laid down in the law of the 17th September, a singularly free interpretation. In a municipal instruction, Chaumette enumerated the characters to whom it ought to be applied. This instruction, addressed to the sections of Paris, and soon afterwards to all the sections in the republic, was conceived in these terms:—

"To be considered as suspected are—1st, Those who, in the assemblies of the people, check energy by laboured discourses, or turbulent cries and menaces: 2d, Those who, more cunning, speak mysteriously of the calamities of the republic, deplore the fate of the people, and are always ready to communicate unfortunate tidings with affected grief: 3d, Those who have shaped their conduct and language according to events; who, mute as to the crimes of royalists and federalists, declaim with warmth against the trifling faults of patriots, and affect, in order to seem republicans, an austerity of manners, a studied severity, and move quickly away when any thing is said of a moderate or an aristocrat: 4th, Those who pity farmers and rapacious traders, against whom the law is obliged to enforce certain measures: 5th, Those who, having the words liberty, republic, and country perpetually on their lips, visit the late nobles, priests, counter-revolutionists, aristocrats, Feuillants, moderates, and interest themselves in their fate: 6th, Those who have taken no active part in all that chiefly concerns the revolution, and who, to exculpate themselves, boast of the payment of their contributions, of their patriotic gifts, and of their services in the national guard, as a set-off or otherwise: 7th, Those who received the republican constitution with indifference, and have participated in fraudulent fears touching its establishment and durability: 8th, Those who, having done nothing against liberty, have at the same time done nothing for it: 9th, Those who do not frequent their sections, and allege as an excuse that they are unaccustomed to public speaking, or that their affairs prevent them: 10th, Those who talk contemptuously of the constituted authorities, of the manifestations of the law, of the popular societies, and of the defenders of liberty: 11th. Those who have signed counter-revolutionary petitions, or attended anti-civic clubs and societies: 12th, Those who are known to have been insincere, and partisans of Lafayette; and those who marched to the charge on the Champ de Mars."

Under such a sweeping definition, the number of the suspected might be swelled to an unlimited extent; and accordingly we find that, in the prisons of Paris alone, it speedily rose from a few hundreds to three thousand. At first they were thrust into La Mairie, La Force, La Conciergerie, the Abbey, Sainte-Pelagie, the Madelonnettes, and all the ordinary state prisons; but those spacious receptacles becoming inadequate to the demand, it was determined to establish additional places of arrest, specifically appropriated to political offenders. The expenses of detention being borne by the prisoners, houses were hired on their account. One was selected in the street D'Enfer, which was known under the name of the House of Port-Libre, and another in the street De Sèvres, called the House of Lazarus. The Duplessis College was also transformed into a place of confinement. Lastly, the Luxembourg palace, originally appointed to receive the twenty-two Girondists, was filled with a multitude of prisoners, and enclosed, strangely commingled, all that yet remained of the brilliant circle of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. These sudden arrests having completely choked the prisons, the captives were at first but indifferently accommodated. Confounded with felons and thrown upon straw, the early moments of their detention were full of bitterness. Shortly, however, after the first confusion, order was introduced, and certain alleviations were permitted. Communication with the outer world being freely allowed, they enjoyed the consolation of embracing their kindred, and the privilege of obtaining funds. Thereupon they hired beds, or had them brought from their own domiciles; after which they no longer slept on straw, or associated with malefactors. In fact, all the conveniences which could render their situation more supportable were granted them; for the decree sanctioned the removal into houses of arrest of all such objects as the detained might require. Those who occupied the buildings newly established were still better treated. At Port-Libre, the House of Lazarus, the Luxembourg, where affluent prisoners were congregated, comfort and abundance prevailed. The tables were delicately served, owing to the fees of entry allowed to the jailors. However, the resort of visitors having become too considerable, and intercourse with the exterior appearing too great a boon, that mitigation was subsequently denied, and the captives were for the future allowed to communicate by writing alone, and then simply for articles whereof they stood in need. From that moment the association seemed to become more intimate amongst those unfortunate persons, condemned to pass their time exclusively together. Each drew closer the bands of sympathy according to his tastes, and petty societies were formed within the narrow confines. Regulations also were established; the domestic cares were equitably distributed, and each sustained their burden in rotation. A subscription was opened to defray the expenditure incurred for rent and sustenance, whereby the rich were made to contribute for the poor.

After providing for their household cares, the inmates of the different rooms assembled in a common apartment. Parties gathered around a table, a stove, or a fireplace. Some applied themselves to labour, others to reading—the majority to conversation. Poets—for they too were cast into confinement with all who excited jealousy by any species of superiority—recited verses; musicians gave concerts—and from those places of proscription most excellent music was daily heard to issue. After a short interval, luxury lent its aid to the pleasures of society. The females appeared in elegant attire, intimacies of love and friendship were established, and, till the very moment for mounting the scaffold, all the ordinary scenes of life were in active repetition. A singular evidence of the French character—of its versatility, of its careless gaiety, of its aptitude for recreation in the most dismal conjunctures of fate.

The charms of poetry, tales of romantic adventure, acts of kindliness and sympathy, the singular diversity and confusion of rank, fortune, and opinion, beguiled the first three months of detention. A sort of voluntary equality realised that chimerical equality which morose sectaries endeavoured to enforce throughout the whole social fabric, but truthfully succeeded in establishing in prisons alone. The pride of some prisoners, however, rejected the level of misfortune. Whilst many were seen, otherwise very unequal in fortune and in education, to live happily together, and with exemplary disinterestedness rejoice in concert at the victories of that republic which persecuted them, certain nobles and their wives, found by chance in the mansions of the deserted Faubourg Saint-Germain, held aloof, still assumed the proscribed titles of count and marquis, and made no secret of their vexation when tidings came that the Austrians had fled at Watignies, or that the Prussians had been unable to clear the Vosges. Nevertheless, affliction eventually brings back all hearts to nature and the impulses of humanity. In a little while, when Fouquier-Tinville, knocking every day at the door of those desolate abodes, incessantly demanded fresh heads — when friends and relatives were hourly separated by death—the chastened survivors mourned together, seeking and offering consolation; and thenceforth all differences were merged in the sentiment of a common misery.

All the prisons, however, did not present the like scenes. The Conciergerie, adjoining the Palace of Justice, and on account of that proximity containing the prisoners destined to the revolutionary tribunal, offered the melancholy spectacle of some hundreds of people having but three or four days to live. They were transferred to that building immediately before their trial, and only passed there the short interval between their sentence and their execution. In it were now confined the Girondists, who had been taken from their first prison, the Luxembourg; Madame Roland, who, after assisting in the escape of her husband, had given herself up to incarceration without attempting to fly; the young friends Riouffe, Girey-Dupré, and Bois-Guion, attached to the cause of the proscribed deputies, and brought from Bordeaux to Paris to be tried conjointly with them; Bailly, who had been apprehended at Melun; the ex-minister of finance, Clavière, who had not succeeded in evading pursuit like Lebrun; the Duke of Orleans, transported from the jail of Marseilles to the dungeons of Paris; and Generals Houchard and Brunet—all reserved for the same fate; and, lastly, the unfortunate Marie-Antoinette, who was doomed to precede those illustrious victims on the scaffold. In this last resting-place, the captives never even thought of procuring such comforts as alleviated the lot of those detained in the other prisons. They occupied bare and gloomy cells, to which neither the rays of the sun, the voice of consolation, nor the sounds of pleasure, ever penetrated. They were scarcely allowed the privilege of sleeping on beds, instead of being stretched on straw. Unable to shake off the idea of death like the mere suspected, who looked forward to be detained only till the peace, they strove to convert it into a source of distraction, and made of the revolutionary tribunal and the guillotine the most whimsical parodies. The Girondists, in their apartment, improvised and enacted strange and terrible dramas, whereof their own destiny and the revolution were the subjects. It was at midnight, when all the jailors had retired, that they commenced those lugubrious diversions. We will give one of the entertainments they had conceived. Seated each upon a bed, they represented both the judges and the jurymen of the revolutionary tribunal, and Fouquier-Tinville himself. Two of them, confronting the others, appeared as the accused with his advocate. In conformity to the custom of that sanguinary court, the accused was always condemned. Forthwith, stretched on a bedstead, reversed for the purpose, he underwent the form of execution even to its most trifling details. After divers executions, the accuser became the accused, and suffered in his turn. Then returning, enveloped in a sheet, he depicted the tortures he was enduring in the shades, foretold their destiny to all those iniquitous judges, and, seizing upon them with lamentable cries, dragged them into the regions below. "It was thus," says Riouffe, "we sported in the jaws of death, and described the truth in our prophetic jests, amidst spies and hangmen."

Since the death of Custine, men had begun to grow habituated to those political trials, in which simple errors of opinion were transformed into crimes worthy of the last punishment. They accustomed themselves, by the practice of shedding blood, to drive away all scruples, and to look upon it as quite natural to send every member of an antagonist faction to the scaffold. The Cordeliers and Jacobins had constrained the convention to decree the impeachment of the queen, the Girondists, the Duke of Orleans, and several generals. They now imperiously demanded that faith should be kept with them; and it was with the queen they were chiefly desirous of commencing the long series of immolations. It may seem that a woman ought to have disarmed political fury; but more hatred was borne to Marie-Antoinette than to Louis XVI. Upon her principally were charged the several treasons of the court, the disorder in the finances, and, above all, the relentless hostilities of Austria. Louis XVI., it was repeated, had suffered all to be done; but Marie-Antoinette had done all, and upon her all must be visited.

We have already alluded to the restrictions that had been introduced into the Temple. Marie-Antoinette had been separated from her sister-in-law, her daughter, and her son, in virtue of the decree which ordained the trial or exile of the surviving members of the Bourbon family. She was transferred to the Conciergerie, where, alone and in a narrow room, she was reduced to the same strict regimen as all the other prisoners. The imprudence of a devoted friend rendered her situation still more painful. A member of the municipality, Michonnis, in whose breast she had awakened a lively interest, undertook to introduce into her apartment an individual who desired, as he said, merely to gratify his curiosity. This person was a courageous but imprudent emigrant, who threw her a carnation containing a slip of very fine paper, with the words, "Your friends are ready!"—a deceptive hope, and as dangerous for her who received it as for him who gave it. Michonnis and the emigrant were discovered in the act, and immediately apprehended; and from that time the watch kept over the ill-fated queen was more rigorous than ever. Gendarmes were appointed to stand continually on guard at her door, and they were expressly forbidden to give any heed to her remarks or queries.

The despicable Hébert, Chaumette's deputy, and editor of the disgusting journal called Père-Duchêne, the writer of the party whereof Vincent, Ronsin, Varlet, and Leclerc, were the leaders, had particularly devoted himself to torment the remaining members of the dethroned family. He maintained that the family of the tyrant ought not to be better treated than a sans-culottes family; and he had caused a resolution to be passed abolishing the remnant of luxury wherewith the prisoners in the Temple had been hitherto regaled. They were interdicted the delicacies of poultry and confectionery; for breakfast they were to be allowed but one sort of food; for dinner, soup, boiled meat, and some other dish; and for supper, two dishes and half a bottle of wine each. Wax candles were replaced by tallow, silver by pewter, and porcelain by clay. The bearers of wood or water were alone permitted to enter their apartments, accompanied by two commissioners. All articles of food were conveyed to them by means of a turning-box. The numerous domestics were cut down to one cook, an assistant, two servitors, and a sempstress for the linen.

Immediately subsequent to that ordinance, Hébert had repaired to the Temple, and inhumanly deprived the two helpless ladies of every convenience, down to trifling pieces of furniture for which they pleaded in vain. Eighty louis-d'ors which the Princess Elizabeth had in reserve, and which she had received from the Princess de Lamballe, were taken from her. There is no character so dangerous or cruel as the unenlightened and uneducated man invested with recent authority. But if, moreover, he hath a vile soul—if, like Hébert, who distributed checks at the door of a theatre, and made fraudulent returns of the receipts, he is without natural morality—and if he suddenly springs from the mire of degradation to power—he will inevitably prove as basely malignant as atrocious. Such was Hébert in his conduct at the Temple. Nor did he content himself with the vexations we have just specified; he and some others conceived the idea of separating the young prince from his aunt and sister. A shoemaker, named Simon, and his wife, were the instructors to whom they deemed it fitting to confide him, in order that he might receive the education of a young sans-culottes. Simon and his wife were shut up in the Temple, and becoming prisoners with the unfortunate boy, were commissioned to tend him after their own fashion. Their accommodation was superior to that of the two princesses, and they shared the table of the municipal commissioners on guard. Simon had the privilege, when accompanied by two commissioners, to descend into the courtyard of the Temple with the young prince, in order to afford him a little air and exercise.

Hébert next imagined the infernal project of extorting from this child revelations against his wretched mother. Whether the miscreant attributed false statements to the boy, or took advantage of his age and forlorn condition to wring from him all he suggested, he obtained a revolting deposition; and as the young prince was too tender in years to be conducted before the tribunal, Hébert appeared in his behalf to relate the abominations he himself had dictated or fabricated.

It was on the 14th October that Marie-Antoinette was led before her judges. Dragged to the sanguinary tribunal by inexorable revolutionary vengeance, she appeared there with no chance of an acquittal, for it was assuredly not to have her absolved that the Jacobins had called her from her dungeon. Nevertheless it was expedient to assign crimes. Fouquier collected the various rumours current amongst the people since the arrival of the princess in France; and in his articles of impeachment he charged her with having dilapidated the public treasury, first to gratify her own love of pleasure, and afterwards to transmit funds to her brother the emperor. He laid great stress on the scenes of the 5th and 6th October, and on the banquet of the body-guards, alleging that she had hatched a plot at that period, which obliged the people to proceed in a body to Versailles for the purpose of counteracting its fell designs. He subsequently accused her of having swayed her husband, interfered in the choice of ministers, conducted in person the intrigues with the deputies gained over to the court, instigated the journey to Varennes, provoked the war, and revealed to the hostile generals the different plans of campaign. He upbraided her with having arranged a fresh conspiracy on the 10th August, caused the people to be fired upon during that day, and urged her consort to defend himself, by taxing him with cowardice; in fine, with having incessantly continued to plot and correspond with the exterior since her captivity in the Temple, and with having treated her young son as king. We see how every thing is tortured and converted into crime on those terrible occasions when the vengeance of nations, long repressed, eventually breaks forth and assails such of their princes as have least merited it. We see how profuseness and the love of pleasure, so natural to a young princess, how her attachment to her kindred, her influence over her husband, her regrets—always more indiscreet in a woman than in a man—even her loftier courage, were blackened by exasperated or malevolent imaginations.

Witnesses were required: the public accuser called Lecointre, deputy for Versailles, who had witnessed the 5th and 6th October; Hébert, who had often visited the Temple; divers functionaries in the ministries, and several domestics of the court. To confront the arraigned queen were drawn from their cells—Admiral d'Estaing, former commander of the national guard of Versailles; Latour-du-Pin, minister of war in 1789; the venerable Bailly, who, it was asserted, had been an accessary, together with Lafayette, in the criminal journey to Varennes; and lastly, Valazé, one of the Girondists doomed to the guillotine.

No precise fact was proved. Some had seen the queen delighted when the body-guards testified their attachment to her; others had seen her sad and irritable when she was conducted to Paris or brought back from Varennes; some, again, had been present at splendid fêtes, which must have cost large sums; and others had heard rumours in the ministerial offices that the queen was accustomed to oppose the sanction being given to decrees. One of the late waiting-women at court averred that, in 1788, she had heard the Duke de Coigny say that the emperor had already received 200,000,000 from France to carry on the war against the Turks.

The malignant Hébert, being then called to confront the queen, scrupled not to repeat the accusations extorted from the young prince. He said that Charles Capet had related to Simon the particulars of the journey to Varennes, and had mentioned Lafayette and Bailly as accessaries to the flight. He deposed, moreover, that the boy indulged in deplorable vices, premature for his age; that Simon, having surprised and questioned him, had learned that he derived from his mother the vices to which he was addicted. Hébert intimated that Marie-Antoinette doubtless designed, by early weakening the physical constitution of her son, to ensure the means of governing him should he mount the throne.

The scandal escaping from the atmosphere of an envious court from time to time, in the course of twenty years, had given the people a most unfavourable idea of the queen's morals. Still, the auditory, all Jacobin as it was, gave token of abhorrence at the accusations of Hébert. He, however, did not the less persist in asseverating them. The unfortunate mother had made no reply; urged again to afford explanations, she said with extraordinary emotion, "I thought that the feelings of humanity would have spared me the necessity of repelling such an imputation; but I refer it to the hearts of all the mothers here present." This answer, so expressive in its noble simplicity, deeply affected the whole court.

The depositions of some of the witnesses, at the same time, were characterised by circumstances which must have been consolatory to the arraigned princess. The brave D'Estaing, of whom she had been the enemy, refused to depone any thing to her prejudice, and could recollect only the courage she had evinced on the 5th and 6th October, and the noble resolution she had expressed to die by the side of her husband rather than fly. Manuel, notwithstanding his bitter hostilities with the court during the Legislative Assembly, declared that he had nothing to allege against the accused. When the venerable Bailly was led in, he who had so often forewarned the court of the calamities its imprudences would provoke, he appeared most painfully moved; and when he was asked if he knew "the woman Capet:" "Yes," said he, inclining his body with respect, "I have known Madame." He testified that he could speak to nothing criminal, and strenuously insisted that the declarations wrung from the young prince, relative to the journey to Varennes, were fabrications. In reward of his candour he received outrageous abuse, and had a foretaste of the doom in store for himself.

In the whole proceedings there were but two serious facts, attested by Latour-du-Pin and Valazé, who gave evidence only because they were constrained. Latour-du-Pin confessed that Marie-Antoinette had demanded from him an exact account of the armies whilst he filled the post of minister of war. Valazé, ever cold and stern, but respectful towards misfortune, would state nothing against the accused; but pressed, he could not avoid divulging that, when a member of the committee of twenty-four, and charged with his colleagues to inspect the papers found in the house of Septeuil, treasurer of the civil list, he had seen checks for various sums signed "Antoinette"—which was very natural; but he added that he had seen a letter wherein the minister prayed the king to transmit the copy of the plan of campaign then in his possession to the queen. These two facts—the demand for the account of the armies and the communication of the plan of campaign—were at once interpreted in the most unfavourable light; and the conclusion was held indisputable, that she wished them in order to send to the enemy, since it was not to be supposed that a young princess would devote attention, merely from taste, to details of administration and military plans. After these depositions, several others were heard on the expenses of the court, on the influence of the queen over affairs, on the scenes of the 10th August, on all that had passed at the Temple; and the vaguest rumours, the most insignificant circumstances, were held admissible as proofs.

Marie-Antoinette frequently repeated, with great presence of mind and energy, that there was no distinct fact adduced against her, and that furthermore, as the wife of Louis XVI., she was not responsible for any acts of his reign. Fouquier, however, declared her sufficiently convicted. Chaveau-Lagarde exerted himself in fruitless efforts as her advocate; and the unfortunate queen was condemned to undergo the same fate as her husband.

Reconducted to the Conciergerie, she passed the night preceding her execution with great composure; and early on the following day, the 16th October, she was conveyed, amidst an immense concourse, towards the fatal square, on which, ten months previously, Louis XVI. had perished. She listened with calmness to the exhortations of the ecclesiastic who attended her, and cast a look of indifference over that multitude which had so often applauded her beauty and grace, and now with equal ardour hailed her progress to execution. On her arrival at the foot of the scaffold, she perceived the Tuileries, and seemed affected; but she hastened to mount the fatal ladder, and gave herself with courageous resignation into the hands of the executioner. That infamous functionary held up the head to the people, as he was wont to do when he had sacrificed an illustrious victim.

The Jacobins were beside themselves with joy. "Let them bear this news to Austria!" they cried. "The Romans sold the ground occupied by Hannibal; we strike off the heads dearest to the princes who have invaded our territory."

This execution was but the prelude to others. Immediately after the trial of Marie-Antoinette, the cry for vengeance arose the louder against the Girondists, and with their trial it was next found necessary to proceed.

Before the revolt of the south, it was possible only to reproach them with opinions. It was said, indeed, that they were accomplices of Dumouriez, of La Vendée, of Orleans; but such connivance, easy to impute at the tribune, could not be proved, even before a revolutionary tribunal. But when, on the contrary, they raised the standard of civil war, and supplied against themselves positive overt acts, it became an easy task to secure their condemnation. True, the detained deputies were not the men who had provoked the insurrection of Calvados and the south, but they were members of the same party, advocates of the same cause; a moral conviction prevailed that they had been in concert with each other; and although the intercepted letters failed in establishing a complete case of guilty concurrence, they were sufficient for a tribunal which, by its very institution, was bound to admit probabilities. The long moderation of the Girondists was converted into a continued conspiracy, whereof the civil war had been the natural catastrophe. Their reluctance, under the Legislative Assembly, to rise in insurrection against the throne, their opposition to the project of the 10th August, their contest with the commune from that time till the 20th September, their vehement protestations against the massacres of September, their commiseration for Louis XVI., their resistance to the inquisitorial system which was so repugnant to generals, their opposition to the extraordinary tribunal, to the maximum, to the forced loan, to all the revolutionary resources, in fact; finally, their efforts to establish a repressive authority by instituting the committee of twelve, and their despair after their discomfiture at Paris, a despair which drove them to apply for succour to the provinces—all these things were adduced as inseparable and dependent facts in one and the same conspiracy. In such a system of accusation, opinions propounded from the tribune were deemed symptoms and preparatives of the civil war which soon after broke out; and whoever had spoken in the Legislative and the Convention in the spirit of the deputies assembled at Caen, Bordeaux, Lyons, and Marseilles, was held equally criminal. Although no direct proof of co-operation was available, it was found in their community of sentiment, in the friendship which united most of them, and in their habitual meetings at the residences of Roland and Valazé.

The Girondists, on the other hand, were firmly of opinion that it was impossible to condemn them if they were allowed the advantage of discussion. Their principles, they argued, might lead them to form different conclusions from the Mountaineers on the policy of certain revolutionary measures, without being necessarily criminal; their doctrines evinced neither personal ambition nor a premeditated scheme. On the contrary, it was on record that they had disagreed amongst themselves on a variety of important points. For the rest, their connexion with the revolted deputies was a mere assumption, and their letters, their friendship, or their habit of sitting on the same benches, did not suffice to prove so conclusive a fact. "If we are permitted to plead," said the Girondists, "we are surely saved." A vain idea, which, without promoting their safety, caused them to forfeit a part of that dignity wherein lies the only solace of an unjust death.

If parties were to display greater candour, they would be at all times more worthy of respect. The victorious party might have said to the vanquished—"You have carried your attachment to the system of moderation so far as to make war on us—so far as to bring the republic to the verge of ruin by a hazardous diversion: you have been overcome, and must die." The Girondists, on their side, had language of a noble tenor to hold to their opponents. They could retort—"We regard you as miscreants who are destroying and dishonouring the republic whilst pretending to defend it, and we have done our utmost to combat and defeat you. Yes, we avow ourselves equally guilty; we are all accomplices of Buzot, Barbaroux, Pétion, and Guadet; they are great and virtuous citizens, whose worth we proclaim to your teeth. When they departed to avenge the republic, we remained to glorify it in despite of executioners. You are the conquerors—take our lives"

But the human mind is not so constituted as thus to simplify all things by an ingenuous frankness. The victors are anxious to convict by a parade of reason, and they transgress truth; a remnant of hope induces the vanquished to defend themselves, and they speak falsely: hence we see in civil broils those disgraceful trials, where the strongest listens with closed ears, and the weakest pleads in cheerless desperation, vainly demanding the life not to be accorded. It is only after the judgment is pronounced, after all hope is extinguished, that the mind resumes its native dignity, and generally shows itself in fullest possession when on the very verge of eternity.

The Girondists, then, determined to attempt a defence, and in the purpose they must of necessity employ modes of concession and duplicity. Their adversaries, on the other hand, desired to prove their delinquency, and they sent to confront them, at the bar of the revolutionary tribunal, some of their most inveterate foes—Pache, Hébert, Chaumette, Chabot, and others equally vile or equally forsworn. The attendant crowd was great, for as yet the spectacle of so many republicans arraigned for behoof of the republic was recommended by novelty. The accused were twenty-one in number, all in the vigour of manhood and mental power, some even in the blossom of youth and beauty. The mere announcement of their names and ages was sufficient to excite emotion.

Brissot, Gardien, and Lasource, were thirty-nine years of age; Vergniaud, Gensonné, and Lehardy, thirty-five; Mainvielle and Ducos, twenty-eight; Boyer-Fonfrède and Duchastel, twenty-seven; Duperret, forty-six; Carra, fifty; Valazé and Lacase, forty-two; Duprat, thirty-three; Sillery, fifty-seven; Fauchet, forty-nine; Lesterpt-Beauvais, forty-three; Boileau, forty-one; Antiboul, forty; and Vaigée, thirty-six.

Gensonné was calm and collected; Valazé indignant and scornful; Vergniaud betrayed greater emotion than was usual with him; young Ducos was gay; and Fonfrède too, he who had been spared on the 2d June because he had not voted for the arrests ordered by the committee of twelve, but from his reiterated outbreaks in favour of his friends, had since proved himself worthy to partake their doom, seemed, in so glorious a cause, ready to abandon without a pang his splendid fortune, his young wife, and all the charms of existence.

Amar had drawn up the articles of impeachment on behalf of the committee of general safety. Pache was the first witness heard in corroboration. Wily and prudent, as he had always shown himself, he stated that he had long ago perceived a faction opposed to the revolution; but he particularised no fact proving a premeditated plot. He averred simply that when the convention was menaced by Dumouriez, he repaired to the committee of finance to procure funds and means to provision Paris, and that the committee refused them; he added, moreover, that he had been severely handled in the committee of general safety, and that Guadet had threatened him to move the arrest of all the municipal authorities. Chaumette, next examined, recounted all the contests of the commune with the right side, such as they had been described in the journals, winding up his evidence with one solitary statement of a specific nature, to wit, that Brissot had procured the nomination of Santonax as commissioner to the colonies, and was consequently the author of all the calamities in the New World. The despicable Hébert related his apprehension by the commission of twelve, and asserted that Roland corrupted all the public writers, for Madame Roland had endeavoured to buy his paper of "Père Duchêne." Destournelles, minister of justice, and formerly employed at the commune, spoke in a manner equally vague, and repeated what was matter of notoriety, that the accused had assailed the commune, inveighed against the massacres, and laboured to establish a departmental guard, &c. &c.

The most inveterate and prolix of the witnesses, however, was the ex-capuchin Chabot, a hot-headed, weak, and worthless character, whose deposition lasted for several hours. Chabot had always been treated by the Girondists as an extravagant fool, and their disdain wrankled deeply in his heart. He prided himself on having advocated the outbreak of the 10th August in opposition to their opinion; and always maintained, that if they had consented to send him to the prisons, he would have rescued their inmates as he had before saved the Swiss soldiers. He was well disposed, therefore, to take vengeance on the Girondists, and more especially when, by calumniating them, he might regain the popularity he was in danger of losing at the Jacobin Club, on account of certain suspicions that he was connected with stockjobbing. He fabricated a long and malignant charge, in which he represented the Girondists scheming to gain over the minister Narbonne; then, after having chased away Narbonne, seizing upon three ministries at once; perpetrating the 20th June in order to reanimate their creatures; opposing the 10th August because they were inimical to a republic; in short, always pursuing a calculated plan of ambition; and, what was more atrocious than all the rest, allowing the massacres of September, and the robbery of the Garde-Meuble, with the view of ruining the reputation of the patriots. "If they had been so disposed," said Chabot, "I would have saved the prisoners. Pétion caused the murderers to be supplied with intoxicating liquors, and Brissot had no wish to have them checked, because in the prisons there was one of his own enemies, Morande!"

When power gives the signal, plentiful are the base-minded ready to press forward to criminate even the worthiest of the human race. No sooner have the leaders cast the first stone, than all who grovel in the dirt start up and overwhelm the victim. Fabre-d'Eglantine, against whom suspicions were directed, as against Chabot, on account of stockjobbing, had likewise occasion to redeem his popularity; and he gave evidence in a more cautious but equally perfidious spirit, insinuating that the policy of the Girondists might undoubtedly consist in permitting the massacres and the robbery of the Garde-Meuble. Vergniaud, unable longer to restrain his feelings, exclaimed with indignation, "I shall not attempt to clear myself from a charge of fellowship with robbers and assassins!"

No precise fact, however, was alleged against the accused; they were charged merely with opinions publicly avowed, and they urged in reply that such opinions might have been erroneous, but that it was no crime to be mistaken. It was objected to them that their doctrines were not the result of an involuntary and therefore excusable error, but of a conspiracy hatched in the houses of Roland and Valazé. They averred in rejoinder that those very doctrines were so little the result of any express agreement amongst themselves, that great diversity existed upon several points. One said, "I did not vote for the appeal to the people;" another, "I did not vote for the departmental guard;" a third, "I did not partake the opinions of the committee of twelve—I was not in favour of the arrest of Hébert and Chaumette." All this was true, but the adducement destroyed the uniform character of the defence; the accused seemed almost to abandon one another, and each to condemn the measure in which he had not participated. Boileau carried the care of self-justification to extreme weakness, and even covered himself with disgrace. He confessed that a conspiracy had existed against the unity and indivisibility of the republic; that he was now convinced of it, and accordingly made declaration thereof to the insulted laws; stating, moreover, that he could not designate the guilty, but that he desired their punishment as a true Mountaineer, which he avowed himself to be. Gardien, too, had the baseness to utterly disavow the commission of twelve. However, Gensonné, Brissot, Vergniaud, and especially Valazé, corrected the bad effect of their two colleagues' weakness. They alleged, indeed, that they had not always thought alike, and that consequently they had taken no concert in their opinions, but they denied neither their friendship nor their principles. Valazé frankly avowed the meetings held under his roof, maintaining that they had an undoubted right to meet and interchange ideas in the same manner as all other citizens. When, finally, their connivance with the fugitives was charged upon them, they repudiated it. Thereupon Hébert exclaimed, "The accused deny the conspiracy! When the Roman senate had to pronounce on the conspiracy of Catiline, if it had interrogated each confederate, and rested satisfied with a denial, they would have all escaped the punishment awaiting them; but the meetings at the house of Catiline, his flight, the arms found in the house of Lecca, were held material proofs, and sufficed to determine the judgment of the senate." "Well," replied Brissot, "I accept the comparison drawn between us and Catiline. Cicero said to him, 'We have found arms in thy house; the ambassadors of the Allobroges accuse thee; the signatures of Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilius, thy accomplices, prove thy infamous projects.' Here we are accused by the senate, it is true; but have arms been found in our houses?—can signatures be objected against us?"

Unfortunately, complaints written by Vergniaud to Bordeaux, expressing the liveliest indignation, had been discovered, as also a letter from the cousin of Duperret detailing the preparations for the insurrection. Furthermore, a letter from Duperret to Madame Roland had been intercepted, in which he stated that he had received intelligence from Buzot and Barbaroux, and that they were getting ready to punish the crimes perpetrated at Paris. Vergniaud, being called upon to explain, answered, "If I were to lay before you the motives which urged me to write, I should perhaps appear to you more worthy of pity than of blame. I could not avoid believing, after the attempt of the 10th March, that the design of assassinating us was united with the project of dissolving the national representation. Marat thus expressed himself on the 11th March. The petitions subsequently presented against us with such virulence confirmed me in that opinion. It was under this persuasion that my mind was oppressed with grief, and I wrote to my fellow-citizens that I stood beneath the knife. I exclaimed against the tyranny of Marat. It was he alone that I named. I respect the opinion of the people regarding Marat, but assuredly Marat was to me a tyrant." At these words, a juryman arose and said, "Vergniaud complains of having been persecuted by Marat. I have to observe, that Marat has been assassinated, and that Vergniaud is still here." This stupid remark was applauded by a part of the audience; and all the candour and reason of Vergniaud remained without impression on the insensate multitude.

Vergniaud, however, succeeded in gaining a hearing, and recovered, when speaking of the conduct of his friends, of their zeal and sacrifices for the republic, all his pristine eloquence. The whole assemblage was moved; insomuch that the condemnation, although enjoined, seemed no longer so perfectly inevitable. The pleadings had continued several days. The Jacobins, indignant at the tardiness of the tribunal, addressed a final petition to the convention, praying it to accelerate the process. Robespierre thereupon caused a decree to be passed, whereby, after a three days' hearing, the jury was authorised to declare itself sufficiently enlightened, and to proceed to judgment without further delay. Moreover, to render the title more conformable to the fact, he obtained an ordinance that the name of extraordinary tribunal should be changed to that of REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL.

The jurymen scrupled to put this new decree in force upon the first day, and declared themselves not yet sufficiently informed. But on the morrow, they used their privilege to shorten the case, and demanded its termination. The accused had already given up all hope, and prepared themselves to die with dignity. They repaired to the last sitting of the court with serene countenances. Whilst the guards were searching them at the gate of the Conciergerie, with the view of removing from them any murderous weapon wherewith they might attempt self-destruction, Valazé, giving his friend Riouffe a pair of scissors, said to him in presence of the gendarmes, "See, my friend, here is a prohibited weapon; we must not attempt our lives!"

At midnight, on the 30th October, the jurymen entered to pronounce their verdict. Antonelle, the foreman, bore a mournful expression on his face. Camille-Desmoulins, on hearing the fatal sentence, exclaimed, "Alas! it is I who kill them—it is my *Brissot Unmasked! Let me begone!" and he rushed wildly from the court. When the doom of death was irrevocably pronounced, Brissot let fall his arms, and his head suddenly dropped on his breast; Gensonné endeavoured to say a few words on the application of the law, but his efforts to command attention were fruitless. Sillery, throwing away his crutches, exclaimed, "This is the happiest day of my life!" Hopes had been entertained for the young brothers Ducos and Fonfrède, who had appeared to be less compromised, and who had become attached to the Girondists more from admiration of their character and talents than from similarity of opinion. They were condemned, however, like the rest. Fonfrède embraced Ducos, saying, "Brother, I am to be blamed for thy death." "Be of good cheer," replied Ducos, "we will die together." The Abbé Fauchet, with his eyes cast down, seemed absorbed in prayer; Carra preserved his austere aspect; Vergniaud had in all his bearing an air of haughty scorn; Lasource delivered the celebrated saying of the ancient—"I die on the day the people have lost their reason; you will die on the day they recover it." Not even Boileau and Gardien, who had displayed such weakness, were spared. Boileau, hurling his hat into the air, cried out, "I am innocent!" "We are innocent," repeated all the prisoners; "people, you are deceived!" Some of them had the indiscretion to throw assignats amongst the crowd, as if to enlist it for their rescue, but it remained inert. The gendarmes immediately surrounded them to reconduct them to their cells. Suddenly one of the condemned fell at their feet; they raised him bathed in blood: it was Valazé, who, when giving the scissors to Riouffe, had retained a dagger, wherewith he had now dealt himself a mortal stab. The tribunal forthwith directed that his corpse should be dragged upon a cart in the train of the condemned. When leaving the court, they all, by a spontaneous impulse, struck up the Marseillese hymn:—

Contre nous de la tyrannie
L'étendard sanglant est levé.

Their last night on earth was sublime. Vergniaud had poison, but he cast it aside to die with his friends. They partook of a final repast together, in the course of which they were alternately gay, serious, and eloquent. Brissot and Gensonné were grave and contemplative; Vergniaud discoursed upon expiring liberty with the noblest sorrow, and upon the destiny of mankind with glowing fervour; Ducos repeated some verses he had made whilst in prison, and all in chorus chanted anthems to France and liberty.

The following day, the 31st October, an immense crowd congregated to witness their passage to the scaffold. As they went they repeated that same Marseillese hymn which the French soldiers were accustomed to sing when marching upon the enemy. Arrived on the Place de la Revolution, and alighted from their carts, they took a last embrace, with cries of "The republic for ever!" Sillery was the first to mount the ladder, and after directing a grave salutation to the assembled multitude, in which he still testified respect for weak and deceived humanity, he received the fatal stroke. All imitated Sillery, and died with the like dignity. In thirty-one minutes the executioner had struck off the whole of those illustrious heads, and thus in a few rapid seconds ruthlessly exterminated so many beings redolent in youth, beauty, talents, and virtues. Such was the end of those noble and courageous citizens, the victims of generous but utopian theories. Comprehending neither humanity nor its vices, nor the means of conducting it in a revolution, they became indignant at its obstinacy in refusing to be better, and eventually provoked it to destroy them by persisting in thwarting it. Honour to their memory! never did so much virtue and talent illustrate civil contests; and it must be allowed to their glory, that if they did not discern the necessity of violent means to save the cause of France, the majority of their adversaries, who preferred such means, were influenced by passion rather than genius. Above them only he amongst the Mountaineers can be ranked, who was moved to advocate revolutionary measures by political sagacity alone, and not by the instigations of hatred.

Scarcely had the Girondists sighed their last, ere fresh victims were called out for immolation. The tribunal reposed not for an instant. On the 2d November, it consigned to death the unfortunate Olympe de Gouges, for pretended counter-revolutionary writings, and Adam Luxe, deputy of Mayence, accused of the same crime. On the 6th November, the wretched Duke of Orleans, transferred from Marseilles to Paris, was conducted before the revolutionary tribunal, and condemned for the suspicions wherewith he had inspired all parties. Odious to the emigrants, and distrusted by the Girondists and Jacobins alike, he aroused none of those regrets which in some degree compensate for an unjust death. More the enemy of the court than an enthusiast for liberty and a republic, he lacked that inward conviction which sustains at the extremest moment, and of all the victims of the time he was the least indemnified and the most to be pitied. A general repugnance, an absolute cynicism, seized upon him at the last, and he proceeded to the scaffold with a calmness and indifference truly extraordinary. Dragged along the Rue Saint-Honoré, he surveyed his palace with a cold and passionless eye, and winced not in the slightest from his settled disgust with men and life. His aid-de-camp Coustard, a deputy like himself, was the associate of his fate. Two days afterwards, Roland's interesting and noble-hearted wife followed them to the scaffold. She, combining the graces of a French with the heroism of a Roman matron, bore all her griefs in her bosom. She loved and reverenced her husband as a father; she felt for one of the proscribed Girondists an ardent passion, which she had always repressed; she left a young and orphan daughter to the care and hazard of friends; and whilst trembling for these cherished beings, she was doomed to the belief that the cause of liberty, to which she was so enthusiastically attached, and for which she had made such heavy sacrifices, was irremediably lost. Thus at once, in all the affections of her soul, she suffered acutely. Condemned on the charge of confederacy with the Girondists, she heard her sentence with a species of rapture, and seemed, from the moment of her condemnation to that of her execution, as it were inspired, exciting in the breasts of all who saw her a degree of admiration partaking of religious awe. She went to the scaffold clad in white; during the route she cheered the spirits of a companion in misfortune who was to perish with her, whose courage drooped, and even succeeded in twice moving him to a smile. When arrived at the place of execution, she bowed her head to the statue of Liberty, and exclaimed, "Oh, Liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name!" She then underwent the last penalty with unshaken fortitude. So perished that charming and courageous woman, who was worthy to partake the destiny of her friends, but who, if less aspiring and more subdued to the passive duties of her sex, would have, not indeed escaped death, a homage due to her talents and accomplishments, but averted from herself and her husband many sarcasms and calumnies.

Her husband had fled in the direction of Rouen. On learning her tragical end, he determined not to survive her. He quitted the hospitable abode in which he had found an asylum, and, with the view of not compromising any friend, he went to seek death on the highway. He was found pierced to the heart with a sword, and lying at the foot of a tree against which he had propped the deadly weapon. In his pocket was concealed a manuscript on his life and his conduct in the ministry.

Thus, amidst the frightful delirium which rendered every thing bearing the attributes of genius, virtue, and courage suspected, all that France contained most noble and generous perished either by suicide or the hands of the executioner.

Amongst so many illustrious and heroic deaths, there was one especially more lamentable and sublime than all the others—it was that of Bailly. We have already been enabled to surmise, from the manner in which he was treated on the trial of the queen, what his reception would be when at the bar of the revolutionary tribunal. The scene on the Champ de Mars, the proclamation of martial law, and the discharges of musketry which followed it, were events the most frequently and the most virulently charged upon the constituent party. And upon Bailly, the friend of Lafayette, and the magistrate who had caused the red flag to be displayed, it was determined to visit all the pretended delinquencies of the old constituents. He was condemned, and appointed to be executed on the Champ de Mars, the theatre of what was designated his crime. The day fixed was the 11th November; and the weather chanced to be chilly, rainy, and cheerless. Conducted on foot, and amidst the outrages of a barbarous populace, whom he had preserved from famine whilst he was mayor, he retained a meek and imperturbable serenity. During the long track from the Conciergerie to the Champ de Mars, the people kept shaking in his face the red flag, which had recently been discovered at the town-hall deposited in a mahogany case. At length he reached the foot of the scaffold, and seemed on the point of escaping his tormentors; but one of the ruffians collected to persecute him cried out that the field of the federation ought not to be polluted with his blood: and the crowd rushed upon the guillotine, bore it away with such zealous eagerness as it had once before exhibited in digging up that same field of the federation, and proceeded finally to rear it on the edge of the Seine, on a heap of ordure, and opposite the quarter of Chaillot, where Bailly had passed his life and composed his works. This operation occupied several hours, and in the interim he was made to traverse the Champ de Mars numerous times. His head bare and his hands bound behind, he walked with difficulty. Some cast mud upon him, others struck him with their feet or with clubs. Overpowered, he fell to the ground; he was speedily forced up. The wet and cold had communicated to his frame an involuntary tremor. "Thou tremblest!" said a soldier, addressing him. "My friend," replied the old man, "it is with cold." After undergoing this horrible torture for many hours, the task was consummated; the red flag was burnt under his nose, the executioner seized him as his prey, and the world lost a distinguished scholar, and his country one of the most virtuous men who have reflected honour upon its name.

Since the era when Tacitus beheld it applaud the atrocities of Roman emperors, the populace has not changed. Ever abrupt and irreflective in its impulses, now it rears an altar to the country, now with equal ardour it prepares scaffolds; and is good and noble in the sight only when, embodied in armies, it falls courageously on hostile hosts. Let not despotism impute its crimes to liberty, for, under despotism itself, it was always as revolting as under the republic; but let us never cease to invoke the blessings of education and instruction for those barbarians, swarming in the heart of societies, and always ready to sully them with all enormities, at the beck of any influence and to the disgrace of any cause.

On the 25th November occurred also the death of the unfortunate Manuel, who had become, from procurator of the commune, a deputy in the convention, and who had announced his resignation after the trial of Louis XVI., because he was accused of having evaded the scrutiny. Before the tribunal he was charged with having instigated the massacres of September with the view of stimulating the departments against Paris. Upon Fouquier-Tinville devolved the task of conceiving such insidious calumnies, which were even more atrocious in character than the condemnation. On the same day was condemned the luckless General Brunet, for not having sent a part of his army of Nice before Toulon; and on the morrow, the 26th, death was pronounced against the victorious Houchard, for having failed to comprehend the plan traced out for him, and not having proceeded with sufficient rapidity upon the road to Furnes, so as to intercept the whole English army. His fault was egregious, but did not merit death.

These executions began to spread a general terror, and to render the reigning authority formidable. Consternation prevailed not only in the prisons, in the hall of the revolutionary tribunal, on the Place de la Revolution, but was every where predominant—in the markets and in the shops, where the maximum and the laws against forestalling had been recently brought into effective operation. We have already explained how the depreciation of assignats and the enhancement of commodities had led to the enactment of the maximum, with the design of restoring the proportion between produce and the circulating medium. The first consequences of this maximum were most disastrous, and caused a vast number of stores to be altogether closed. The tariff fixed for articles of necessity had only affected the stock lying with the retailer, and ready to pass from his hands into those of the consumer. But the retailer who had purchased from the wholesale merchant or the manufacturer before the institution of the maximum, and at a price higher than the new compulsory scale, suffered enormous loss, and raised bitter complaints. Nor was his loss much less even when he bought after the maximum, since in the rates assigned for articles styled of the first necessity, such only were designated as lay exposed for sale to the general community, and a price was fixed only upon those brought to this last stage of traffic. But nothing was said of the value they were to bear under the form of raw material, nor what was to be paid to the labourer who fabricated them, or to the carrier and navigator who transported them; consequently the retailer, who was compelled to furnish the consumer according to the tariff, but was unable to treat with the artisan, the manufacturer, or the wholesale trader, upon corresponding terms, fell into the impossibility of continuing so ruinous a traffic. The majority of the dealers closed their shops, or evaded the law by covin, vending at the maximum only the vilest wares, and reserving the good for those who repaired furtively to purchase at a fair and remunerating price.

The people, discerning this fraudulent manœuvre, and perceiving numerous shops shut up, broke into furious cries, and thronged to assail the commune with remonstrances, urging that all the dealers should be obliged to keep open their stores, and continue their trade whether willing or not. Disposed to complain of all, they denounced the butchers and pork-merchants, for buying animals diseased or accidentally killed, and not sufficiently bleeding the carcasses, with the intention of rendering the flesh heavier; the bakers, who, for the purpose of supplying fine flour to the rich, were charged with reserving the foul for the poor, and with not baking the bread sufficiently, in order to increase its weight; the wine merchants, for mixing villanous drugs with their liquors; the salt-sellers, for adulterating the quality of their commodity so as greatly to augment the weight; the grocers, and, in short, all the retailers, for deleteriously compounding their articles by a multitude of devices.

Of such abuses, some were of all times and inherent, others sprung from the peculiar crisis; but when impatience under calamity seizes upon the minds of men, their complaints are indiscriminating, and they are moved to reform and punish with sweeping violence.

The procurator-general Chaumette delivered on this topic a virulent oration against the dealers.

"We remember," said he, "that in 1789 and the following years all these men drove a flourishing trade; but with whom?—with the alien. We are aware they are the parties who caused assignats to fall, and that they have enriched themselves by means of stockjobbing upon the paper-money. What was their conduct after they had completed their fortunes? They retired from trade, they threatened the people with a dearth of commodities; but if they have gold and assignats, the republic has something more precious—it has arms. Hands and not gold are wanted to keep machines and manufactories in activity. If these men abandon their factories, the republic will seize upon them, and put in requisition all raw materials. Let them know that it depends on the republic to reduce, when it so wills, the gold and assignats in their coffers to dust and ashes. It may behove the giant of the people to crush these mercantile speculators.

We feel the calamities of the people, because we are of the people ourselves. The entire council is composed of sans-culottes—it is a popular legislature. Little does it concern us if our heads fall, provided posterity deigns to collect our skulls. It is not the gospel I shall invoke, but Plato. He who strikes with the sword, says that philosopher, shall perish by the sword; he who smites with poison, shall perish by poison; starvation shall waste him who would famish the people. If food and commodities be deficient, upon whom ought the people to fasten? Upon the constituted authorities? No. They will fall foul of contractors and purveyors. Rousseau, also, was of the people, and he said, When the people have nothing more to eat, they will eat the rich."*

Coercive measures lead to further stringent expedients, as we have previously had occasion to observe. In the first ordinances manufactured articles only were affected, but it was found essential to extend them to the raw material; even the idea of appropriating raw produce and manufacturing it for account of the republic, floated in the public mind. It is a redoubtable task to force nature and regulate all its movements. The obligation soon arises to supply the want of spontaneous action in all instances, and to replace the vital principle itself by commandments of the law. The commune and the convention were compelled to take additional measures, each according to its powers.

The commune of Paris obliged every dealer to declare the quantity of goods he possessed, the orders he had given for further supplies, and the expectation he indulged of their execution. Every dealer, carrying on business for a year past, who forsook or allowed it to languish, was declared suspected, and incarcerated as such. To obviate all confusion and obstruction, arising from eagerness to acquire stocks, the commune likewise directed that the consumer should apply to the retailer only, the retailer to the wholesale merchant, and it fixed the quantities each was competent to demand. Thus, for example, the grocer could exact from the wholesale dealer not more than twenty-five pounds of sugar at one time, and the lemonade-vender not more than twelve. The revolutionary committees exercised the duty of dispensing certificates of purchase, and apportioning the quantities. The regulations of the commune were not limited to these points. As the concourse at the doors of the bakers continued considerable, occasioning tumultuous scenes, and as many persons actually passed a part of the night waiting in the streets, Chaumette obtained an order that the distribution should commence with the last comers, which diminished neither the tumult nor the eagerness of the public. Moreover, as the people complained that the worst flour was reserved for them, it was ordained that in the whole city of Paris there should be but one sort of bread baked, composed of three parts wheat and one part rye. Finally, a commission of inspection was appointed, to ascertain the quality and condition of articles of consumption, to investigate frauds and punish them. These measures, being imitated by the other communes, often indeed embodied in decrees, speedily became general laws; and it was thus, as we have already intimated, that the commune of Paris exercised a prodigious influence over all that appertained to internal government and to the functions of police.

The convention, pressed to reform the law of the maximum, framed a new one, which no longer stopped at articles in the warerooms of shopkeepers, but struck them in their first condition. It directed that an account should be taken of the prices of produce in 1790 at the place of production. To such value were added—first, a third, an account of contingencies; secondly, a fixed price for the carriage from the place of production to that of consumption; and, thirdly, a sum of five per cent. for the profit of the wholesale merchant, and of ten per cent. for that of the retailer; from all which elements was to be henceforth determined the price of commodities of the first necessity. The local administrations were charged to undertake this labour, each for what was produced and consumed within its own jurisdiction. An indemnity was granted to every retail dealer who, having a capital of less than 10,000 francs, could prove that he had lost his capital by the operation of the maximum. The communes were to judge each case by inquisition, as all things were judged at that time, and at every other era of dictatorship. Thus the law, without yet descending to actual production, to the raw material, or to the manufacture, took commodities when ready for market, fixed their price, the cost of transport, the profit of the merchant and the retailer, and substituted, throughout the half at least of social operations, absolute rules for the variations of the natural course. But these ulterior steps, we repeat, resulted inevitably from the first maximum, the first maximum from the assignats, and the assignats from the imperative necessities of the revolution.

To enforce this system of government introduced into trade, the convention nominated a committee for food and supplies, whose authority was to extend over the whole republic, and which consisted of three members, enjoying almost equal importance with the ministers themselves, and possessing a voice at the council board. This committee was empowered to compel the observance of the tariffs, and to superintend the conduct of the communes in that respect; to cause perpetual statements to be furnished of the quantities of food and wares throughout France; to direct their transmission from one department to another; and to assign the requisitions for the armies, conformably to the celebrated decree which constituted the revolutionary government.

The financial situation was not less extraordinary than the rest of matters. The two loans, the one forced, the other voluntary, had been rapidly filled up.

* Commune, 14th October.

Great eagerness especially was manifested in contributing to the second, because the advantages it presented rendered it decidedly preferable; and thus the period was approaching when a thousand millions of assignats would be withdrawn from circulation. There were in the state coffers, for current charges, nearly four hundred millions, remaining from the old creations, and five hundred millions of royal assignats, returned in accordance with the decree which proscribed them, and converted into an equal amount of republican assignats. About nine hundred millions, therefore, were available to the public service.

It will appear surprising that the assignat, which was depreciated three-fourths, and even four-fifths, had risen to par with bullion. In that rebound, however, there was something factitious as well as real. The gradual suppression of a floating thousand millions, the success of the first levy, which had produced six hundred thousand men in the space of one month, and the last victories of the republic, which almost assured its existence, had stimulated the sale of national domains and restored some confidence in assignats, but not sufficient to place them on a level with the precious metals. The following are the causes which brought them, in appearance, to a par with specie. It will be remembered that a law prohibited, under severe penalties, all traffic in bullion, that is to say, the exchange at a loss of assignats for coin; and that another law also punished with heavy amercements him who should bargain for different prices in contracts, according as payment was intended in paper or specie. In consequence, gold or silver, when exchanged either for assignats or for merchandise, could not command its real value, and the only course left was to hoard it. But an additional enactment declared that all concealed money or jewels should belong, part to the state, part to the informer. Thenceforth, specie could be neither used in commerce nor privily retained; it became a burden, exposing the owner to the denunciation of "suspected," insomuch that men began to shun it, and to prefer assignats for current expenditure. Such were the circumstances that temporarily re-established the equilibrium, which had never really existed for the paper, even at the first moment of its emission. Many of the communes, subjoining their own regulations to the laws of the convention, had even prohibited the circulation of specie, and directed that it should be brought to the public coffers in order to be changed into assignats. The convention had certainly annulled all such peculiar ordinances on the part of communes, but nevertheless the general statutes promulgated by itself continued to render coin useless and dangerous. Numerous individuals carried it to the loan and the tax-gatherer, or paid it away to foreigners, who prosecuted a considerable traffic therein, frequenting the frontier towns to receive it in barter for merchandise. The Italians, and especially the Genoese, who imported large quantities of grain into France, scoured the ports of the Mediterranean, and purchased gold and silver articles at singularly low prices. Specie, therefore, had re-appeared in consequence of these terrible laws, and the party of revolutionary zealots, apprehensive lest its interference might again prove prejudicial to the paper-money, held that bullion, which had not hitherto been excluded from the circulation, ought to be entirely interdicted; they demanded that its transmission should be forbidden, and that it should be obligatory on all who possessed any to appear at the public offices for the purpose of exchanging their store for assignats.

Terror had almost banished stockjobbing. Speculations in specie were, as we have already shown, effectually suppressed. Foreign paper, anathematised on all sides, no longer circulated as two months previously; and the bankers, accused by every mouth of being the agents of the emigrants and of being addicted to stockjobbing, were in the utmost consternation. For an interval, a seal had been set upon their establishments; but the fact soon becoming evident how dangerous it might be to interrupt all banking operations, and thereby check the circulation of capitals, the seals were taken off. Nevertheless, the terror was sufficiently great to stifle all tendency to any species of speculation.

The India Company had been at length abolished. We have seen that certain intrigues had prevailed amongst divers deputies with the view of realising profit on the shares of that company. The Baron de Batz, in concert with Julien of Toulouse, Delaunay of Angers, and Chabot, formed a scheme to depreciate the shares by threatening motions, and then to buy in; afterwards, by milder motions, to induce a reaction, then to sell out, and by the operation secure all the gain of this fraudulent enhancement. The Abbé d'Espagnac, whose interests Julien advocated in the committee of contracts, was to lend the funds for these speculations. These wretches succeeded, in fact, in driving the shares down from 4500 to 650 livres, and reaped considerable profits. However, it was impossible to avert the abrogation of the company, wherefore they applied themselves to negotiate with it so as to mitigate the terms of suppression. Delaunay and Julien of Toulouse discussed the subject with its directors, and said to them, "If you give us such a sum, we will present such a decree; if not, we will present another very different." They agreed upon a sum of 500,000 francs, in consideration whereof they were, when proposing the dissolution of the company, which was unavoidable, to obtain for it the boon of winding up its own affairs, a process whereby its duration might be indefinitely prolonged. The bribe was to be divided amongst Delaunay, Julien of Toulouse, Chabot, and Bazire, to whom his friend Chabot had imparted the secret of the scheme, but who refused to participate in its spoils. Delaunay presented the decree of suppression on the 17th Vendemiaire. He therein proposed to dissolve the company, oblige it to refund the sums it owed to the state, and especially to pay the duty on transfers, which it had contrived to evade by transforming its shares into inscriptions in books. He finally proposed to leave to itself the care of liquidating its affairs. Fabre-d'Eglantine, to whom the intrigue had not yet been communicated, and who, as it would seem, was speculating in the opposite direction, immediately raised his voice against the latter clause, alleging, that to permit the company to liquidate its affairs, was to perpetuate it, since, under such a pretext, it might remain indefinitely in activity. He therefore advised that the government should be invested with the charge of that liquidation. Cambon moved, as a sub-amendment, that the state should not, by undertaking the liquidation, be held responsible for debts, if the assets of the company were unequal to its liabilities. The decree and the two amendments were adopted, and then remitted to the committee to be definitively framed. Thereupon the members in the plot conceived it would be expedient to gain Fabre, in order to obtain, by means of the remit, some modifications in the decree. Chabot was deputed to Fabre with 100,000 francs, and succeeded in winning him over. The following manœuvre was then perpetrated: The decree was drawn up such as it had been passed by the convention, and given for signature to Cambon and the members of the committee who were not confederates in the scheme. To this authentic copy were afterwards added certain words which completely altered the sense. To the clause upon transfers which had escaped the duty, whereby they were intended to be made subject to it, these words were subjoined—"except those fraudulently made;" which proviso revived all the pretensions of the company touching exemption from the duty. Into the paragraph affecting the liquidation, an interpolation was introduced—"according to the statutes and regulations of the company;" which brought the company forward in the management thereof. These insertions materially varied the purport of the decree. Chabot, Fabre, Delaunay, and Julien of Toulouse, subsequently affixed their names, and transmitted the falsified copy to the commission for publishing the laws, which caused it to be printed and promulgated as an authentic enactment. The confederates expected that the members who had signed before the alterations were introduced, would either forget or overlook the difference, and they complacently divided the sum of 500,000 francs. Bazire alone refused his share, stating that he would not partake the wages of turpitude.

Chabot, however, whose luxury began to attract censure, trembled at the consciousness of his guilt. He had hung the 100,000 francs, received for his participation, in a privy; and as his accomplices saw him ready to betray them, they threatened to be beforehand with him, and to reveal all if he abandoned them. Such was the issue of the shameful intrigue hatched between the Baron de Batz and three or four deputies. The universal terror pervading France, affecting the innocent as well as the culpable, extended to them, and they lived in constant dread of being discovered and punished.

Thus, for the moment at least, all speculative spirit was damped, and none were rash enough to think of entangling themselves in stockjobbing.

It was at this period, when no repugnance was felt at outraging all received ideas, all established habits, that the project of remodelling the system of weights and measures, and changing the calendar, was executed. The passion for regularity and contempt for obstacles were destined to signalise a revolution which partook so essentially both of the philosophical and political character. It had divided the territory into eighty-three equal portions; it had reduced to uniformity the civil, religious, and military administrations; it had annihilated all distinctions in the public debt; and it could not stop short in its career without regulating weights, measures, and the divisions of time. Doubtless that desire of uniformity, inflamed into the spirit of system, into fury even, too often provoked disregard for the necessary and pleasing varieties of nature: but it is only in such eras of zeal that the human mind grapples with and operates great and difficult reformations. The new system of weights and measures, one of the most admirable productions of the age, was the fruit of this bold spirit of innovation. The idea was acted upon of taking for unity in weight and for unity in measure natural and invariable quantities in all countries. Thus, distilled water was assumed as the unity of weight, and a part of the meridian as the unity of measure. These unities, multiplied or divided by ten, ad infinitum, formed that perfect system, known under the name of the decimal calculus.

Similar regularity was to be applied to the divisions of time; and the difficulty of subverting the habits of a nation on that point wherein they are most inveterate, failed to scare men so resolute as those who then presided over the destinies of France. They had already changed the Gregorian into the republican era, and fixed its date from the first year of liberty. They made the year and the new era commence on the 22d September 1792, a day which, by a fortunate conjuncture, was that of the institution of the republic and of the autumnal equinox. The year ought to have been divided into ten parts, in conformity with the decimal system; but taking as foundation for the division of months the twelve revolutions of the moon round the earth, it was necessary to admit twelve. In this instance nature rendered the infraction of the decimal system imperative. The month was of thirty days, divided into three portions of ten days, called decades, and equivalent to the four weeks. The tenth day of each decade was devoted to rest, supplying the place of the old Sunday. There was consequently a day of rest the less in the month. The Catholic religion had multiplied holidays to an inconvenient extent; the revolution, fostering labour, deemed it fitting to reduce them as much as possible. The months were called after the seasons to which they respectively belonged. The year commencing in autumn, the three first months belonged to that season: they were named—the first, Vendemiaire, the second, Brumaire, the third, Frimaire; the three next, occurring in winter, were designated Nivose, Pluviose, and Ventose; the three following, answering to spring, Germinal, Floreal, and Prairial; and the three last, comprehending summer, Messidor, Thermidor, and Fructidor. These twelve months, of thirty days each, only made three hundred and sixty days in all. There remained five days to complete the year; these were called complementary, and the egregious idea was entertained of setting them apart for national festivals, under the title of sans-culottides, an appellation judged essential in deference to the times, and one not at all more absurd than many others adopted by communities. The first was to be consecrated to genius; the second, to labour; the third, to glorious actions; the fourth, to rewards; and the fifth, to opinion. This last festival, perfectly original and excellently adapted to the French character, was intended as a species of political carnival for twenty-four hours, during which it should be allowable to say and write with impunity, concerning every public man, whatever imagination might suggest to the people or to writers. It was, as it were, opinion doing justice upon opinion itself, and imposing upon magistrates the necessity of shielding themselves by virtuous lives from the shafts both of truth and calumny on that day. Nothing could be grander, or in a moral sense more effective, than such an idea. We must not, because an overpowering destiny has swept away the opinions and institutions of that era, visit with ridicule its bold and vast conceptions. The Romans are not amenable to ridicule, because on days of triumph the soldier, placed behind the chariot of the triumphant general, had full license given to all his hatred or rude wit prompted. Every four years, the bissextile year giving six complementary days in lieu of five, that sixth sans-culottide was appointed to be held as the festival of the revolution, and to be set apart for a grand solemnity, in which the French should gather to celebrate the epoch of their enfranchisement and the institution of the republic.

The day was divided, according to the decimal system, into ten portions or hours, these into ten other subdivisions, and so further. New dials were ordered to bring this novel mode of calculating time into practical operation; nevertheless, in order to avoid forcing every thing at once, this latter reform was postponed for a year.

The last innovation, the most hazardous of all, and the most denounced as tyrannical, was that attempted with regard to public worship. The revolutionary laws relative to religion had remained almost exactly as the Constituent Assembly had made them. It will be recollected that that first assembly, with the view of reducing the ecclesiastical to the uniformity of the civil administration, determined that the boundaries of dioceses should be the same as those of the departments; that the bishop should be elected like all other functionaries; and, in short, without interfering with dogmas, that church discipline should be regulated, in like manner as had been every part of the political organisation. Such was the civil constitution of the clergy, to which ecclesiastics were obliged to swear obedience. From that moment, as the reader will remember, a schism arose; the priests who conformed to the new institution were called constitutional or juring, and they who rejected it, refractory priests. These latter were merely deprived of their functions and endowed with a pension. The Legislative Assembly, perceiving that they laboured diligently to poison opinion and array it against the new system, subjected them to the supervision of the departmental authorities, and even issued a decree that upon a sentence from such authorities they might be banished from the territory of France. The convention, eventually more severe in proportion as their conduct became more seditious, condemned all refractory priests to exile. The excitement in the public mind augmenting every day, men began to ask why, when all the old monarchical superstitions were abolished, they should still retain a phantom of religion, in which scarcely any one even professed to believe, and which formed an unseemly contrast to the new institutions and the new manners of republican France. Previously, demands had been made for laws in favour of married priests, and for protecting them against certain local administrations, which attempted to degrade them from the ecclesiastical office. The convention, exhibiting a marked reserve on the subject, had abstained from passing any enactment regarding them, but by its mere silence it had authorised them to preserve their functions and revenues. Moreover, in certain petitions the convention was entreated to withdraw all further support from any sect, to leave each to remunerate its own ministers, to prohibit external ceremonies, and to oblige all religions to confine themselves within their temples. It contented itself with curtailing the income of bishops to the maximum of 6000 francs, seeing that the revenues of some amounted to 70,000. As to all the rest required from it, the convention would adopt no steps, observing a discreet silence, and leaving France itself to take the initiative in the abolition of religious observances. It was apprehensive, should it, the supreme power, interfere with creeds, that a portion of the population, still attached to the Catholic religion, might be rendered discontented. The commune of Paris, less scrupulous, seized the favourable opportunity for a signal overthrow of old ideas, and hastened to present the first public example of the abjuration of Catholicism..

Whilst the patriots of the convention and the Jacobin Club, Robespierre, Saint-Just, and the other revolutionary leaders, stopped short at deism, Chaumette, Hébert, and all the notables of the commune and the Cordelier Club, standing in a lower capacity both as to functions and to enlightenment, were sure, according to the ordinary law in all such cases, to overleap the boundary and rush into the darkness of atheism. They did not, indeed, openly profess such a doctrine, but it might be readily surmised in them: never in their discourses or their writings did they pronounce the name of God, and they perpetually repeated that a nation ought to be governed by reason alone, and admit no other worship than that of reason. Chaumette was not the villanous or ambitious character that Hébert might be justly described; he sought not, by inflaming to extravagance the predominant feelings, to supplant the actual chiefs of the revolution; but, devoid of political views, possessed by a vulgar philosophy, urged by an extraordinary craving for declamation, he preached, with the ardour and spiritual pride of a missionary, morals, labour, patriotic virtues, and reason, in fine, invariably abstaining from all mention of the Supreme Being. He had inveighed with vehemence against the popular pillages; he had sternly reprimanded the women who neglected the care of their households to take part in political contentions, and been courageous enough to shut up their club; he had promoted the abolition of mendicity, and the establishment of public workshops to provide the poor with adequate employment; he had raised his voice against female prostitution, and procured an ordinance of the commune disallowing the profession of common women, every where tolerated as an inevitable evil. Those wretched creatures were forbidden to show themselves in public, and even to exercise in the privacy of houses their deplorable calling. Chaumette maintained that they were incidental only to monarchical and Catholic countries, where lazy aristocrats and unmarried priests abounded, and that industry and marriage would ensure their disappearance from republics.

Chaumette, therefore, leading the way in advocacy of the system of reason, inveighed at the commune against the publicity of the Catholic worship. He maintained that it involved a privilege which no sect was entitled to enjoy more than another, and that if all religious persuasions possessed such a faculty, the streets and public places would shortly become the scenes of ridiculous exhibitions. The commune holding the local police, he moved it to enjoin, on the 23d Vendemiaire (14th October), that the ministers of no religion whatsoever should be allowed to celebrate rites without the walls of temples. He enforced also the institution of new ceremonies for rendering the last duties to the dead. The friends and relatives of the deceased were alone to follow the corpse. All religious symbols were obliterated in the cemeteries, and replaced by a statue of Sleep, according to the example furnished by Fouché in the department of the Allier. Instead of cypresses and other lugubrious vegetables, the cemeteries were planted with cheerful and odoriferous shrubs. "The beauty and perfume of flowers," said Chaumette, "ought to awaken agreeable recollections: I would, were it possible, that I could inhale the spirit of my father." All the external marks of worship were entirely abolished. It was moreover decided, in the same ordinance, and still on the requisition of Chaumette, that for the future no sales should be permitted on the streets of any kinds of jugglery, such as consecrated winding-sheets, handkerchiefs of Saint Veronica, Ecce-homos, crosses, Agnus-Dei's, virgins, corns and rings of Saint-Hubert, nor in like manner, of powders, medicinal waters, and other quack drugs. The image of the Virgin was every where thrown down, and all the Madonnas found in niches or at the corners of streets were replaced by busts of Marat and Lepelletier.

Anacharsis Clootz, that Prussian baron who, with an income of 100,000 livres, had abandoned his country for the capital of France, as the representative, so he said, of the human race; who had figured in the federation of 1790 at the head of the pretended envoys from all the nations of the earth; and who had been subsequently nominated a deputy to the National Convention—he, this Anacharsis Clootz, was incessantly heard extolling universal republicanism and the worship of reason. Full of these two ideas, he dilated upon them without intermission in his writings, and, sometimes in manifestos, sometimes in addresses, he recommended them to all populations. Deism appeared in his understanding equally culpable with Catholicism itself; he never ceased to propose the destruction of tyrants and of every species of divinity; and asserted that there ought to remain with enfranchised and enlightened humanity nought but pure reason, and its beneficent and immortal creed. He said to the convention:

"I have only been able to escape all sacred and profane tyrants by continual wayfaring: I was at Rome when they sought to incarcerate me at Paris, and I was at London when they were seeking to burn me at Lisbon. It was thus, by being tossed from one end of Europe to the other, that I escaped alguazils and spies, masters and slaves. My emigrations ceased when the emigration of miscreants commenced. In the capital of the globe, at Paris, was the post of the orator of the human race. I have not quitted it since 1789; it was then that I redoubled my zeal against the pretended sovereigns of heaven and earth. I openly preached that there was no other god but nature, no other monarch but the human race—the people-god. The people are every thing to themselves, they will never stoop. Nature bends not the knee before herself. Judge of the majesty of the free human race by that of the French people, who form of it but a fraction. Judge of the infallibility of all by the wisdom of a portion, which, of itself alone, makes the enslaved world tremble. The surveillance committee of the universal republic will have less trouble than the committee of the smallest section in Paris. A general confidence will succeed universal distrust. In my republic there will be few officials, few imposts, and no executioner. Reason will unite all men in a single representative cluster, without other tie than epistolary correspondence. Citizens, religion is the only obstacle to this Utopia; the time is arrived for eradicating it. The human race has burnt its leading-strings. Nations only evince vigour, says one of the ancients, on the day succeeding a bad reign. Let us profit by this first day, which we will prolong until the morrow of the world's deliverance."

The motions of Chaumette reanimated all the hopes of Clootz: he hastened in quest of Gobel, a restless intriguer from Porentruy, who had become constitutional bishop of the department of Paris by that same rapid movement which had raised Chaumette, Hébert, and so many others to the highest municipal functions. He represented to him that the moment had arrived for abjuring, in the face of France, the Catholic faith, whereof he was the chief pontiff; that his example would sway all the ministers of religion, enlighten the nation, provoke a general abjuration, and compel the convention to pronounce the abolition of Christianity. Gobel declined to renounce his faith exactly, and thereby declare that he had been deceiving mankind all his life; but he consented to abdicate his episcopacy, and subsequently induced his vicars to follow the example. It was consequently agreed with Chaumette and the members of the departmental directory, that all the constituted authorities of Paris should accompany Gobel, and form part of the deputation, in order to give more solemnity to the act of renunciation.

On the 17th Brumaire (7th November 1793), Momoro, Pache, L'Huillier, Chaumette, Gobel and all his clergy, repaired to the convention. Chaumette and L'Huillier, both procurators, the one of the commune and the other of the department, announced that the clergy of Paris had come to render a signal and ingenuous homage to reason. They then introduced Gobel. He, bonneted with the red cap, and holding in his hand his mitre, crosier, cross, and ring, addressed the assembly. "Born a plebeian," said he, "an incumbent in Porentruy, sent by my brother clergy to the first assembly, and ultimately elevated to the archbishopric of Paris, I have never ceased to obey the people. I accepted the duties which the people formerly confided to me; and to-day I again obey them by attending to resign them. I became a bishop when the people wanted bishops; I cease to be one now when the people are tired of them." Gobel added that all his clergy, animated by the like sentiments, authorised him to make a similar declaration on their behalf. On concluding these words, he laid down his mitre, cross, and ring. His clergy testified their approbation. The president replied to him, with much address, that the convention had decreed the freedom of religion, which it had left unshackled to every sect, and that it had never interfered with articles of faith, but that it applauded men who, enlightened by reason, were moved to abjure their errors and superstitions.

Gobel had not renounced the priesthood and Catholicism, nor ventured to declare himself an impostor who had been eventually induced to avow his falsehood; but others stretched his declaration to that extent. "Redeemed," said the incumbent of Vaugirard, "from the prejudices which fanaticism had planted in my heart and in my mind, I cast down my letters of ordination." Divers bishops and priests, members of the convention, followed this example, and deposited their letters of ordination, or abjured Catholicism. Julien of Toulouse likewise shook off his gown as a Protestant minister. Vociferous plaudits from the assembly and the galleries greeted these renunciations. At this moment, Gregoire, Bishop of Blois, entered the convention. He was informed of what had passed, and many urged him to imitate the conduct of his colleagues. He refused with courage. "Is the question concerning the income attached to the office of bishop?" said he; "if so, I give it up without regret. Does it concern my quality as a priest and bishop? I cannot divest myself of it; my faith forbids me. I invoke the liberty of religion." The words of Gregoire were closed amidst tumult, but they scarcely checked the extravagant joy otherwise excited by the scene. The deputation quitted the assembly amidst an immense crowd, and proceeded to the town-hall, in order to receive the felicitations of the commune.

So flagrant an example once given, it was not difficult to instigate the sections of Paris and all the communes in the republic to imitate it. The sections speedily gathered, indeed, and appeared at the bar of the convention to declare, one after the other, that they renounced all the errors of superstition, and recognised for the future but one creed, that of reason. The section of L'Homme-Armé averred that it acknowledged no other creed than that of truth and reason, no other fanaticism than that of liberty and equality, no other dogma than that of fraternity and the republican laws decreed since the 31st May 1793. The section of La Réunion announced that it purposed to make a bonfire of all the confessionals and all the books used by Catholics, and to shut up the church of Saint-Méry. The section of William Tell renounced for ever the creed of error and falsehood, as it stated. The section of Mucius-Scævola abjured Catholicism, and intimated its intention the following decade, on the chief altar of Saint-Sulpice, to celebrate the inauguration of the busts of Marat, Lepelletier, and Mucius-Scævola. The section of Pikes would henceforth adore no other god than the god of liberty and equality. The section of the Arsenal likewise foreswore the Catholic faith.

Thus the sections, taking the initiative, abjured Catholicism as the public religion, and appropriated its edifices and property, as resolving into the communal domain. The deputies on mission in the departments had already induced a number of the communes to seize upon the moveables in the churches, which, they alleged, were not necessary to religion, and in truth belonged to the state as public property, and were legally available to its exigencies. Fouché had transmitted from the department of the Allier several boxes of plate, and similar spoils had arrived from divers other departments. The example was not lost on Paris and its environs; and the bar of the convention was speedily choked with the rich fruits of this new-born zeal. All the churches were stripped, and the various communes sent deputations with the gold and silver accumulated in the niches of saints, or in places consecrated by the piety of foregone ages. They repaired in processions to the convention, and the populace, indulging in their tendency to burlesque, parodied in most fantastic forms the rites of religion, and found as much pleasure in profaning as they had ever done in celebrating them. Men clothed in surplices, hoods, and copes, chanting hallelujahs and dancing the carmagnole, came to the bar of the convention, where they deposited glories, crucifixes, chalices, and statues of gold and silver, pronouncing burlesque orations, and often addressing to the saints themselves strange and ludicrous invocations. "Oh ye, instruments of fanaticism!" exclaimed a deputation from St Denis, "blessed saints of all kinds, be at length patriots; rise in a body, serve the country by proceeding to the mint to be melted, and promote our happiness in this world as you would fain do in the next." To such scenes of mirth succeeded upon some sudden impulse occurrences disposing, at that time, to respect and emotion. Those same personages who trod under foot the saints of Christianity, appeared bearing a canopy; throwing open the curtains and showing the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, they said, "Behold, not gods made by men, but the images of respectable citizens, assassinated by the slaves of kings!" The processions subsequently defiled before the convention, still chanting the hallelujah and dancing the carmagnole, and marched to deposit the rich spoils of the altar at the mint, and the venerated busts of Marat and Lepelletier in the churches, now become the temples of a new faith.

At the instance of Chaumette, it was determined that the metropolitan cathedral of Notre-Dame should be converted into a republican edifice, to be called the Temple of Reason; and a festival was instituted for every tenth day, intended as a substitute for the Catholic ceremonies of the Sunday. The mayor, the municipal officers, and other public functionaries, repaired to the Temple of Reason, read aloud the Declaration of the Rights of Man, as also the Constitutional Act, communicated an analysis of the tidings from the armies, and recounted the important events that had occurred in the course of the decade. A mouth of truth, similar to the mouths of denunciation usual in Venice, was placed in the Temple of Reason, with the view of receiving suggestions, reproaches, or opinions useful to the commonwealth. These notes were collected every tenth day, and read aloud for public edification; an orator delivered a moral discourse, after which pieces of music were executed, and the whole concluded by the congregation singing republican hymns. In the temple two galleries were reserved, the one for old men, the other for pregnant women, decorated with these words—"Reverence for age—Respect and attention to pregnant women."

The first festival of Reason was celebrated with pomp on the 20th Brumaire (November 10). All the sections attended it in conjunction with the constituted authorities. A young woman personated the goddess of Reason; she was the wife of the printer Momoro, one of the friends of Vincent, Ronsin, Chaumette, Hébert, and similar personages. She was clad in white drapery, a sky blue mantle hung over her shoulders, and her luxuriant hair was crowned with the cap of liberty. She was seated on an antique chair adorned with ivy, and borne by four citizens. Young girls, dressed in white and crowned with roses, preceded and followed the goddess. Then came the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, musicians, troops, and all the armed sections. Speeches were delivered and hymns chanted in the Temple of Reason, and the procession moved on to the convention, which assembly Chaumette addressed in these words:—

"Legislators—fanaticism has given place to reason. Its craven eyes have been unable to bear the lustre of light. To-day an immense concourse has been gathered under those Gothic arches, which for the first time have served as the echo of truth. There the French have celebrated the only true worship—that of liberty and reason. There we have offered vows for the success of the republican arms. There, in fine, we have abandoned inanimate idols for reason—for this animated image, the masterpiece of nature." As he uttered these words, Chaumette pointed to the living goddess of Reason. The young and beautiful female who represented it descended from her seat, and advanced to the president, who gave her the fraternal embrace amidst universal bravos, and shouts of "The republic for ever!" "Reason for ever!" "Down with fanaticism!" The convention, which had hitherto abstained from directly countenancing these performances, was hurried away and obliged to follow the procession, which again returned to the Temple of Reason, and sang within it a solemn patriotic anthem. Important intelligence, avouching the recapture of Noirmoutiers from Charette, augmented the general rapture, and supplied a more substantial motive for it than the downfal of fanaticism.

All reflect, doubtless, with disgust upon such scenes, devoid of true emotion, hollow and spurious, wherein a populace changed its creed without comprehending either the old or the new. But when is the populace sincere? When is it capable of understanding the dogmas that are given it to believe? What are its cravings ordinarily? Large assemblages which gratify its passion for congregating; symbolical spectacles whereby it is continually impressed with the idea of a power superior to its own; and festivals in which homage is rendered to men who have the nearest approached to the good, the glorious, the grand—in a word, temples, ceremonies, and saints. Here, then, were temples, Reason, Marat, and Lepelletier. It had assembled, adored a mysterious power, and celebrated the memory of two men. All its longings, therefore, were satisfied, and it only gave way to that wherewith it is swayed at all periods.

If we calmly contemplate the condition of France at this epoch, we cannot but remark that never was constraint exercised with such crushing weight as at present upon that inert and patient part of the population, whereon all political experiments are tried. Men no longer ventured to hazard an opinion; they feared to see even their friends and relatives, lest they might be compromised with them, and lose liberty if not life itself. One hundred thousand arrests, and a few hundreds of condemnations, rendered always present to the imaginations of twenty-five millions of Frenchmen the jail and the guillotine. The general taxes exigible were felt oppressive; but if an individual chanced, according to a purely arbitrary classification, to be inscribed in the list of rich, he lost for that year a material portion of his income. Sometimes, upon the requisition of a representative or of any agent whatsoever, he was bound to surrender his harvest, or his most precious moveables in gold and silver, as the case might be. None presumed to affect any degree of luxury, or to indulge in outward pleasures. Specie laboured under a ban, and might not be safely used: it was necessary to accept or disburse a depreciated paper, wherewith it was difficult to procure such articles as were needful. The merchant felt himself coerced to sell at a ruinous price; the consumer had to content himself with the worst of commodities, since the really good fled markets possessed by the maximum and assignats; sometimes, indeed, he was fain to dispense with any at all, for at times both good and bad were equally withdrawn. By both rich and poor was obtainable only one species of brown bread, to be struggled for at the doors of the bakers after a dreary expectancy of several hours. The designations of weights and measures, the names of months and days, were changed; only three Sundays instead of four were permitted in the lunar revolution; and, in fine, women and old men suddenly found themselves deprived of those religious ceremonies which they had been accustomed to attend all their lives.

Never, then, in the history of the world, did power more violently assail all the cherished habits of a nation. Menacing all existences, decimating fortunes, regulating coercively the course of exchanges, altering the appellations of familiar objects, abrogating the offices of religion, it was without contradiction the most atrocious of tyrannies; but we are bound to consider the danger of the state, the inevitable hazards of trade, and the spirit of system inseparable from the spirit of innovation.

CHAPTER XXIX.

RETURN OF DANTON.—DIVISIONS IN THE PARTY OF THE MOUNTAIN.—ABOLITION OF THE WORSHIP OF REASON.—FINAL CONSOLIDATION OF THE REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.—ARREST OF RONSIN, VINCENT, AND FOREIGN EMISSARIES.

SINCE the fall of the Girondists, the Mountaineer party, remaining alone and victorious, had begun to break into factions. The constantly growing excesses of the revolution produced a more decided division, which was on the verge of resolving into a complete rupture. Several deputies had been painfully affected at the unworthy fate of the Girondists, of Bailly, of Brunet, of Houchard; others blamed the violences perpetrated with respect to religion, judging them most impolitic and dangerous. These maintained that new superstitions would inevitably succeed those so frantically decried; that the pretended creed of reason was no other than that of atheism; that atheism could not consist with any nation; and that such extravagances must be instigated by foreign gold. On the other hand, the party predominant at the Cordelier Club and the commune, which boasted Hébert as its literary champion, Ronsin and Vincent as its leaders, Chaumette and Clootz as its apostles, upheld that its adversaries were intent on resuscitating a moderate faction, and provoking fresh discords in the republic.

Danton had returned from his retreat. He avoided declaring his opinion; but a party-leader would in vain strive to conceal it; it was whispered from ear to ear, and soon became obvious to all comprehensions. It was notorious that he had desired to avert the execution of the Girondists, and that he had been deeply moved at their tragical end; it was known that, though the partisan and inventor of revolutionary means, he began to censure their blind and ferocious employment; that the system of violence seemed to him unnecessarily prolonged after the cessation of danger; and that at the conclusion of the present campaign, and upon the entire expulsion of the foreign foe, he was solicitous to see restored the reign of mild and equitable laws. None were as yet bold enough to attack him in the tribune of the clubs; even Hébert presumed not to assail him in his sheet "Père Duchêne;" but by word of mouth the most insidious reports were circulated: suspicions were hinted as to his probity; the exactions in Belgium were recalled with most industrious perfidy, and partly charged upon him; during his retreat at Arcis-sur-Aube, indeed, malicious rumour had averred the fact of his emigration with hoards of wealth. With him were associated, as equally reprehensible, Camille-Desmoulins, his friend, who had partaken his commiseration for the Girondists and defended Dillon; and Philippeaux, who had returned from La Vendée furious against disorganisers, and intent on denouncing Ronsin and Rossignol. Moreover, in his party were classed all those who, in any manner, had discountenanced the revolutionary zealots, whereof the number was beginning to grow somewhat considerable.

Julien of Toulouse, previously regarded with jealousy in consequence of his connexion with D'Espagnac and the contractors, had completely compromised himself by a report on the federalist administrations, in which he laboured to extenuate the faults of the great majority. He had no sooner presented it than the Jacobins and Cordeliers in multitudinous deputations obliged him to withdraw it. They instituted an inquiry into his private life upon the occasion, when the fact transpired that he passed his time with stockjobbers, and that he maintained as his mistress an abandoned countess; whereupon they denounced him as thoroughly corrupt, and as an undisguised moderate. Fabre-d'Eglantine, too, was observed to have suddenly altered his mode of life, and to display a luxury altogether unwonted in him heretofore. Chabot, the well-known capuchin, who, when first mingling in the revolution, possessed nothing beyond his ecclesiastical pittance, likewise surprised the community by ostentatious decorations in his mansion, and by espousing the sister of the two Freys with a portion of 200,000 livres. So startling a change of circumstances suggested doubts touching the honesty of the newly enriched; and in a short time a proposition they submitted to the convention effectually sealed their ruin. A deputy, Osselin, had been recently arrested for harbouring an emigrant, as it was alleged. Fabre, Chabot, Julien, and Delaunay, who were not at ease as to themselves—Bazire and Thuriot, who had no cause for self-reproach, but who saw with alarm that all respect for members of the convention was cast aside—proposed a decree enacting that no deputy could be arrested without being preliminarily heard at the bar. This decree was adopted, but all the clubs and the Jacobins reclaimed with fury, maintaining it was a covert scheme to re-establish the inviolability. They caused it to be rescinded, and forthwith commenced a severe scrutiny touching those who had introduced it, both as to their course of life and the origin of their rapid fortunes. Julien, Fabre, Chabot, Delaunay, Bazire, and Thuriot, stripped of all popularity within the briefest interval, were ranked in the party of "equivocals and moderates." Hébert exhausted the vocabulary of abuse on their heads in his journal, and recommended them to the execrations of the populace.

Four or five other personages fell under the same anathema, although hitherto reputed exemplary patriots. These were Proli, Pereyra, Gusman, Dubuisson, and Desfieux. Almost all denizens of a foreign soil, they had been moved, like the two Freys and Clootz, to cast themselves into the French revolution by enthusiasm, and probably likewise by the expectation of acquiring wealth. So long as they worked diligently in the onward cause of the revolution, the question of who they were was never started. Proli, who belonged to Brussels, had been sent with Pereyra and Desfieux to the camp of Dumouriez, in order to sound his intentions. They succeeded in drawing from him an explanation; and returned, as we have previously recounted, to denounce him to the convention and the Jacobin Club. So far all was well; but they had been subsequently employed by Lebrun, because, being foreigners and well-informed men, they were able to render essential services in the department of foreign affairs. By communication with Lebrun, they learned to estimate his qualities, and at a later period they warmly defended him. Proli had enjoyed opportunities of appreciating Dumouriez, and notwithstanding the defection of that commander, he had persisted in extolling his talents, and in maintaining that he might have been preserved to the republic. Furthermore, nearly all of them, possessing superior knowledge as to the dispositions of other countries, had blamed the application of the Jacobin system to Belgium and other provinces united to France. Their words were treasured for the evil day; and when a general distrust evoked a belief in the secret intervention of an alien faction, men began to suspect them and to quote their past declarations. It was known that Proli was the natural son of Kaunitz, and he was surmised to be the leading plotter, the whole of them being at once set down as spies of Pitt and Cobourg. The popular wrath speedily wore a more threatening aspect; and the very exaggeration of their patriotic pretensions, which they deemed calculated to establish their justification, only served to compromise them the more. They were universally classed with the equivocals and moderates.

Thus it came to pass, that when Danton or his friends hazarded an observation on the faults of the ministerial agents, or on the violences exhibited towards the cause of religion, the Hébert, Vincent, and Ronsin party retorted by vociferations against moderation, corruption, and foreign factions. According to custom, the moderates threw back the accusation on their adversaries, saying to them—"It is you who are the accomplices of these foreigners: every thing avouches your confederacy—the common violence of your language, and the manifest design of uprooting all social order by driving things to the worst. Behold," continued they, "that commune arrogating a legislative authority, and enacting laws under the specious title of resolutions; extending its regulations to all matters, police, trade, religion; substituting, of its own motion, one creed for another; replacing the old by new superstitions; openly preaching atheism; and enforcing its example on all the municipalities in the republic. Behold those offices of the war department, whence emerge a multitude of agents who infest the provinces, upholding rivalry with the representatives, committing deplorable excesses, and shaming the revolution by their conduct. We say, look at that commune and those offices: what are their designs, if not to usurp both legislative and executive authority, to neutralise the convention and its committees, and to dissolve the government? And who can urge them to such an aim but the foreigner?"

Amidst these agitations and quarrels, the supreme authority was preparing to assume a stern course of action. Robespierre held, with all the committee, that such mutual accusations were extremely dangerous. His policy, as we have already intimated, had, since the 31st May, consisted in preventing a fresh revolutionary outbreak, in rallying opinion around the convention, and the convention itself around the committee of public welfare, so as to concentrate a strong governing power; and for these his purposes he had used the Jacobins, then all-powerful over opinion. The imputations cast upon well-accredited patriots, such as Danton and Camille-Desmoulins, seemed to him pregnant with hazard. He began to fear that no reputation might withstand the assaults of frenzied agitators; he was apprehensive, too, that the violences with regard to religion might indispose a part of France, and cause the revolution to be identified with atheism; and, lastly, in all this confusion he thought he detected the hand of the foreigner. In this mood, he failed not to seize the opportunity, which Hébert soon afforded him, of explaining his sentiments at the Jacobin Club.

The views of Robespierre had partly transpired. A rumour was secretly propagated that he intended to direct the stream of obloquy against Pache, Hébert, Chaumette, and Clootz, the authors of the movement against religion. Proli, Desfieux, and Pereyra, already compromised and threatened, determined to unite their cause with that of Pache, Chaumette, and Hébert; with which intention they visited the latter, and pointed out to them that since a conspiracy was formed against the best patriots, and all were equally in danger, it behoved them to support and vindicate each other. Hébert forthwith repaired to the Jacobin Club, the 1st Frimaire (21st November), and complained of a plan in agitation tending to divide the patriots. "On all sides," said he, "I meet persons who congratulate me on not being arrested. It is reported that Robespierre has resolved to denounce me—me, Chaumette, and Pache. As to me, who daily put myself forward in the cause of the country, and who utter every thing that comes into my head, the rumour may have some foundation; but Pache!—I know all the regard Robespierre has for him, and I cast any such idea far from me. It has been likewise stated that Danton had emigrated, that he had gone into Switzerland loaded with the spoils of the people. I met him this morning at the Tuileries; and since he is in Paris, he ought to come and fraternally explain himself to the Jacobins. All patriots are bound to repudiate injurious statements circulated respecting them." Hébert subsequently asserted that he derived a portion of this information from Dubuisson, who had offered to unfold to him a conspiracy hatching against the patriots; and, adhering to the usage of throwing all odium on the vanquished, he added that the cause of the troubles lay in the accomplices of Brissot who were still alive, and in the Bourbons remaining at the Temple.

Robespierre succeeded him at the tribune. "Is it true," said he, "that our most dangerous enemies are the impure remnants of our tyrants' race? I pray with all my heart for the disappearance of the race of tyrants from the earth, but can I be blind to the situation of my country, disposed to believe that such an event would suffice to extinguish the flames of those conspiracies now distracting us? Who will be persuaded that the punishment of Capet's contemptible sister would have a more imposing effect on our enemies than that of Capet himself and his guilty consort?

Is it, moreover, true that the cause of our calamities is fanaticism? Fanaticism! it is expiring—I may even say that it is dead. When directing all our attention for many days in opposing it, have you not diverted our vigilance from the real sources of danger? You are afraid of priests, and they are all alacrity to throw aside their calling, so that they may exchange it for the prerogatives of municipal officers, administrators, and even of presidents of popular societies. They were formerly much attached to the pastoral office, when it produced them 70,000 livres a-year; but they have abjured it when it is not worth more than 6000. Ay, dread not their fanaticism, but their ambition—not the habit which they wore, but the new skin which they have assumed. Dismiss your apprehensions as to the old superstition, but beware the new and corrupt superstition which is insidiously affected to promote our ruin!"

Then Robespierre, entering upon the subject of religion in the frankest mood, added:

"When citizens, animated by a pure zeal, come to deposit on the altar of the country the useless and ostentatious monuments of superstition, in order that they may be made serviceable to the triumphs of liberty, the country and reason approve such offerings; but by what right have aristocracy and hypocrisy ventured to mingle their baneful influence with that of civism? By what right have men, unknown to this day in the career of the revolution, come forward, amidst all these events, studying the means of usurping a false popularity, drawing patriots themselves into wayward measures, and exciting amongst us trouble and discord? By what right do they appear to challenge the liberty of religious faith in the name of liberty, and assail fanaticism by a new and worse fanaticism? By what right have they caused the solemn homage paid to pure truth to degenerate into a revolting and contemptible farce?

Many have supposed that the convention, by welcoming certain civic offerings, had actually proscribed the Catholic worship. No; the convention has not adopted that step, and never will. Its intention is to maintain the liberty in matters of conscience it has long ago proclaimed, and at the same time to keep all those in check who would abuse that liberty to disturb public order. It will not permit the peaceable ministers of the different persuasions to be persecuted; and it will also punish them with severity whensoever they shall dare to turn their functions into means of public delusion, and to instigate prejudices or royalism against the republic.

There are men who would go much farther; who, under pretext of eradicating superstition, would make a species of religion out of atheism itself. Every philosopher, every individual, can adopt such opinion upon the subject as he pleases; whoever should attempt to charge it upon him as a crime, must be a fool; but the public man, the legislator, would be a tenfold greater fool who should adopt such a system. The National Convention abhors it. The convention is not a fabricator of books or systems. It is a political and popular body. Atheism is aristocratic. The idea of a great being, who watches over oppressed innocence and punishes triumphant crime, is truly popular. The people, the unfortunate, will applaud me; if I find censors, it will be amongst the rich and the criminal. I have been, from boyhood, but an indifferent Catholic; I have never been a cold friend or a faithless defender of humanity. I am only the more attached to those moral and political ideas I have but now propounded to you. If God did not exist, it would be fitting to invent him."

Robespierre, after delivering this profession of faith, imputed to foreign intrigues the persecutions instituted against religion, and the calumnies propagated against undoubted patriots. Being of a singularly distrustful character, as his belief that the Girondists were royalists well avouches, he put implicit credit in the existence of a foreign faction, which, as we have previously explained, was only represented by a few spies distributed amongst the armies, and by certain bankers, the upholders of stockjobbing and the correspondents of emigrants. "The foreigner," said he, "has two sorts of armies: the one on our frontiers is powerless and on the verge of ruin, thanks to our victories; the other, more dangerous, is in the midst of us. It is an army of spies, of suborned knaves, who creep in every where, even into the bosom of our popular societies. It is this faction which persuaded Hébert that I designed to provoke the arrest of Pache, Chaumette, Hébert, the whole commune, in short. I assail Pache!—I, who have always admired and vindicated his manly and modest virtue, and have fought for him against Brissot and his accomplices!"

Robespierre praised Pache, and was silent as to Hébert. He contented himself with saying that he had not forgotten the services of the commune during the days liberty was in peril. Subsequently venting his wrath upon what he styled the foreign faction, he turned the rage of the Jacobins against Proli, Dubuisson, Pereyra, and Desfleux. He recapitulated their history, and pourtrayed them as agents of Lebrun and the foreigner, commissioned to envenom animosities, to sow discord amongst the patriots, and to stimulate them into actual conflict. From the terms in which he expressed himself, it was obvious that the hatred he harboured against the former friends of Lebrun entered largely into the elements of his distrustful aversion. In conclusion, he prevailed to have all four expelled the society, amidst vociferous plaudits; and he proposed, moreover, a purifying scrutiny applicable to all the Jacobins.

Thus did Robespierre strike with his anathema the new worship, reading a severe lesson to all froward intermeddlers; not only avoiding to praise Hébert, but intimating significantly his dissatisfaction with the vile editor; and directing the whole storm against certain foreigners who were unfortunate enough to have been friends of Lebrun, to have admired Dumouriez, and to have censured the political system adopted in conquered countries. Furthermore, he had secured to himself the recomposition of the entire society, by the resolution he had procured enjoining a purifying scrutiny.

During the following days Robespierre followed up his system: he appeared in the Jacobin tribune to read both anonymous and intercepted letters, proving that the foreigner, if he were not the actual author of the extravagances attending the new creed, and of the calumnies affecting the best patriots, at all events approved of and rejoiced at them. Danton had in some sort been challenged by Hébert to exculpate himself. He had refrained from doing so immediately, lest he might seem to obey a summons; but a fortnight afterwards he seized a favourable occasion to present himself. The question under discussion was the expediency of supplying the popular societies with localities at the expense of the state. On that subject he proffered various observations; and in the course of his speech took the opportunity of declaring, that if the constitution were intended to slumber whilst the people were smiting and intimidating their enemies by revolutionary operations, still those ought to be viewed with distrust who laboured to excite the people beyond the limits of the revolution. Coupé, deputy from the Oise, replied to Danton, and perverted his sentiments whilst professing to combat them. Danton immediately returned to the tribune, and was met with murmurs. He thereupon invited all who had grounds of suspicion against him to assign their charges, in order that he might publicly rebut them. He complained of the disapprobation manifested at his presence. "Have I then lost those traits which characterise the aspect of a free man?" he exclaimed; and as he uttered those words, he elevated the countenance that had been so often seen, so often encountered in the storms of the revolution, and which had always animated the courage of republicans and spread terror amongst aristocrats. "Am I no longer," he added, "that same man who was found at your side in all the moments of critical emergency? Am I no longer that man, so persecuted and so well known to you all; that man whom you have so often embraced as your friend, and with whom you have taken the oath to perish in the same hazards?" He then called to recollection that he had been the defender of Marat, and was thus obliged to cover himself with the shade of that being whom he had formerly protected and despised. "You will be astonished," said he, "when I unfold to you my private conduct, to find that the colossal fortune which my enemies and yours attribute to me, is comprised in the small amount of property I have always possessed. I defy the most malevolent to adduce any proof against me. All their efforts will not avail to stagger me. I will stand upright in the face of the people: you shall judge me in their presence. I am not more disposed to tear out the page of my history than you are of your own." In conclusion, Danton demanded a committee to examine the accusations objected against him.

Robespierre ascended the tribune with unwonted eagerness. "Danton," he exclaimed, "asks from you a committee to investigate his conduct: I consent to its appointment, if he thinks such a measure will be beneficial to him. He desires that the complaints harboured against him may be particularised: so be it, I will undertake the task. Danton, thou art accused of having emigrated. It has been stated that thou hadst passed into Switzerland; that thy illness was feigned to conceal thy flight from the people; that thy ambition was to be regent under Louis XVII.; that at a determinate period, all was prepared for proclaiming that shoot of the Capets; that thou wert the leader of the conspiracy; that not Pitt, or Cobourg, England, Austria, or Prussia, were our real foes, but thou alone; that the Mountain was composed of thy accomplices; that it was futile to devote attention to the agents employed by foreign powers; that their plots were fables worthy of contempt only; in a word, that it behoved us to slaughter thee, and thee alone!" —Universal applause drowned the voice of Robespierre. He resumed: "Art thou not aware, Danton, that the more a man is distinguished for courage and patriotism, the more strenuously do the enemies of the public weal strive to effect his ruin? Art thou not aware, and are you not all aware, citizens, that this result is inevitable? Ah! if the champion of liberty were not calumniated, it would be a proof that we had no more nobles or priests to combat!" Then alluding to the publications of Hébert, in which he, Robespierre, was highly extolled, he added—"The enemies of the country seem to select me exclusively for their praises. But I repudiate them. Is it imagined that, alongside the eulogies repeated in certain prints, I do not discern the knife with which their authors would willingly dispatch the country? The cause of patriots is like that of tyrants; they are equally exposed. I am deceived, perhaps, respecting Danton; but, with regard to his domestic affairs, he merits full approbation. In political matters I have observed him; a difference of opinion induced me to study him with attention, frequently with anger; he was not sufficiently prompt, I allow, in suspecting Dumouriez; he did not sufficiently hate Brissot and his accomplices; but if he has not always been of my opinion, shall I thence conclude that he betrayed the country? No; I have constantly seen him serve it with zeal. Danton desires that he may be put upon his trial: he is right. Let me be put upon my trial also. Let those men come forward who are greater patriots than we! I'll wager they are nobles or priests. You will find a marquis amongst them, and will hence learn the just measure of patriotism in the persons who accuse us."

Robespierre concluded by moving that all who had any reproach to urge against Danton should then be heard. None ventured to appear. Momoro himself, one of Hébert's friends, was the first to exclaim that the fact of no person presenting himself was a proof that nothing could be alleged against Danton. A member thereupon proposed that the president should give him the fraternal embrace. The general approval was manifested, and Danton being led to the table, there received the brotherly salute amidst tumultuous cheers.

The conduct of Robespierre upon this occasion was generous and dexterous. The common danger to all tried patriots, the signal ingratitude towards such services as Danton's, in fine, an undisputed superiority, had disarmed Robespierre of his habitual egotism, and, for once actuated by amiable sentiments, he had spoken with more true eloquence than seemed consistent with his nature. But the service he rendered Danton was more advantageous to the cause of the existing government and the old patriots who composed it than to Danton himself, whose popularity was lost for ever. Enthusiasm is not easily rekindled when suffered to expire, and it could scarcely happen that such great public dangers should occur as to give Danton an opportunity, by the display of his undaunted courage, of regaining his influence.

Robespierre, intent upon his purpose, never omitted being present at each sitting of the Jacobins devoted to the process of purification. The name of Clootz being paused upon, he was accused of a connexion with the foreign bankers, Vandenivers. He endeavoured to justify himself, but Robespierre arose and claimed attention. He recalled the alliance of Clootz with the Girondists, and his rupture with them, in consequence of a pamphlet entitled, "Neither Roland nor Marat," a production wherein he attacked the Mountain equally with the Gironde; he spoke of his extravagant doctrines, his obstinacy in descanting upon an universal republic, in stimulating a rage for conquests, and in compromising France towards all Europe. "And how can M. Clootz be so warmly interested in the welfare of France," added Robespierre, "when he is so strongly affected for the prosperity of Persia and Mesopotamia? There is a late catastrophe of which he is probably very proud. I refer to the movement against religion, a movement which, if conducted with prudence and caution, might have conduced to excellent results, but the violence which marked it was calculated to produce most serious mischief. M. Clootz had a nocturnal conference with Bishop Gobel. Gobel passed his word for the following day, and sure enough he came, with a sudden alteration of language and garb, to deposit his letters of ordination. M. Clootz believed we were the dupes of such buffoonery. No, no; the Jacobins will never regard as a friend of the people this pretended sans-culottes, who is a Prussian and a baron, who possesses 100,000 livres a-year, who dines with conspiring bankers, and who is, in short, not the orator of the French people, but of the human race."

Clootz was, without further deliberation, erased from the list of the society; and, at the instance of Robespierre, it was determined to expel without distinction all nobles, priests, bankers, and foreigners.

At the subsequent sitting came the turn of Camille-Desmoulins. He was reproached with his letter to Dillon, and with symptoms of sensibility exhibited towards the Girondists. "I had judged Dillon brave and skilful," said Camille in vindication, "and I accordingly defended him. As to the Girondists, I was in a peculiar position with regard to them. I have always loved and served the republic, but I have been often deceived respecting those who promoted it. I adored Mirabeau, I cherished Barnave and the Lameths; I confess it; but I sacrificed my friendship and my admiration as soon as I knew they had ceased to be Jacobins. A singular fatality has so willed it, that out of sixty revolutionists who signed my marriage-contract, there remain to me but two friends, Danton and Robespierre. All the others are emigrants or guillotined. In that number were seven of the twenty-two. A movement of sensibility, therefore, was very pardonable on that occasion. I have stated," added Desmoulins, "that they died republicans, but federalist republicans; for, I assure you, I do not think there were many royalists amongst them."

The easy disposition, the lively and original wit of Camille-Desmoulins, rendered him a general favourite. "Camille has chosen his friends badly," remarked a Jacobin; "let us show him we know how to choose ours better by admitting him without scruple." Robespierre, still the protector of his old colleagues, but careful always to observe a tone of superiority, defended Camille-Desmoulins. "He is weak and confiding," said he, "but he has always been a republican. He admired Mirabeau, Lameth, and Dillon; but he himself broke his idols whenever he was undeceived. Let him pursue his career, and be more cautious for the future." After these opinions, Camille was retained amidst great applause. Danton was subsequently admitted without observation. Fabre-d'Eglantine also successfully passed through the ordeal, though not without undergoing interrogation respecting his fortune, which was considerately attributed to his literary talents. This purification was continuously prosecuted, and occupied a considerable interval. Commenced in November 1793, it endured through several months.

The views of Robespierre and the government were now well known. The energy with which those views had been manifested intimidated the agitators, promoters of the new worship, and they bethought themselves how to retract and neutralise their indiscreet proceedings. Chaumette, who had all the ready pertness of a club or communal orator, but was entirely devoid of the ambition or courage befitting a party leader, never contemplated entering upon a rivalry with the convention, or constituting himself the founder of a new creed; wherefore he hastened to seize an occasion to amend his error. He determined to recommend a supplementary interpretation to the ordinance closing all places of worship, and accordingly moved the commune to declare that it had no intention of curtailing religious liberty, or of interdicting the followers of each persuasion from the privilege of assembling in buildings rented and supported at their own charges. "Let no one pretend," said he, "that it is weakness or policy which induces me to act thus; I am incapable of being moved by either the one or the other. It is the conviction that our enemies will abuse our zeal so as to push it beyond legitimate bounds, and provoke us into mischievous measures. It is the conviction that, if we prevent the Catholics from exercising their worship publicly and with the sanction of the law, bilious beings will hide in caverns to foster fanaticism or to conspire; and it is this conviction which alone inspires me and urges me to speak."

The resolution proposed by Chaumette, after obtaining the strenuous support of the mayor Pache, was ultimately adopted, not without dissonant murmurs however, quickly stifled in hearty acclamations. On its part, also, the convention declared that it had never purposed in its decrees to oppress religious liberty; and it strictly prohibited the removal of such plate as still remained in the churches, since the exchequer no longer stood in so pressing need of that description of aid. Henceforth, therefore, the indecent frivolities in which the populace had unwittingly indulged ceased in Paris, and the ceremonies appointed for the worship of Reason, which had afforded so much spurious diversion, were abolished.

The committee of public welfare, amidst this bewildering confusion, became every day more firmly convinced of the necessity that existed for rendering authority stronger and prompter, and for ensuring it more implicit obedience. The experience of the obstacles it had to encounter, gave it daily a greater insight into the deficiencies of the government, and it added fresh parts to the revolutionary machine contrived for the duration of the war. It had already prevented the transfer of power into new and inexperienced hands, by prolonging the convention and declaring the government revolutionary until peace. At the same time, it had concentrated that power in itself by bringing under its control the revolutionary tribunal, the police, the military operations, and even the distribution of articles of consumption. Two months' experience enabled it to estimate the impediments which local authorities, either from excess or defect of zeal, opposed to the action of the supreme authority. The transmission of decrees was frequently interrupted or delayed, and their promulgation altogether neglected in certain departments. Several of those federalist administrations which had rebelled were yet extant, nor was the faculty of concert absolutely debarred them. And if, on the one hand, the departmental administrations offered some danger of federalism, the communes, on the other hand, acting in a directly opposite spirit, exercised, in imitation of the Parisian commune, a vexatious sway, enacting laws and imposing taxes, whilst the revolutionary committees of sections exerted arbitrary and inquisitorial powers against persons. Revolutionary armies, formed in different localities, completed those petty distinct governments, tyrannical to the last degree, disunited amongst themselves, and highly embarrassing to the superior government. Moreover, the authority of the representatives on missions, entering into the general rivalry, aggravated the confusion as to prerogatives; for the representatives levied imposts and published penal laws like the communes and the convention itself.

Billaud-Varennes, in a badly expressed but very able report, unfolded these inconveniences, and introduced the decree of the 14th Frimaire, year 2 (4th December 1793), which, being adopted, may serve as a model for all provisional, energetic, and absolute governments. "Anarchy," said the reporter, "menaces republics in their infancy and their decay. Let us strive to avert it." The decree instituted the Bulletin of Laws, a new and admirable invention, of which no idea had been previously entertained. Hitherto the laws, sent by the assembly to the ministers, and by the ministers to the local authorities, without any specified periods for so doing, and without any records authenticating their transmission or receipt, were frequently passed for lengthened intervals before they were promulgated or known. According to the new decree, a committee, a press, and a particular paper, were exclusively assigned for the publication and dispatch of laws. The committee, formed of four individuals, independent of all control and relieved from every other duty, received the law, caused it to be printed, and then transmitted it by the post within fixed and invariable periods. The dispatch and the receipt were verified by the convenient agency of the post-office; and the operations being thus regulated, became sure and effective. The convention was subsequently declared the centre of impulse to the government. Under these words was concealed the sovereignty of the committees, which transacted all affairs for the convention. The departmental authorities were in some sort abolished: they were shorn of all political attributes, and were left, like the department of Paris at the crisis of the 10th August, with no functions beyond the assessment of contributions, the repair of roads, and other purely economical matters. Thus, those too powerful interveners between the people and the supreme authority were suppressed. The district and communal administrations were alone suffered to exist with their prerogatives unimpaired; every local administration, at the same time, was prohibited from coalescing with others, from removing its seat, from sending out agents, from passing resolutions extending or limiting the scope of decrees, and from levying men or taxes. All the revolutionary armies established in the departments were disbanded, and none was allowed to subsist but the revolutionary army enrolled at Paris, as sufficient for the service of the whole republic. The revolutionary committees were enjoined to correspond with the district authorities set in superintendence over them, and with the committee of general safety. Those of Paris were debarred from communicating with the commune, or any other body than the committee of general safety. Lastly, the representatives were forbidden to levy taxes unless authorised by the convention, and also to publish penal laws.

Thus all the authorities were restricted to their proper spheres, and their conflict or coalition became impossible. They received the laws by an assured routine, and they could neither modify them nor defer their execution. The two committees were fortified in their supremacy. That of public welfare, besides its predominance over the committee of general safety, continued to engross diplomacy and war, and to exercise a sovereign superintendence over all things. Henceforth it alone was entitled to assume the designation of a committee of public welfare. No committee in the various communes could arrogate that title.

This new decree upon the regulation of the revolutionary government, although restrictive touching the power of the communes, and aimed chiefly indeed at their abuses of authority, was received by the commune of Paris with signal demonstrations of respect. Chaumette, who affected docility as a proof of patriotism, delivered a long oration in praise of the decree. In his witless eagerness to comply with the novel system of government, he even drew upon himself a humiliating rebuff; for, carrying his ardour to obey too far, he fell into the predicament of infraction. The decree, as we have stated, placed the revolutionary committees of Paris in direct and exclusive communication with the committee of general safety. These, in their fiery zeal, were accustomed to issue warrants of arrest in indiscriminate multifariousness; insomuch that they were accused of having incarcerated numerous patriots, and of containing men who now began to be stigmatised as ultra-revolutionists. Chaumette arraigned their conduct before the council-general, and proposed to summon them to the bar of the commune with the view of reading them a severe admonition. His motion was adopted: but, in his anxiety to reap the credit of submission, he had overlooked the fact that, according to the new decree, the revolutionary committees of Paris could hold correspondence with the committee of general safety alone. The committee of public welfare, equally averse to an exaggerated obedience as to disobedience itself, and moreover disinclined to allow the commune, even when teaching rightly, to lecture committees placed under the supreme authority, caused Chaumette's resolution to be annulled, and prohibited the committees from attending before the commune. Chaumette bowed to the correction with exemplary meekness. "Every man," said he at the commune, "is subject to error. I frankly confess that I have been misled. The convention has annulled the resolution I was instrumental in passing; it has dealt justly with the fault I committed; it is our common parent, let us show our inseparable union."*

It was only by such uncompromising energy that the committee could hope to suppress unruly movements arising either from fervour or from resistance, and to introduce the utmost possible precision into the action of government. The ultra-revolutionists, viewed with suspicion and kept in check since their proceedings against religion, were now doomed to undergo a further discomfiture, more fatal than the preceding. Ronsin had returned from Lyons, whither he had accompanied Collot-d'Herbois with a detachment of the revolutionary army, arriving in Paris at a moment when the relation of the sanguinary atrocities perpetrated at Lyons excited general pity and remorse. Ronsin signalised his return by affixing a placard which aroused the ire of the convention. In this document he asserted that out of the one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants of Lyons, only fifteen hundred were not accomplices in the revolt; and that before the end of Frimaire (December) all the guilty would have perished, and the Rhone have borne their bodies to Toulon. Other revolting expressions of his were cited, and indignation was stimulated against the despotism of Vincent in the war department, against the conduct of the ministerial agents in the provinces, and against their audacious rivalry with the representatives. Some amongst them were alleged to have let fall words plainly indicating a scheme to precipitate the constitutional organisation of the executive power. The energy so recently displayed by Robespierre and the committee encouraged declarations adverse to these agitators. In the convention, on the 27th Frimaire (17th December), the sitting was opened by bitter complaints against certain revolutionary committees. Lecointre denounced the arrest of a courier from the committee of public welfare by one of the ministerial agents. Boursault stated that when passing through Longjumeau, he had been stopped by the commune; and though he proclaimed his rank of deputy, it nevertheless insisted upon having his passport accredited by the resident agent of the executive council. Fabre-d'Eglantine inveighed against Maillard, the leader of the September assassins, who had been sent on a mission to Bordeaux by the executive council, whereas his demerits called for universal reprobation; against Ronsin and his placard, the objects of all honest men's abhorrence; and, lastly, against Vincent, who had usurped all authority in the offices of the war department, and had affirmed he would either blow up the convention or force it to organise the executive power, since he was determined to be no longer the menial of committees. The convention forthwith declared under arrest Vincent, secretary-general of the war-office; Ronsin, general of the revolutionary army; Maillard, envoy to Bordeaux; three other agents of the executive power, whose vexations at Saint-Girons were detailed; and a person named Mazuel, adjutant in the revolutionary army, who had been heard to state that the convention was conspiring, and that he would spit in the face of every deputy. The assembly subsequently proclaimed the penalty of death against the officers of revolutionary armies illegally formed in the provinces, which were not immediately disbanded. Finally, it enjoined the executive council to appear on the morrow to justify itself.

This act of vigour struck the Cordeliers with deep dejection, and provoked certain murmurs amongst the Jacobins. The latter refrained from taking any decided part on behalf of Vincent and Ronsin, but they demanded that an inquiry should be instituted to ascertain the extent of their delinquencies. The executive council came, in all humility, to exculpate itself before the convention, asseverating that it had never purposed to compete with the national representation, and that the stoppage of couriers and the impediments experienced by the deputy Boursault wholly proceeded from an order of the committee of public welfare itself, an order which directed all passports and dispatches to be verified.

At the same time that Vincent and Ronsin were consigned to prison as ultra-revolutionists, the committee proceeded with undiminished rancour against the party of "equivocals" and stockjobbers. It ordered under arrest Proli, Dubuisson, Desfleux, and Pereyra, accused of being foreign agents and accomplices in all foregone intrigues. Furthermore, it caused to be seized, in the middle of the night, the four deputies Bazire, Chabot, Delaunay of Angers, and Julien of Toulouse, accused of being moderates, and of having too-rapidly acquired fortunes.

We have already recounted the particulars of the clandestine association formed by these representatives, and of the fraud which had been its consequence. We recollect that Chabot, struck with affright, was preparing to denounce his confederates, and to throw all the odium upon them. The rumours current respecting his marriage, and the invectives daily repeated by Hébert, filled up the measure of his terror, and he hastened to unfold the whole manœuvre to Robespierre. He pretended that throughout the plot he had been actuated solely by a desire to penetrate and reveal it; the plot itself he attributed to the foreigner, who was bent, as he alleged, upon degrading the national representation by corrupting the deputies, and who made use of Hébert and his accomplices to defame, after having succeeded in debauching them. Thus there were, so he maintained, two branches in the conspiracy, the one corruptive and the other defamatory, both subtlely contrived to dishonour and dissolve the convention. The participation of foreign bankers in this intrigue, the expressions of Julien of Toulouse and Delaunay, who often said that the convention would soon finish by devouring itself, and that it behoved wise men to gain wealth with all possible dispatch, and a certain intimacy between Hébert's wife and the mistresses of Julien and Delaunay, served Chabot as proofs to support his fable of a two-sided conspiracy, in which corrupters and defamers were secretly leagued to attain the like ultimate aim. At the same time Chabot proved himself not altogether unscrupulous, for he exculpated Bazire; and as he in person had bribed Fabre, and might provoke his denunciation by accusing him, he affirmed that his offers had been rejected, and that the 100,000 francs, suspended on a thread in the privy, were the same intended for Fabre and refused by him. These tales of Chabot were devoid of even the semblance of truth, for had he entered into the conspiracy merely to betray it, he would naturally have forewarned some members of the one or the other committee, and deposited the money in their hands. Robespierre referred Chabot to the committee of general safety, who caused the implicated deputies to be apprehended. Julien of Toulouse alone succeeded in effecting his escape; Bazire, Delaunay, and Chabot were taken and lodged in prison.*

The detection of this shameful machination caused a prodigious clamour, and was held to confirm all the calumnies heaped by the various parties upon each other. The belief became more prevalent than ever in the existence of a foreign faction, corrupting the patriots, and instigating them to fetter the march of the revolution, some by an inopportune moderation, others by an insane exaggeration, by a constant course of defamation, and by an odious profession of atheism. In such suppositions, however, there was but little reality. On the one hand were men less fanatical, more prone to pity the vanquished, and for that very reason more susceptible to the allurements of pleasure and wealth; on the other hand were men more violent and blind in their passions, resting on the lowest portion of the populace, assailing with their outcries all who did not partake their fanatical insensibility, and profaning the ancient objects of reverence with reckless indecency; and amidst these two parties were bankers profiting by every crisis to deal in stockjobbing, and four deputies, out of 750, incapable of resisting corruption, and becoming accomplices in such impure practices; lastly, certain sincere revolutionists, but foreigners, and suspected on that account, compromising themselves by that very exaggeration under favour of which they sought to have their origin forgotten: so much of reality there was, and therein nothing but what might arise in the ordinary course of circumstances—nothing, certainly, which required for elucidation the surmise of some deep-laid conspiracy.

The committee of public welfare, resolute in its purpose to overawe all parties, determined to smite and brand them, for which end it strove to represent them all as accomplices of the foreigner. Robespierre had already often expatiated on a foreign faction, in the existence of which his jealous spirit moved him firmly to believe. With regard to the turbulent faction that thwarted the superior authority and dishonoured the revolution, he hesitated not to denounce it as in alliance with this foreign faction; but hitherto he had not made any such accusation against the moderate party, and had even defended it, as we have seen, in the person of Danton. That he still respected the latter, arose from its having done nothing as yet to impede the march of the revolution, and from its containing but few members, and those not obstinate opponents like the old Girondists, since it only comprised certain scattered individuals, who more highly reprobated the ultra-revolutionary extravagancies.

Such was the situation of parties, and the policy of the committee of public welfare regarding them, in Frimaire, year 2 (December 1793). Whilst it was using authority with so much vigour, and perfecting the machine of revolutionary government in the interior, it displayed equal energy in outward affairs, and secured the safety of the revolution by signal victories.

CHAPTER XXX.

CLOSE OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1793.—RETREAT OF THE AUSTRIANS AND PRUSSIANS.—SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF TOULON.—IRRUPTION OF THE VENDEANS BEYOND THE LOIRE.—THEIR DEFEAT AT MANS, AND DESTRUCTION AT SAVENAY.—GENERAL RETROSPECT AS TO THE CAMPAIGN OF 1793.

The campaign of 1793 terminated on all the frontiers in the most brilliant and auspicious manner. On the side of Belgium, the French had eventually decided upon retiring into winter quarters, notwithstanding the project entertained by the committee of public welfare for profiting by the victory of Watignies to envelop the enemy between the Scheldt and the Sambre. Accordingly, on that point events had not varied, and the advantages consequent upon Watignies had remained with the French.

On the Rhine, the campaign was greatly prolonged by the loss of the lines of Weissembourg, forced on the 13th October (22d Vendemiaire), which the committee of public welfare determined to recover at any cost, and likewise to raise the blockade of Landau, as it had previously effected with regard to Dunkirk and Maubeuge. The state of the French departments bordering on the Rhine was an additional motive with the convention to hasten the departure of the enemy. The country of the Vosges was singularly impressed with the feudal spirit; the priests and nobles had preserved considerable influence within it; the French language being only partially disseminated, the new revolutionary ideas had slowly penetrated its confines; in several of the communes the decrees of the convention were unknown; many were entirely devoid of revolutionary committees, and in almost all the emigrants moved to and fro without molestation. The nobles of Alsace had followed the army of Wurmser in great numbers, and spread themselves from Weissembourg to the environs of Strasburg. In this latter city a plot had been formed to deliver it up to Wurmser. The committee of public welfare forthwith dispatched Lebas and Saint-Just thither, to exercise the usual dictatorship of commissioners from the convention. It, moreover, named young Hoche, who had so greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Dunkirk, general of the army of the Moselle; draughted from the inactive army of the Ardennes a strong division, which was divided between the two armies of the Moselle and the Rhine; and, lastly, raised general levies in all the neighbouring departments, and directed them upon Besançon. These new levies occupied the fortresses, and the garrisons were incorporated in the line. Saint-Just displayed all his accustomed energy and intelligence at Strasburg. He struck the malecontents with awe, and consigned to a commission those who were suspected of having intrigued to deliver up the city, who were thence speedily conducted to the scaffold. He communicated fresh alacrity to both generals and soldiers, and exacted daily attacks along the whole line, in order to exercise the young conscripts. Equally a stranger to fear as to pity, he himself advanced into the fire and partook all the dangers of the war. A high enthusiasm animated the whole army, which was incited with the hope of regaining the lost territory; the universal cry of the French soldiers was, "Landau or death!"

The manœuvre expedient to be executed on this part of the frontiers still consisted in conjoining the two armies of the Rhine and the Moselle, and operating en masse on a single flank of the Vosges. For that purpose it was necessary to recover the passes which intersected the mountains, and which the French had lost since Brunswick had proceeded to the centre of the Vosges and Wurmser under the walls of Strasburg. The plan of the committee was quickly formed: it determined to seize upon the chain itself, in order to separate the Prussians from the Austrians. Hoche, full of ardour and talent, was charged to execute this project, and his first movements at the head of the army of the Moselle warranted anticipations of most strenuous action.

With the view of strengthening their position, the Prussians had attempted to carry by surprise the castle of Bitche, situated in the very midst of the Vosges. The enterprise was defeated by the vigilance of the garrison, which hastened in time to the ramparts; and Brunswick, either disconcerted at his failure, or dreading the activity and energy of Hoche, or perhaps dissatisfied with Wurmser, between whom and himself feelings not the most friendly prevailed, retrograded first to Bisingen on the line of the Erbach, and subsequently to Kayserlautern in the centre of the Vosges. He had not apprised Wurmser of this backward movement; and whilst the latter was engaged on the eastern flank almost abreast of Strasburg, he, Brunswick, on the western flank, was actually in the rear of Weissembourg and nearly abreast of Landau. Hoche had closely followed Brunswick in his retrograde movement; and after vainly endeavouring to surround him at Bisingen, and to anticipate him at Kayserlautern, he formed the design of attacking him at the latter place, notwithstanding the difficulty of the ground. Hoche had about 30,000 men; he engaged on the 28th, 29th, and 30th November; but the localities were little known and replete with obstacles. The first day General Ambert, who commanded the left wing, encountered the enemy, whilst Hoche in the centre was seeking his route. The following day Hoche found himself in presence of the hostile army, whilst Ambert was wandering in the mountains. Thus, owing to the difficulties of the ground, his strength, and the advantage of his position, Brunswick obtained complete success. He only lost about 1200 men, whereas Hoche was obliged to retire with a loss of nearly 3000; but he was not discouraged, and succeeded in rallying his forces at Pirmasens, Hornbach, and Deux-Ponts.

Although discomfited, Hoche had exhibited a hardihood and resolution which secured him the confidence of the representatives and the army. The committee of public welfare, which, since the accession of Carnot, had become sufficiently enlightened to be just, and was henceforth severe only against lack of zeal, addressed to him encouraging letters, and, for the first time, bestowed encomiums on a defeated general.

Hoche, without allowing his reverse to depress the spirit of enterprise, instantly took a resolution to effect a junction with the army of the Rhine, in order to overwhelm Wurmser. That general, who had remained in Alsace whilst Brunswick was retrograding to Kayserlautern, had his right flank uncovered. Hoche directed General Taponnier with 12,000 men on Werdt, to pierce the line of the Vosges and fall on Wurmser's flank, whilst the army of the Rhine was to make a general attack on his front. Between that army and the Austrians, the presence of Saint-Just had induced continual combats during the close of November and the commencement of December, so that by daily exposure to fire it was beginning to acquire discipline and steadiness. Pichegru held the command. The corps sent into the Vosges by Hoche encountered numerous difficulties in its progress, but it eventually succeeded in penetrating the mountains, and seriously incommoded Wurmser's right. On the 22d December (2d Nivose), Hoche marched in person across the mountains, and appeared at Werdt on the summit of the eastern ridge. He rushed impetuously on Wurmser's right wing, captured several guns, and took numerous prisoners. The Austrians felt constrained to quit the line of the Motter, and betake themselves first to Sultz, and eventually on the 24th to Weissembourg, on the very lines of the Lauter. Their retreat was effected in disorder and confusion. The emigrants and Alsatian nobles, flocking in the track of Wurmser, fled with the utmost precipitation. Whole families covered the roads, anxiously endeavouring to escape. The Prussian and Austrian armies were mutually discontented, and slackly aided each other against an enemy buoyant with ardour and enthusiasm.

The two armies of the Rhine and the Moselle were at length conjoined. The representatives gave the command-in-chief to Hoche, who immediately prepared to retake Weissembourg. The Prussians and Austrians, now concentrated by their retrograde movements, were better enabled to act in concert. They accordingly resolved to assume the offensive on the 26th December (6th Nivose), the same day fixed by the French general for an attack on them. The Prussians were in the Vosges and around Weissembourg; the Austrians extended in front of the Lauter, from Weissembourg to the Rhine. Had they not determined to take the initiative, they would certainly not have stood an attack in front of the lines, having the Lauter in their rear; but they had decided upon being the first to assail, and when the French advanced upon them, they found their advanced guards in motion. General Dessaix, commanding the right of the army of the Rhine, marched on Lauterbourg; General Michaud was directed on Schleithal; the centre engaged the Austrians drawn up on Geisberg; and the left penetrated the Vosges in order to turn the Prussians. Dessaix carried Lauterbourg, Michaud occupied Schleithal, and the centre, dislodging the Austrians, drove them from Geisberg even to Weissembourg. The immediate occupation of Weissembourg must have proved signally disastrous to the allies, and it seemed inevitable; but Brunswick, who was stationed at Pigeonnier, flew to the spot and checked the French with the greatest firmness. The retreat of the Austrians was consequently effected with less disorder; but on the following day the French occupied the lines of Weissembourg. The imperialists fell back on Germersheim, and the Prussians on Bergzabern. The French soldiers continually advanced with cries of "Landau or death!" The Austrians hastened to repass the Rhine, indisposed to hazard another day on the left bank, and without giving the Prussians time to reach Mayence. The siege of Landau was raised, and the French took up winter quarters in the Palatinate. The two allied generals forthwith accused each other in contradictory accounts of the operations, and the Duke of Brunswick tendered his resignation to the King of Prussia. Thus, on that portion of the theatre of war, the French had gloriously recovered their frontiers, despite the united force of Prussia and Austria.

The army of Italy had undertaken nothing of importance, having, since its defeat in the month of June, remained on the defensive. In the month of September, the Piedmontese, seeing Toulon attacked by the English, were tardily moved to profit by an occasion which might ensure the destruction of the French army. The King of Sardinia repaired in person to the scene of warfare, and a general attack on the French camp was determined for the 8th September. The most effectual mode of operating against the French consisted in occupying the line of the Var, which separated Nice from their own territory. This manœuvre would have been attended with the recovery of all the positions they had seized beyond the Var, and would have compelled them to evacuate Nice, or perhaps even to lay down their arms. A direct assault upon their camp, however, was preferred; which, being attempted with detached corps and by different valleys at once, was unsuccessful, and the King of Sardinia retired into his own dominions much dissatisfied with the result. Shortly thereafter, the Austrian general Dewins at length resolved to move upon the Var; but he executed his intention with but 3000 or 4000 men, advanced no further than Isola, and, being stopped by a slight check, re-ascended the Upper Alps, without prosecuting his enterprise. Such had been the insignificant operations of the army of Italy.

A more grave solicitude fixed all attention on Toulon. That place, being held by the English and Spanish, gave them a dangerous footing in the south, and a basis for adventuring a further invasion. Hence it behoved France to recover it with all practicable speed; the committee, indeed, had issued the most urgent orders on the subject, but the means of instituting a siege were almost wholly deficient. Carteaux, after effecting the subjection of Marseilles, had debouched with 7000 or 8000 men by the gorges of Ollioules, whereof he gained possession after a slight engagement, and established himself at their outlet within view of Toulon; at the same time, General Lapoype, being detached from the army of Italy with about 4000 men, had drawn up on the opposite side towards Sollies and Lavalette. The two French corps thus planted, the one to the west the other to the east, were so distant that they could scarcely discern each other, and were quite incapable of reciprocating succour. The besieged, with a little more activity, might have easily attacked them separately and overwhelmed them in succession. Happily, they were bent only on fortifying the town and filling it with troops. Eight thousand Spaniards, Neapolitans, and Piedmontese were disembarked, who, with two English regiments drawn from Gibraltar, swelled the garrison to 14,000 or 15,000 men. They perfected all the defences and manned all the forts, especially those on the coast, which protected the road where their squadrons lay at anchor. They applied themselves more particularly to render inaccessible the fort of L'Eguillette, placed at the extremity of the promontory which shuts up the inner or little road. They in sooth rendered its approach so difficult, that it was called in the army "the Little Gibraltar." The Marseillese and all the Provençals who had sought refuge in Toulon, bestirred themselves at the works, and displayed the greatest zeal. It was impossible, however, for union to be of long duration in the interior of the town, inasmuch as the reaction against the Mountain had revived all the dormant factions. Every shade of the republican and royalist parties had its adherents. The allies themselves were not in strict concord. The Spaniards were offended at the superiority affected by the English, and distrusted their intentions. Admiral Hood, taking advantage of this disunion, stated, that since the inhabitants could not agree amongst themselves, it was expedient to avoid proclaiming any authority for the present. He even prevented the departure of a deputation appointed by the Toulonese to wait upon the Count de Provence, with the view of soliciting that prince to appear in their city under the title of regent. From that moment the designs of the English were shrewdly suspected, and a painful impression prevailed as to the blind and culpable precipitancy wherewith Toulon had been delivered to the bitterest enemies of the French navy.

With their existing means, the republicans could have no hope of retaking Toulon. The representatives, indeed, recommended the army to be moved beyond the Durance, and the siege deferred until the following season. However, the capture of Lyons having placed additional forces at disposal, troops and munitions were forthwith transported towards Toulon. General Doppet, to whom the reduction of Lyons was attributed, was appointed to supersede Carteaux. Doppet himself was speedily displaced by Dugommier, a man of much greater experience and of distinguished intrepidity. Twenty-eight or thirty thousand men were eventually mustered, and orders arrived to finish the siege before the close of the campaign.

The French commenced by closely pressing the place, and by establishing batteries against the forts. General Lapoype, with his detachment from the army of Italy, was still to the east, and the general-in-chief Dugommier to the west, in front of Ollioules. Upon the latter devolved the principal attack. The committee of public welfare had already caused a regular plan of attack to be framed by the committee of fortifications. The general assembled a council of war to discuss the plan transmitted from Paris. This plan was very ably conceived, but another was suggested more suitable to circumstances, and promising more prompt results.

In this council of war appeared a young officer, who commanded the artillery in the absence of its superior chief. His name was Bonaparte, a native of Corsica. Faithful to France, in the bosom of which he had been educated, he had fought in Corsica for the cause of the convention against Paoli and the English; he had subsequently joined the army of Italy, and was now serving before Toulon. He evinced excellent judgment and great activity, and always slept at the side of his guns. This young officer, upon a survey of the localities, was struck with an idea, which he propounded to the council. The fort L'Eguillette, surnamed the Little Gibraltar, barred the road in which the allied squadrons were riding. If this fort were occupied, the squadrons could no longer anchor in the road without incurring the hazard of being burnt, nor could they, moreover, vacate it without leaving a garrison of 15,000 men cut off from all communication or succour, and sooner or later doomed to surrender at discretion: wherefore it was to be inferred, that if the fort L'Eguillette were once in possession of the republicans, the squadrons and the garrison would evacuate Toulon together. Thus the key of the fortress lay in L'Eguillette, but it was almost impregnable. Young Bonaparte strenuously enforced his conception, and succeeded in imparting his own convictions.

The first operations were directed to straiten the investment. Bonaparte, under favour of some olive-trees which concealed his artillerymen, planted a battery near the fort of Malbosquet, one of the most important of those encompassing Toulon. One morning this battery suddenly opened, and greatly surprised the besieged, who never imagined a fire could be established so close to the fort. O'Hara, the English general who commanded the garrison, resolved to make a sally for the purpose of destroying the battery and spiking the guns. On the 30th November (10th Frimaire), accordingly, he issued forth at the head of 6000 men, quickly penetrated the republican posts, seized upon the battery, and forthwith commenced to spike the guns. Bonaparte fortunately chanced to be within a short distance, accompanied by a battalion. A trench led up to the battery; into this Bonaparte plunged with his battalion, crept noiselessly into the midst of the English, gave the word to fire, and by so unexpected an appearance threw them into the greatest confusion. O'Hara, much astonished, thought his own soldiers must have fallen into some strange mistake, and were firing on their comrades. He consequently advanced towards the republicans to satisfy himself, but was wounded in the hand, and taken in the trench by a sergeant. At the same moment, Dugommier, who had beat to arms throughout the camp, gathered his troops for the attack, and moved between the battery and the fort. The English, thus threatened to be cut off, retired, after losing their general and failing to rid themselves of the obnoxious battery.

This success highly animated the besiegers, whilst it spread infinite discouragement amongst the besieged. Distrust was excited in the latter to such a height, that they alleged General O'Hara had contrived his capture with the view of selling Toulon to the republicans. Meanwhile these, resolute to conquer the place, and devoid of means to purchase it, were preparing for the hazardous assault of L'Eguillette. They had already thrown numerous shells into it, and endeavoured to raze the defences with projectiles from twenty-four pounders. On the 18th December (28th Frimaire), the assault was fixed for midnight. A simultaneous attack was to be made by General Lapoype on Fort Faron. At midnight, amidst a frightful storm, the republicans were in motion. The soldiers who guarded the fort usually kept in quarters, so as to be under shelter from the bombs and balls. The French hoped to reach it before they were perceived; but at the foot of the height they encountered some of the enemy's sharpshooters. An engagement immediately ensued. At the noise of the musketry, the garrison of the fort flew to the ramparts, and opened a murderous discharge on the assailants. These recoiled and returned, time after time. A young captain of artillery, by name Muiron, profiting by the inequalities of the ground, succeeded in attaining the height without losing many of his men. Reaching the base of the fort, he vaulted through an embrasure; the soldiers followed him, penetrated into the battery, seized the guns, and speedily effected a conquest of the fastness itself.

In this action, General Dugommier, the representatives Salicetti and Robespierre the younger, and the commandant of artillery Bonaparte, had stood in the midst of the fire, and communicated to all the troops an exalted courage. On the side of General Lapoype, the attack was likewise crowned with success, a redoubt of Fort Faron having been carried by storm.

The instant Fort L'Eguillette was occupied, the republicans hastened to dispose the guns so as to cannonade the fleet. But the English afforded them no time for the visitation. They immediately decided upon evacuating the place, in order to shun the further chances of a difficult and perilous defence. Before retiring, they resolved to burn the arsenal, the dockyards, and the ships they were unable to remove. On the 18th and 19th, without notifying their intention to the Spanish admiral, or even to the unfortunate community about to be left at the mercy of the victorious Mountaineers, orders were issued for the evacuation. Each English vessel proceeded in its turn to ship supplies at the arsenal. The forts were subsequently all vacated, except Fort Lamalgue, which was intended to be the last abandoned. This evacuation was executed so rapidly, that two thousand Spaniards, too tardily warned, remained outside the walls, and only saved themselves by a miracle.

At last the command was given to fire the arsenal. Twenty ships and frigates suddenly appeared in the docks wrapped in flames, a spectacle calculated to excite despair amongst the wretched inhabitants and indignation amongst the republicans, who were condemned to witness the conflagration without the ability to arrest it. Thereupon, upwards of twenty thousand individuals, male and female, including the aged and the young, bearing with them their most precious moveables, rushed upon the quays, stretching forth their arms towards the squadrons, and imploring an asylum against the vengeance of the victorious army. They comprised all those Provençal families, who, at Aix, Marseilles, and Toulon, had been compromised in the sectional movements. Not a single boat put off to receive those imprudent Frenchmen, who had placed their trust in foreigners, and surrendered to them the first port of their country. Ultimately, Admiral Langara, more moved by humanity, ordered his boats to be lowered, and as many refugees brought on board the Spanish ships as they would contain. Admiral Hood durst no longer resist this example and the imprecations shrieked against him. He gave directions in his turn, but almost too late, to receive the Toulonese. Those unfortunate persons wildly precipitated themselves into the boats dispatched for their rescue. In the confusion some fell into the sea, and others were separated from their families. Mothers were seen seeking their children, wives and daughters calling upon their husbands and parents, all roaming to and fro on the quays, amid the lurid glare of the conflagration. At that terrible moment, brigands, seizing the occasion to pillage, charged the forlorn creatures accumulated on the quays, and fired amongst them, with howls of "The republicans are on you!" Consternation fell upon the multitude; all pressed forward, clashing with lamentable cries, and, thinking only of flight, abandoned the spoils to the atrocious ruffians who had planned the stratagem.

The republicans eventually entered, and found the city half deserted and a large proportion of the naval establishments destroyed. The convicts had fortunately checked the fire, and prevented all its possible devastation. Out of fifty-six ships and frigates, there remained but seven ships and eleven frigates; the rest had been either taken or burnt by the English. The horrors of the siege and evacuation were soon succeeded by those of revolutionary rage. We will hereafter recount the train of disasters visited upon that guilty and unfortunate city. The capture of Toulon caused extraordinary joy, and produced as powerful an impression as the victory of Watignies, the reduction of Lyons, or the relief of Landau. Thenceforth, all apprehension was removed lest the English, resting on Toulon, might carry desolation or rebellion into the southern districts of France.

The campaign had closed less auspiciously on the Pyrenees. However, notwithstanding numerous reverses and remarkable ignorance on the part of their generals, the French had merely lost the line of the Tech, whilst that of the Tet had remained to them. After the untoward action of Truillas, fought on the 22d September (1st Vendemiaire), against the Spanish camp, and wherein Dagobert had manifested such exemplary valour and coolness, Ricardos, instead of marching forward, had retrograded to the Tech. The recapture of Villefranche, and a reinforcement of 15,000 men received by the republicans, had induced him to make this retrograde movement. After raising the blockade of Collioure and Port-Vendre, he had moved to the camp of Boulon, between Ceret and Ville-Longue, whence he watched over his communications, with the high-road to Bellegarde in his keeping. The representatives Fabre and Gaston, giving way to their impetuous ardour, urged an attack on the Spaniards' camp, in order that they might be repelled beyond the Pyrenees; but the assault was abortive, resulting simply in a fruitless effusion of blood.

The representative Fabre, impatient to attempt some signal enterprise, had long dwelt upon the practicability of a march beyond the Pyrenees, with the view of compelling the Spaniards to retreat. He had been persuaded that the fort of Roses might be gained by a sudden attack. In accordance with his ideas, and despite the contrary opinion of the generals, three columns were thrown beyond the Pyrenees, with instructions to unite at Espola. But, too weak and too far separated, they were unable to effect the intended junction, and being defeated, were driven back on the great chain, after suffering a considerable loss. This disaster had occurred in October. In November, unusually stormy weather for the season swelled the mountain torrents, interrupted the communications between the different Spanish camps, and placed them in a perilous predicament.

An opportunity was thereby offered for revenging on the Spaniards the reverses sustained at their hands. The bridge of Ceret alone remained to them for repassing the Tech, and they lay inundated and famished on the left bank at the mercy of the French. But nothing that ought to have been done was performed. To General Dagobert had succeeded General Turreau, and to him General Doppet. The army was disorganised. It fought languidly in the vicinity of Ceret, and even lost the camp of Saint-Ferréol, whereby Ricardos escaped the dangers of his position. In a little while he avenged with somewhat greater ability the peril he had encountered, falling, the 7th November (17th Brumaire), upon a French column stationed at Ville-Longue, on the right bank of the Tech, between the river, the sea, and the Pyrenees. He repulsed that column, 10,000 strong, and threw it into such disorder that it could not be rallied earlier than at Argeles. Immediately afterwards, Ricardos directed an attack on the division of Delatre at Collioure, gained possession of Collioure, Port-Vendre, and Saint-Elme, and drove the French completely beyond the Tech. It was thus the campaign terminated towards the latter days of December. The Spaniards took up winter quarters on the banks of the Tech; the French encamped around Perpignan and on the banks of the Tet. A portion of French territory was occupied by the enemy, but less than so many disasters gave reason to apprehend. This, however, was the only frontier on which the campaign had not closed gloriously for the arms of the republic. On the side of the Western Pyrenees both parties had stood on the defensive.

La Vendée had been again the scene of further and desperate struggles, concluding in the issue to the advantage of the republican cause, but involving serious evil to France, since all who fell in the antagonist ranks were to be mourned as Frenchmen.

The Vendéans, defeated at Chollet on the 17th October (26th Vendemiaire) had fled, as we remember, to the edge of the Loire, in a promiscuous multitude of 80,000 souls, men, women, and children. Not venturing to return to their own districts, now in the occupation of the republicans, and unable longer to keep the field in presence of a victorious army, they resolved to pass into Brittany, and accomplish the views of Bonchamps, although that young hero, being dead, could no more direct their mournful destinies. We have mentioned, that on the eve of the battle of Chollet he had sent a detachment to occupy the post of Varade on the Loire. That post, inefficiently guarded by the republicans, was taken during the night between the 16th and 17th. After the loss of the battle, therefore, the Vendéans were enabled to cross the river without hindrance, by means of boats left along the shore, and sheltered from the republican cannon. The danger having hitherto existed on the left bank alone, the government had overlooked the necessity of defending the country on the other side the Loire. All the towns of Brittany were unguarded; a few detachments of national guards, scattered here and there, were quite incapable of checking the Vendéans, and could only fly at their approach. The latter consequently advanced without impediment, and traversed successively Candé, Château-Gonthier, and Laval, without encountering any resistance.

Meanwhile the republican army was uncertain of their course, their numbers, or their designs. For a moment, indeed, it had deemed them exterminated, and the representatives had so written to the convention. Kléber alone, who still commanded the army under the auspices of Léchelle, formed a different judgment, and strove to remove a dangerous security. Nor was it long before intelligence arrived that the Vendéans were far from being destroyed; but that, on the contrary, in the fugitive column there yet remained 30,000 or 40,000 armed men fit for combat. A council of war was immediately assembled, and as it was unknown whether the fugitives would move on Angers or on Nantes, whether they would pass into Brittany or proceed by the Lower Loire to join Charette, it was decided that the army should be divided; that one portion, under General Haxo, should march to keep Charette in check and recover Noirmoutiers; that another, under Kléber, should occupy the camp of Saint-George near Nantes; and that the remainder should continue at Angers, in order to cover that town and observe the motions of the enemy. Doubtless, if the republicans had been better informed, they would have understood how much it behoved them to keep united, and follow with all diligence the track of the Vendéans. In their confusion and panic the latter might have been easily dispersed, if not entirely cut off; but the direction they had taken being unknown, the course adopted by the republicans, in their state of doubt, was certainly the most prudent. Shortly, however, more accurate tidings were gathered, and the march of the Vendéans on Candé, Château-Gonthier, and Laval, became known. Thereupon an instant resolution was taken to pursue them, with the hope of overtaking them before they could throw Brittany into a flame, and seize upon any important city or a port on the ocean. The Generals Vimeux and Haxo were left at Nantes and in Lower Vendée; all the rest of the army moved towards Candé and Château-Gonthier. Westermann and Beaupuy formed the vanguard; Chalbos, Kléber, and Canuel, each commanded a division; and Léchelle, holding aloof from scenes of conflict, left the movements to be directed by Kléber, who engrossed the confidence and admiration of the army.

On the evening of the 25th October (4th Brumaire), the republican vanguard arrived at Château-Gonthier; the bulk of the forces lagged a day's march in the rear. Although the soldiers were greatly fatigued, although, moreover, it was nearly dark, and a distance of six leagues intervened to Laval, Westermann proposed to advance thither without halting. Beaupuy, not less brave but more circumspect than Westermann, vainly attempted to impress upon him the danger of attacking the Vendéan mass in the middle of the night, so far in advance of the main army, and with troops exhausted by fatigue. Beaupuy being constrained to submit to his senior in command, the march forward was at once commenced. Reaching Laval in the dead of night, Westermann detached an officer to reconnoitre the enemy's position; but he, carried away by his ardour, made a charge instead of an observation, and suddenly drove back the outermost posts. The alarm was immediately given in Laval, the tocsin rung, and the whole power of the enemy speedily mustered and brought in array against the republicans. Beaupuy, evincing his accustomed firmness, intrepidly withstood the efforts of the Vendéans. Westermann, displaying all the energies of heroic valour, sustained a most obstinate struggle, which the obscurity of night rendered more sanguinary. The republican vanguard, albeit very inferior in number, would, notwithstanding, have succeeded in maintaining its ground to the end, had not Westermann's cavalry, which sometimes lacked the gallantry of its leader, all at once disbanded and obliged the vanguard to retreat. Under favour of Beaupuy, Château-Gonthier was regained in comparative order. The main body arrived there the following day. The whole army was thus conjoined on the 26th October, the vanguard weakened by a bootless and sanguinary conflict, and the main body harassed by a long route, travelled without provisions, without shoes, and over the broken roads of autumn. Westermann and the representatives urged a fresh movement in advance. Kléber strenuously controverted their project, and procured a determination to proceed no farther than Villiers, midway between Château-Gonthier and Laval.

The immediate topic of discussion was a plan for the attack of Laval. That town is situated on the Mayenne. To march directly by the left bank, then occupied by the republicans, was highly injudicious, as a distinguished officer, Savary, who was perfectly acquainted with the localities, forcibly inculcated. The Vendéans might easily seize the bridge of Laval, and there withstand all attacks; moreover, whilst the republican army was uselessly accumulated on the left bank, they would have it in their power to defile along the right bank, cross the Mayenne in its rear, and fall suddenly upon it with terrible effect. He consequently proposed to divide the attack, and push forward one part of the army by the right bank. On that side there was no bridge to carry, nor any material obstacle to the occupation of Laval. This suggestion, recommended by the approbation of the generals, was sanctioned by the fiat of Léchelle. On the morrow, however, that commander, who sometimes started from his virtual nullity to commit blunders, transmitted a grossly stupid order, in distinct opposition to the arrangement of the previous day. He therein enjoined the generals to march, according to his ordinary expression, majestically and in mass on Laval, by defiling along the left bank. Kléber and all his colleagues were indignant, but obedience was imperative. Beaupuy led the van, and Kléber closely followed him. The whole Vendéan army was drawn up on the heights of Entrames. Beaupuy began the battle; Kléber deployed to the right and left of the route, so as to extend himself as far as possible. Aware, however, of the disadvantages attending his position, he sent to Léchelle requesting him to lead the division of Chalbos upon the enemy's flank, a movement calculated to throw him into confusion. But that column, composed of the battalions formed at Orleans and Niort, which had so often fled, disbanded without marching a step in advance. The commander-in-chief was the first to speed away at full gallop; and the larger half of the army, without having engaged, fled precipitately at the heels of Léchelle, hastening to Château-Gonthier, and thence to Angers. The brave Mayencers, who had never previously yielded ground, gave way for the first time. The rout then became general; Beaupuy, Kléber, Marceau, and the representatives Merlin and Turreau, made incredible but fruitless efforts to stop the fugitives. Beaupuy received a shot in the centre of his breast. Being borne into a cabin, he exclaimed, "Leave me here, and display my bloody shirt to the soldiers." The valiant Bloss, who commanded the grenadiers, and was distinguished for his extraordinary intrepidity, met death at their head. A part of the army eventually halted at Lion-d'Angers; the remainder paused not until under shelter of Angers.

General indignation was expressed at the cowardly example given by Léchelle in being the first to fly. The soldiers openly murmured. The next day, during a review, the few warriors who had remained beneath their standards, and who were all Mayencers, raised cries of "Down with Léchelle! Kléber and Dubayet for ever! Give us back Dubayet!" Léchelle, who heard these shouts, was still more incensed against the cohort of Mayence, and against the generals whose valour caused his own shame. The representatives, perceiving that the troops despised Léchelle, decided upon suspending him, and offered the command to Kléber. He declined it, because he was averse to the situation of general-in-chief, so incessantly assailed by the representatives, the ministry, and the committee of public welfare, and consented merely to direct the army in another's name. The command was consequently bestowed on Chalbos, one of the oldest generals in the army. Léchelle, forestalling the ordinance of the representatives, demanded his discharge on the plea of illness, and retired to Nantes, where he shortly afterwards quietly departed this life.

Kléber, taking into consideration the deplorable state of the army, partly dispersed at Angers and partly at Lion-d'Angers, proposed to concentrate it altogether at Angers, to allow it a few days' repose, to supply it with shoes and clothes, and to re-organise it in an efficient manner. This plan was adopted, and all the troops were united at Angers. Léchelle, when offering his resignation, had not failed to denounce the cohort of Mayence, and to charge upon brave men a flight which was owing solely to his own cowardice. A jealousy had long been rankling against that corps, founded on its spirit of union, its attachment to its generals, and its opposition to the staff of Saumur. The recent shouts of "Dubayet for ever! down with Léchelle!" completed its delinquency in the eyes of the government. The committee of public welfare, accordingly, promptly issued an ordinance enjoining its dissolution and amalgamation with the other corps, and intrusting the execution of the measure to Kléber. Although the proceeding was levelled at him and his companions in arms, he cheerfully aided its enforcement, for he was sensible of the danger at hazard from the spirit of rivalry and hatred prevailing between the garrison of Mayence and the rest of the troops; and, above all, he foresaw much advantage would accrue from forming trustworthy heads of columns, which, being judiciously distributed, might communicate their own energy to the whole army.

Whilst these things were passing at Angers, the Vendéans at Laval, freed from the republicans and from every apparent obstacle to their progress, were nevertheless undecided what course they ought to take, or, in other words, upon what theatre to carry the war. They had the choice of two, equally inviting; their dilemma seemed to lie between the extremity of Brittany and that of Normandy. Ulterior Brittany was thoroughly fanaticised by priests and nobles; the population would have joyfully received them; the country, mountainous and intersected, would have afforded them ample facilities for resistance; and there they would have gained the sea-coast and means of communication with the English. Ulterior Normandy, or the peninsula of Cotentin, was somewhat more distant, but even more easy to defend; for by seizing on Port-Beil and Saint-Cosme, they would have entirely barred all access. Moreover, they would there have found the important fortress of Cherbourg, quite open to them on the land side, stocked with supplies of all kinds, and especially adapted to hold intercourse with the English. Both these projects, therefore, were recommended by eminent advantages, and in the execution of neither were any serious impediments to be apprehended. The route to Brittany was guarded only by the army of Brest, under the charge of Rossignol, and consisting, at the utmost, of five or six thousand ill-organised troops. The route to Normandy was defended by the army of Cherbourg, composed of levies en masse ready to disperse at the first shot, and of merely a few thousand men of more regular training who had not yet quitted Caen. Thus, neither of these two armies could be formidable to the Vendéan horde. In fact, by a little celerity, even their encounter might have been avoided. But the nature of the localities was unknown to the Vendéans; they had not a single officer who could enlighten them concerning Brittany and Normandy, or explain to them what were their military advantages or their strongholds. They believed, for example, that Cherbourg was fortified on the land side. They were consequently incapacitated for forming just appreciations as they progressed, for deciding with promptitude, or, in short, for acting with any degree of vigour or precision.

Although numerous, their army was in a desperate plight. All the principal chiefs were dead or wounded. Bonchamps had expired on the left bank; D'Elbée, wounded, had been transported to Noirmoutiers; and Lescure, pierced by a ball in the forehead, was borne in a dying state in the track of the army. Larochejacquelein, the sole survivor, had received the command-in-chief, Stofflet ranking next in authority. The soldiers, being now obliged to abandon their native districts and to keep in constant locomotion, ought to have been organised, instead of which they moved without order like a wandering tribe, having their wives, children, and wains interspersed amongst them. In a regular army, the brave, the weak, and the cowardly, incorporated one with the other, remain per force together, and afford reciprocal aid. A few men of courage often suffice to impart their energy to an entire mass. Here, on the contrary, no rank being maintained, no division into companies or battalions being observed, but every one marching with whom he listed, the more valiant spirits had associated together, and formed a body of five or six thousand men, always the first ready to confront emergent hazards. After them came a troop less to be relied upon, and adapted mainly to decide a victory, by bearing upon the flanks of an enemy already shattered. Lastly, the mass, ever prompt to fly at the first discharge, lagged confusedly in the rear of those two bands. Thus, the thirty or forty thousand armed men were reduced in reality to a few thousands, whose martial temperament predisposed them for adventurous conflict. The lack of subdivisions prevented the formation of detachments, the direction of a corps upon any particular point, or the execution of any stratagetic disposition. Some followed Larochejacquelein, others Stofflet, and in sooth themselves only. The promulgation of orders was impracticable; all that could be obtained was the observance of a signal for moving forward. Stofflet kept by him some trusty peasants, who circulated his wishes amongst their comrades. In the whole army, the Vendéans scarcely mustered two hundred ill-mounted cavalry and thirty pieces of ordnance, badly conditioned and badly served. The baggage encumbered their march; the women and old men, seeking for the post of greatest security, crept into the midst of the best troops, and by crowding their ranks embarrassed their movements. Distrust was likewise beginning to gather in the breasts of the soldiers with respect to their officers. It was rumoured that the latter desired to reach the ocean merely for the purpose of embarking, and abandoning to their fate the unfortunate peasants they had torn from their homes. The council, whose authority, indeed, had become purely illusory, was furthermore divided: the priests expressed infinite dissatisfaction with the military leaders. In a word, nothing would have been more easy than to destroy such an army, had not the utmost disorder in the exercise of command reigned amongst the republicans.

The Vendéans, therefore, we must conclude to have been unfitted to frame or execute any advantageous plan. They had quitted the Loire for twenty-six days, and in that long interval had substantially effected nothing. After a procrastinated hesitation, they eventually adopted a determination. On the one hand, they had been told that Rennes and Saint-Malo were guarded by considerable forces, and on the other that Cherbourg was strongly fortified on the land side: wherefore they decided upon besieging Granville, a town seated on the brink of the sea, between the extremity of Brittany and that of Normandy. This design was recommended by its drawing them into proximity with Normandy, a land that had been depicted to them as of matchless fertility and superabundantly furnished. In consequence, they moved onward towards Fougères. Fifteen or sixteen thousand men of the forced levy had been drawn together to oppose their progress, but they dispersed without waiting to be attacked. The Vendéans reached Dol on the 10th November, and Avranches on the 12th.

On the 14th November (24th Brumaire), they proceeded towards Granville, leaving at Avranches half their numbers and all their baggage. The garrison having ventured to make a sally, they repulsed it, and pursued it into the suburb which precedes the body of the place. The garrison had sufficient time to re-enter and close the gates; but the suburb remained in their possession, and they thus secured great facilities for continuing the attack. They advanced from the suburb to some palisades which had just been planted; and without endeavouring to carry them, they contented themselves with rifle-shooting on the ramparts, retorted on the part of the besieged with cannon-balls and grape-shot. At the same time they fixed some pieces on the neighbouring heights, and fired them innocuously over the parapet of the walls and the roofs of the houses. At night they dispersed and abandoned the suburb, where the fire from the fortress allowed them no repose. They proceeded in quest of quarters, provisions, and especially fuel (for the weather began to grow intensely cold), beyond the range of the artillery. The officers could with difficulty retain a few hundred men in the suburb to keep up the rifle-shooting.

The following day their inability to reduce a fortified town was rendered still more manifest. They again put their batteries in vogue, but without effect. They renewed their fire along the palisades, but were speedily discouraged. Suddenly one of them started the idea of profiting by the ebb-tide to traverse a beach and take the town on the side of the harbour. They were preparing for this new enterprise, when the suburb was set on fire by the representatives immured in Granville. The Vendéans were thereupon compelled to evacuate it; and, utterly disheartened, they thought only of retreat. The attempt on the harbour was altogether abandoned, and on the morrow they all returned to rejoin their reserve and baggage at Avranches. From that moment extreme dejection reigned amongst them; they complained more bitterly than ever of the chiefs who had forced them from their hearths, and who, they alleged, were revolving the means of forsaking them; and they demanded with loud shouts to be reconducted to the Loire. It was in vain that Larochejacquelein, at the head of the most chivalric, essayed a fresh attempt to draw them into Normandy; in vain he marched on Ville-Dieu, whereof he gained possession; scarcely a thousand men volunteered to follow him. The residue of the horde retook the road to Brittany, marching on Pontorson, through which it had arrived. It seized upon the bridge at Beaux, which, affording a passage over the Selune, was indispensable for reaching Pontorson.

Whilst these events were occurring at Granville, the republican army had been re-organised at Angers. No sooner had the time necessary to give it a little rest and order elapsed, than it was conducted to Rennes, for the purpose of joining the 6000 or 7000 men of the army of Brest, commanded by Rossignol. There, in a council of war, the measures to be adopted for resuming the pursuit of the Vendéans were settled. Chalbos having obtained permission to retire into the interior to renovate his health, Rossignol received from the representatives the command-in-chief of the armies of the west and of Brest, forming in the whole 20,000 or 21,000 men. It was resolved that both armies should proceed with all dispatch to Antrain; that General Tribout, who was at Dol with 3000 or 4000 men, should move on Pontorson; and that General Sepher, who led 6000 soldiers of the army of Cherbourg, should follow in the wake of the Vendéans. Thus, encompassed by the ocean, the troops at Pontorson, the army at Antrain, and Sepher, who was already approaching Avranches, those unfortunate fugitives seemed doomed to speedy destruction.

All these dispositions were executed at the moment the Vendéans quitted Avranches, and seized upon the bridge at Beaux in their way to Pontorson. It was now the 18th November (28th Brumaire). General Tribout, a declaimer profoundly ignorant of war, had, effectually to defend Pontorson, merely to occupy a narrow road passing through a marsh which covered the town and could not be turned. In so advantageous a position he might have prevented the Vendéans from advancing a single step. But the instant he descried the enemy, he abandoned his defile and moved forward. The Vendéans, encouraged by their easy capture of the bridge at Beaux, fell vigorously upon him, compelled him to recoil, and, profiting by the disorder of his retreat, rushed at his heels into the causeway traversing the marsh, and thus rendered themselves masters of Pontorson, from all approach to which they might have been so easily foiled.

Owing to this unpardonable blunder, an unexpected route lay open to the Vendéans. They could march on Dol; but from Dol they must proceed to Antrain, and pass through the mass of the grand republican army. However, they evacuated Pontorson and advanced on Dol. Westermann hovered in pursuit. Still impetuous as ever, he urged Marigny and his grenadiers onward, and daringly followed the Vendéans even to Dol, with a mere advanced guard. Despite his discrepancy of force, he immediately attacked and drove them precipitately into the town; but speedily regaining courage, they poured out of Dol, and by that destructive fire they knew so well how to maintain, they compelled the republican advanced guard to retire a considerable distance.

Kléber, who continued to direct the army by his counsels, although another ranked as its commander, proposed, with the view of achieving the complete reduction of the Vendéans, to blockade them, and thus ensure their extermination by the ravages of famine, disease, and destitution. Disbandings were so frequent among the republican troops, that a direct attack exposed them to dangerous chances. On the other hand, by fortifying Antrain, Pontorson, and Dinan, the Vendéans would be enclosed between the sea and three intrenched points; and by subjecting them to daily harassings from Westermann and Marigny, their destruction must inevitably ensue. The representatives approved this plan, and orders were issued in conformity. But an officer suddenly arrived from Westermann, who stated that if his general were seconded, and Dol assailed from Antrain, whilst he was attacking it on the side of Pontorson, the Catholic army was doomed, and its annihilation certain. The representatives were dazzled with this proposition. Prieur de la Marne, equally ardent with Westermann himself, caused the plan previously arranged to be set aside; and it was ultimately resolved that Marceau, at the head of a column, should march on Dol concurrently with Westermann.

On the morning of the 21st Westermann advanced on Dol. In his impatience for action, he took no heed whether Marceau's column, appointed to co-operate from Antrain, was arrived on the field of battle, but began the attack without a moment's delay. The Vendéans answered his onslaught with their deadly volleys. Westermann deployed his infantry, and still kept gaining on his foes; but the cartridges began to fail, whereupon he was obliged to make a retrograde movement, and he proceeded to establish himself on an eminence in the background. The Vendéans, eager to pursue their advantage, rushed upon his column and dispersed it. In the mean time, Marceau arrived in sight of Dol; the victorious Vendéans united against him, but he resisted with fortitude till the close of day, and succeeded in maintaining himself on the field of battle. But his position was extremely critical, and he sent to Kléber demanding from him succour and advice. Kléber hastened on the summons, and recommended him to take up a very strong, but certainly a retrograde position, in the environs of Trans. He was still hesitating to follow the opinion of Kléber, when the appearance of the Vendéan riflemen caused a panic amongst his troops. They forthwith disbanded, but were speedily rallied on the position indicated by Kléber.

After these reverses, Kléber again urged the original plan he had propounded, which consisted in fortifying Antrain. It was favourably received; but instead of returning to Antrain, it was determined to remain at Trans, and there throw up fortifications, with the view of being nearer the enemy at Dol. Upon some sudden impulse, however, with the fickleness usually evinced in its deliberations, the council again revoked its decision, and once more resolved upon the offensive, regardless of the lesson so recently taught. A reinforcement was detached to Westermann, with orders to attack on his side simultaneously with the principal army from Trans.

Kléber in vain objected that Westermann's troops, discouraged by their yesterday's overthrow, could not be depended upon; the representatives insisted, and the attack was fixed for the morrow. On the following day, in fact, the movement was executed. Westermann and Marigny were anticipated and assailed by the enemy. Their troops, although supported by a reinforcement, broke rank and fled. The generals made all possible efforts to stop them; in vain they gathered a few resolute warriors around them; they were speedily swept off the ground. The Vendéans, completely victorious, left that point and moved to their right, on the army advancing from Trans.

Whilst they were gaining this advantage, and preparing to obtain a second, the roar of the cannon had struck terror throughout the town of Dol, and into the hearts of those amongst the Vendéans who had not yet come forth to combat. The women, old men, and children, mingled with the stalwart poltroons, hurried from all quarters, and fled in the direction of Dinan and the sea. Their priests, holding the cross aloft, squandered fruitless exhortations to stay their precipitancy. Stofflet and Larochejacquelein flew in every direction to allay their fears. At length they succeeded in rallying and diverting them into the road from Trans, in the track of their courageous comrades already far in advance.

A confusion not less deplorable reigned in the principal camp of the republicans. Rossignol and the representatives, all commanding at once, could neither concert nor act. Kléber and Marceau, oppressed with chagrin, had advanced to reconnoitre the ground and check the progress of the Vendéans. Arriving in front of the enemy, Kléber attempted to deploy the vanguard of the army of Brest, but it disbanded at the first volley. He then brought forward the brigade of Canuel, composed in part of the Mayence battalions: these, true to their old renown, resisted throughout the day, and remained alone on the field of battle, forsaken by the rest of the army. But the Vendéan band which had defeated Westermann eventually took them in flank and forced them to retreat. The Vendéans, pushing their advantage, pursued them even to the outskirts of Antrain. That town being no longer tenable, the whole republican army executed a timely retrogression to Rennes.

Now was made manifest all the wisdom of Kléber's counsels. Rossignol, under one of those generous movements whereof he was capable, notwithstanding his repugnance to the Mayence generals, appeared in the council of war with a scroll containing his resignation. "I am not made," so he spoke, "to command an army. Give me a battalion, and I will do my duty; but I am incapable of wielding the command-in-chief. Here, therefore, is my resignation; and if you refuse it, you are enemies to the republic." "Put up thy resignation!" exclaimed Prieur de la Marne, "thou art the first-born of the committee of public welfare. We will give thee generals who will advise thee, and who will cover thy responsibility for the events of the war." Thereupon Kléber, deeply afflicted at the unskilful conduct which paralysed the army, proposed a plan, assuredly the only one adapted to meet the exigency of affairs, but little in accordance with the prepossessions of the representatives. Leaving Rossignol in his rank of generalissimo, he inculcated the necessity of nominating a commander-in-chief of the troops, a commander of the cavalry, and another of the artillery. His suggestion was adopted. He had then the courage to propose Marceau as commander-in-chief of the troops, Westermann as commander of the cavalry, and Debilly as commander of the artillery—all three obnoxious to jealousy as members of the Mayence faction. A momentary contest arose respecting the individuals, but the point was conceded, all bowing to the ascendancy of that able and generous warrior, who loved the republic, not from a mere ebullition of enthusiasm, but in sober preference—a man who served with admirable fidelity and disinterestedness, and possessed, in a rare degree, zeal and genius for his calling. Kléber had recommended Marceau because he swayed that young and gallant officer, and could rely on his entire devotedness. He was assured, if Rossignol adhered to his non-intervention, that he himself would exercise the supreme guidance, and bring the war to a happy termination.

The division of Cherbourg, which had arrived from Normandy, was conjoined with the armies of the west and of Brest, and the united forces quitted Rennes to proceed towards Angers, where the Vendéans were attempting to pass the Loire. These, having secured the means of return, by their twofold victory towards Pontorson and Antrain, had determined to re-enter their own country. They repassed through Fougères and Laval without opposition, and projected the seizure of Angers, with the design of crossing the Loire at the bridge of Cé. The unfortunate experiment they had lately tried at Granville had not sufficiently convinced them of their incapacity to take walled towns. On the 3d December they penetrated into the suburbs of Angers, and opened their volleys on the front of the fortress. They persevered during the following day; but however great their ardour to cut a way to their home, wherefrom merely the Loire now separated them, they quickly despaired of success. The arrival of Westermann's vanguard in the course of the same day, the 4th, completed their discouragement, and decided them to abandon the enterprise. They moved dejectedly away, remounting the Loire, ignorant of where they might accomplish its passage. One party urged the ascent to Saumur, another to Blois; but Kléber, unexpectedly appearing with his division along the Saumur highway, cut short their deliberations, and constrained them to sweep once more into Brittany. Behold, then, those forlorn fugitives, destitute of food, clothes, or vehicles to convey their families, and afflicted with a wasting epidemic, again wandering over Brittany, in fruitless quest of an asylum or an outlet! The roads were strewed with their wrecks; and on the bivouac before Angers many women and children were found dead from cold and hunger. Now the idea began to be entertained amongst them that the wrath of the convention was pointed against their chiefs alone, and numbers threw away their arms hoping to escape unobserved across the fields. At length the accounts they heard of Mans, touching the abundance there to be found, and the friendly dispositions of the inhabitants, determined them to proceed thither. They marched through La Flèche, into which they forced their way, and entered Mans after a trifling skirmish.

The republican army followed them. Fresh quarrels had arisen amongst its generals. Kléber had overawed the malecontents by his firmness, and obliged the representatives to countermand Rossignol, with his division of the army of Brest, to Rennes. An ordinance of the committee of public welfare next arrived, investing Marceau with the title of commander-in-chief, and superseding all the Mayence generals, leaving to Marceau, however, the privilege of provisionally employing Kléber. Marceau declared that he would not assume the command unless Kléber were at his side to regulate all things. "In accepting this title," said Marceau to Kléber, "I take the rebuffs and the responsibility on myself, and I leave to you the real command and the means of saving the army." "Be at ease, my friend," replied Kléber, "we will fight and get guillotined together."

The march was forthwith commenced, and, from this moment, all was conducted with unity and firmness. The vanguard under Westermann reached Mans on the 12th December, and immediately charged the Vendéans. The latter were thrown into confusion; but a few thousand of their bravest troops, led by Larochejacquelein, contrived to form in front of the town, and forced Westermann to fall back on Marceau, who was approaching with a division. Kléber was still considerably behind with the rest of the army. Westermann proposed to make an instant assault, although it was dark. Marceau, moved by his gallant fervour, but dreading the rebuke of Kléber, whose stern and imperturbable judgment no vivacity could overbear, hesitated; but at length, unable to resist Westermann's importunities, he yielded and attacked Mans. The tocsin tolled its dismal knell, and consternation was paramount within the town. Westermann and Marceau, rushing onward amid the gloom, overthrew all before them, and, despite a galling fire from the houses, succeeded in driving the great bulk of the Vendéans into the large market-place. Marceau caused the streets leading into this square on his right and left to be occupied, and thus held the Vendéans blockaded. His position, nevertheless, was not free from hazard; since, entangled in a town, and enveloped in darkness, he might have been turned and surrounded. He therefore dispatched a courier to Kléber, pressing him to hasten with all speed to his assistance. It was dawn, however, before he came up. The greater number of the Vendéans had fled. The bravest alone remained, striving to protect the retreat: the republicans charged them with fixed bayonets, pierced their ranks, put them to rout, and began a horrible carnage throughout the town.

Never had defeat been more destructive. A multitude of women, left behind, were made prisoners. Marceau saved a young female who had lost her parents, and who in her despair begged for death. She was bashful and beautiful; Marceau, full of scrupulous delicacy, removed her into his carriage, respected her misfortunes, and caused her to be placed in safety. The fields were covered far and wide with mementos of this great disaster. The indefatigable Westermann hunted the flying horde, and choked the avenues with mangled bodies. The wretched Vendéans, knowing not where to hide their heads, crowded into Laval for the third time, and forthwith evacuated it to again seek refuge on the Loire. They purposed to repass it at Ancenis. Larochejacquelein and Stofflet crossed to the opposite shore, with the design, it is stated, of proceeding in quest of boats, and bringing them to the right bank. They returned no more. We are assured that their return was impracticable. The passage could not be effected. The Vendéans, deprived of the presence and support of their two leaders, continued to descend the Loire, always pursued and always vainly searching for the means of transit. At length, driven to despair, completely at a loss whither to betake themselves, they adopted the last resource of flying to the extremity of Brittany, into Morbihan. They repaired to Blain, where their rearguard gained an advantage, and from Blain to Savenay, whence they hoped to make good their entry into Morbihan.

The republicans had followed them without intermission, and they arrived at Savenay on the evening of the day it was occupied by them. Savenay had the Loire on the left, marshes on the right, and a wood in front. Kléber perceived the importance of immediately occupying the wood, and rendering himself master of all the heights, so as to overwhelm the Vendéans on the following day in the town itself, before they had time to leave it. Accordingly, he let loose the vanguard upon them, whilst he himself, seizing the moment when the Vendéans debouched from the wood to repel the vanguard, charged furiously into the midst, and swept them from the shelter. They fled into Savenay, and there ensconced themselves, maintaining, however, throughout the night a continuous fire. Westermann and the representatives urged an immediate assault, eager that the work of destruction might be consummated before another day dawned. Kléber, determined that no mischance should snatch an assured victory from his grasp, pronounced decisively that no attack should be hazarded; after which declaration, resolving himself into a fixed composure, he took no further part in the debate, nor replied to any provocation. He thus prevented every species of movement.

On the morrow, the 23d December, before daybreak, Kléber and Marceau were on horseback traversing the lines, when the Vendéans, hopeless of surviving the day, and frantic with despair, first rushed precipitately upon the republicans. Marceau led the centre, Canuel the right, and Kléber the left. All charged together, and drove back the Vendéans into their quarters. Marceau and Kléber met in the town, collected all the cavalry within hail, and dashed forward in pursuit of the enemy. The Loire and the marshes cut off all retreat; numbers fell by the bayonet, many were made prisoners, and a few found means to escape. On that day, the army was utterly extinguished, and the great war of La Vendée veritably concluded.

Thus that unfortunate population, exiled from its native land by the imprudence of its chiefs, and reduced to wander in quest of a port, anticipating succour from the English, had after all ineffectually gained the shores of the ocean. Unable to take Granville, it had been driven back on the Loire; unable to repass that river, it had been a second time forced into Brittany, and from Brittany upon the Loire again. At last, unsuccessful in all attempts to clear that fatal barrier, it had met its final doom at Savenay, between the Loire and the marshes. Westermann and his troop of cavalry were left to pursue the straggling fugitives. Kléber and Marceau returned to Nantes. Welcomed by the inhabitants of that town, they obtained a species of triumph, and were rewarded by the Jacobin Club with civic crowns.

If we cast a comprehensive retrospect over this memorable campaign of 1793, we shall scarcely refrain from deeming it the greatest effort ever made by a threatened community. In the year 1792, the coalition, not then complete, had acted without combination or energy. The Prussians had attempted an abortive invasion in Champagne; the Austrians had contented themselves with bombarding Lille in Flanders. The French, in their first enthusiasm, repulsed the Prussians beyond the Rhine, and the Austrians beyond the Meuse, and conquered Belgium, Mayence, Savoy, and the county of Nice. The year 1793 opened in a very different manner. The coalition was strengthened by three powers which had hitherto remained neutral. Spain, provoked to extremity by the 21st January, had concentrated 50,000 men on the Pyrenees. France had obliged Pitt to declare himself; and England and Holland had simultaneously entered into the coalition, which was thus doubled, and which, better instructed of the resources of the enemy it had to encounter, augmented its forces and prepared for a decisive effort. Thus France, as under Louis XIV., had to sustain the assault of combined Europe; with this difference, that it had not stimulated the present confluence of foes by its ambition, but by the just indignation wherewith it resented the interference of foreign powers in its domestic affairs.

In the month of March, Dumouriez took the initiative in an enterprise of great temerity—he attempted to overrun Holland by pushing to its core in boats. In the interim, Cobourg surprised his lieutenants, drove them beyond the Meuse, and constrained him to hasten in person to the head of his army. Dumouriez was obliged to hazard the battle of Neerwinden. That disastrous field was almost won, when the left wing recoiled and repassed the Gette; thenceforth the contest became one of retreat, and the French lost Belgium in a few days. Then reverses fomenting altercations, Dumouriez quarrelled with his government and passed over to the Austrians. At the same moment, Custine, discomfited at Frankfort, thrown back on the Rhine, and finally separated from Mayence, left the Prussians at liberty to blockade that famous stronghold, and commence its siege; the Piedmontese triumphed at Saorgio; the Spaniards swept the Pyrenees; and, lastly, the western provinces, previously deprived of their priests, and further driven to exasperation by the levy of 300,000 men, burst into revolt under the banner of the throne and the altar. It was then that the Mountain, infuriated by the defection of Dumouriez, the defeats sustained in the Low Countries, on the Rhine, and in the Alps, and above all by the insurrection of the west, cast aside every restraining influence, tore by force the Girondists from the sanctuary of the convention, and thus repudiated all who might for the future speak the language of moderation. This new outrage provoked new enemies. Sixty-seven departments out of eighty-three arose against the government, which had then to contend against Europe, royalist La Vendée, and three-fourths of France. Such was the epoch when the camp of Famars and the brave Dampierre were lost, when the blockade of Valenciennes was consummated, when Mayence was on the verge of capture, when the Spaniards passed the Tech and menaced Perpignan, when the Vendéans took Saumur and besieged Nantes, when the federalists were preparing to pour from Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Caen, on Paris, the metropolis.

From all points a bold march on the capital was feasible, whereby the revolution might have been terminated in a few days, and European civilisation postponed indefinitely. Fortunately, its enemies were content to besiege fortresses. We recollect with what firmness the convention subjugated the departments by an imposing show of authority, and by dispersing the imprudent federalists who had advanced to Vernon; we recollect, also, with what vigour the Vendéans were repulsed from Nantes and arrested in their victorious march. But whilst the convention triumphed over federalism, its other enemies were making alarming progress. Valenciennes and Mayence were taken after memorable sieges; the war of federalism involved two disastrous events, the siege of Lyons and the treason of Toulon; and La Vendée itself, although confined to the lines of the Loire, the sea, and Poitou, by the successful resistance of Nantes, had recently overthrown the columns of Westermann and Labarolière, who had endeavoured to penetrate into its interior. Never had the situation been more critical. The allies were no longer stayed by sieges in the north and on the Rhine; Lyons and Toulon offered solid points of support to the Piedmontese; La Vendée appeared unconquerable, and presented tempting means of descent to the English. Then it was that the convention convoked at Paris the delegates of the primary assemblies, gave them the constitution of the year 3 to swear by and defend, and decided with them that all France, men and things, was at the disposal of government. Then was decreed the national levy, generation by generation; and the power affirmed of exacting on requisition all that might be necessary for the war. Then were instituted the great book, and the forced loan upon the rich, with the view of withdrawing a portion of the assignats from circulation, and coercing a speedy realisation of the national domains. Then two large armies were directed on La Vendée; the garrison of Mayence was forwarded thither by post relays; and the resolution was promulgated that that unfortunate country should be laid waste by fire, and the population transported elsewhere. Lastly, then Carnot entered the committee of public welfare, and began to introduce order and combination into the military operations.

The French had lost Cæsar's camp; and Kilmaine, by a skilful retreat, had saved the residue of the army of the north. The English had fastened on Dunkirk, and were prosecuting the siege thereof, whilst the Austrians were attacking Le Quesnoy. A mass was rapidly projected from Lille on the rear of the Duke of York. If Houchard, who commanded upon that occasion 60,000 Frenchmen, had comprehended the plan laid down by Carnot, and moved upon Furnes, not a man in the English army would have escaped. Instead of planting himself between the army of observation and the besieging corps, he pursued a direct march; but at all events forced the siege to be raised by the auspicious battle of Hondtschoote. That victory was the first in the campaign won by France; it saved Dunkirk, excluded the English from all advantage in the war, and restored hope and confidence to the French.

Fresh reverses soon converted this confidence into apprehension. Le Quesnoy was taken by the Austrians; the army of Houchard was seized at Menin with a panic, and dispersed; the Prussians and Austrians, to whose progress no material obstacle interposed since the reduction of Mayence, advanced on the two flanks of the Vosges, menaced the lines of Weissembourg, and defeated the French in various encounters. The Lyonnese resisted with energy; the Piedmontese had recovered Savoy and descended towards Lyons with the design of placing the French army between two fires; Ricardos had passed the Tet and swept beyond Perpignan; and, lastly, in the west, the division of the troops into two armies, that of La Rochelle and that of Brest, had caused the plan of campaign arranged at Saumur on the 2d September to miscarry. Canclaux, ill seconded by Rossignol, had found himself unsupported in the heart of La Vendée, and been obliged to fall back on Nantes. The crisis called forth new efforts: the dictatorship was completed, and announced by the institution of the revolutionary government; the power of the committee of public welfare was augmented proportionably with the increase of danger; the levies were enforced, and the armies swelled by multitudes of conscripts; the new recruits served as garrisons, and permitted the organised troops to be draughted into the line; finally, the convention enjoined the armies to conquer within a given interval.

The measures adopted by the government produced their inevitable effects. The reinforced armies of the north were concentrated at Lille and Guise. The allies were fixed at Maubeuge, which they resolved to take before the close of the campaign. Jourdan, proceeding from Guise, gave the Austrians battle at Watignies, and raised the siege of Maubeuge, as Houchard had raised that of Dunkirk. The Piedmontese were driven beyond the Saint-Bernard by Kellermann; Lyons, enveloped by levies en masse, was carried by assault; Ricardos was repulsed beyond the Tet; finally, the two armies of La Rochelle and Brest, united under one leader, Léchelle, who devolved the active command on Kléber, overwhelmed the Vendéans at Chollet, and compelled them to cross the Loire as fugitives.

A solitary reverse troubled the general joy which such events were calculated to produce—the lines of Weissembourg were forced. But the committee of public welfare determined not to close the campaign until they were retaken. Young Hoche, general of the army of the Moselle, had failed, despite his intrepidity, at Kayserlautern; but though defeated, he was encouraged. Foiled in his enterprise against Brunswick, he fell on the flank of Wurmser. Then, the two armies of the Rhine and the Moselle conjoined, repelled the Austrians beyond Weissembourg, constrained Brunswick to follow his allies' retrograde movement, broke the blockade of Landau, and encamped in the Palatinate. Toulon was reduced by a brilliant conception and a signal display of valour. The Vendéans, who were thought to be destroyed, but who in their despair had migrated, to the number of 80,000 souls, across the Loire, and were seeking for a port to invite succour from the English, were rejected from the shores of the ocean, equally so from the banks of the Loire; and between those two barriers, which they found impassable, were ultimately extinguished. On the Pyrenees alone the French arms had been unfortunate, but the loss was confined to the line of the Tech, and the army still encamped in advance of Perpignan.

Thus, this famous and terrible year shows us Europe pressing upon the revolution with all its force, exacting from it an atonement for its first successes in 1792, sweeping its armies far into the background, and penetrating by all the frontiers at once; and a portion of France breaking into insurgency, and adding its hostile efforts to those of foreign powers. Then was the revolution lashed to fury; its first ebullition of vengeance ended in the 31st May, whereby it aroused new enemies against itself, and seemed ready to succumb before banded Europe and three-fourths of the French provinces. But it speedily reduced its internal enemies to submission, raised a million of men, defeated the English at Hondtschoote, was beaten in turn, redoubled its efforts, gained a battle at Watignies, recovered the lines of Weissembourg, repelled the Piedmontese beyond the Alps, took Lyons and Toulon, and twice overwhelmed the Vendéans—once in La Vendée itself, and, secondly and lastly, in Brittany. Never was a grander spectacle, or one more worthy to be commended to the admiration and imitation of nations. France had recovered all it had lost, except Condé, Valenciennes, and a few forts in Roussillon: the powers of Europe, on the contrary, though all combined in hostilities against one, had gained nothing, but were left to expend their wrath in mutual accusations, and to fasten on each other the stigma of disgrace. France completed the organisation of its resources, and prepared to assume a more formidable aspect in the following year.

CHAPTER XXXI.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE HEBERTISTS AND DANTONISTS. —THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE PLACES ITSELF BETWEEN THE TWO PARTIES.—FAMINE IN PARIS. — EFFORTS OF THE HEBERTISTS. — ARREST AND DEATH OF HEBERT, CHAUMETTE, &c.—ARREST, TRIAL, AND EXECUTION OF DANTON, CAMILLE-DESMOULINS, &c.

THE convention had already adopted certain rigorous measures against the turbulent faction of the Cordeliers and the ministerial agents. Ronsin and Vincent were in prison. Their partisans, however, were not scared from agitation. Momoro at the Cordelier, and Hébert at the Jacobin Club, laboured to excite in favour of their friends the influence of the revolutionary zealots. The Cordeliers framed a petition, and, in terms far from respectful, demanded whether it was intended to punish Vincent and Ronsin for having courageously assailed Dumouriez, Custine, and Brissot; declaring, moreover, that, for themselves, they regarded those two citizens as excellent patriots, and would always uphold them as members of their society. The Jacobins presented a more guarded petition, whereof the prayer urged only a speedy report upon Vincent and Ronsin, in order that they might be punished if they were culpable, or restored to liberty if they were innocent.

The committee of public welfare abstained from any intimation of its purpose. Collot-d'Herbois alone, although a member of the committee, and a bounden partisan of the government, evinced an active zeal in behalf of Ronsin. His motive was very obvious: the cause of Vincent did not affect him; but that of Ronsin, an envoy to Lyons with himself, and the executive instrument of his own remorseless ordinances, touched him most nearly. Collot-d'Herbois had maintained with Ronsin that but a hundredth part of the Lyonnese could be ranked as patriots, and that policy imperatively demanded that the vast residue should be banished or slain, the Rhone covered with corpses, the southern departments dismayed by the spectacle, and the rebellious city of Toulon, in particular, struck with consternation. Ronsin had been incarcerated for repeating these horrible expressions in a placard. Collot-d'Herbois, recalled to give an account of his mission, had naturally every inducement to vindicate the conduct of Ronsin, since the approval of his own was involved in the issue. Meanwhile, a petition from certain citizens of Toulon arrived, wherein a most harrowing picture of the calamities inflicted on that city was set forth. It described the massacres by grape-shot succeeding the slower executions by the guillotine, and recounted the horrors of an immense population threatened with extermination, and of a fair and productive city demolished, not by the pickaxe alone, but by the rapid agency of mines. This petition, which four citizens had manifested sufficient hardihood to sign, produced a mournful impression on the convention. Collot-d'Herbois hastened to present his report, and, in his revolutionary frenzy, he therein exhibited those execrable enormities in the light they appeared to his own distorted fancy; that is to say, as indispensable and perfectly natural. "The Lyonnese," he said, in substance, "were vanquished, but they openly declared they would shortly wreak their revenge. Hence the necessity to impress those still refractory rebels with terror, as likewise all disposed to imitate them; hence the necessity of a prompt and terrible example. The ordinary instrument of death lacked the requisite dispatch, and the hammer was but a tardy medium of demolition. Therefore, grape-shot was put in requisition for persons, and the mine for buildings. They who had suffered had all imbued their hands in the blood of patriots. A popular commission had selected them, after a rapid but searching inspection, from out the multitude of prisoners, and no cause of regret existed for any of the doomed."

Collot-d'Herbois prevailed to extort from the astounded convention an acquiescence in deeds that seemed to himself so irreproachable; and he subsequently repaired to the Jacobin Club to complain of the difficulty he had encountered in justifying his conduct, and of the commiseration testified for the Lyonnese. "This morning," he said, "I have needed circumlocutions to get the death of traitors sanctioned. There were tears, and piteous questions whether they had died at the first discharge. At the first discharge—for counter-revolutionists! And Chalier died, forsooth, at the first stroke.* 'You anxiously inquire,' I said to the convention, 'how those men died who were covered with the blood of our brethren! And if they were not dead, you would not be deliberating here!' What think you? They would scarcely endure this language! They could not bear to hear of the dead; they were terrified at the idea of their ghosts!" Then referring to Ronsin, Collot-d'Herbois stated that he had partaken all the dangers of the patriots in the south, that he had there braved with himself the poniards of the aristocrats, and displayed the greatest firmness in enforcing respect for the authority of the republic; moreover, that at this moment all the aristocrats were gladdened at his arrest, and drew from it an augury of hope for themselves. "What has Ronsin done to merit imprisonment?" added Collot. "I have asked the question of all I meet, but none can solve it." In the sitting of the following day, 3d Nivose, Collot, resuming the subject, announced the death of the patriot Gaillard, who, seeing the convention hesitate to approve the energy deployed at Lyons, had committed suicide. "Did I deceive you," exclaimed he, "when I told you that the patriots would be driven to despair, if public spirit began to sink here?"

Thus, two important leaders of the ultra-revolutionists being immured, their partisans laboured diligently in their behalf. The clubs and the convention were importuned with remonstrances against their detention, and even a member of the committee of public welfare, being compromised in their sanguinary system, defended them in self-vindication. Their adversaries began, on their side, to prosecute the attack with redoubled vigour. Philippeaux, who had just returned from La Vendée boiling with indignation against the staff of Saumur, was eager that the committee of public welfare, participating his own wrathful animosity, should discern treachery in the non-success of the plan of campaign fixed on the 2d September, and institute proceedings in consequence against Rossignol, Ronsin, and certain others. We have already explained how many were the reciprocal wrongs, the misunderstandings, and the incompatibilities of character, which signalised the conduct of that war. Rossignol and the staff of Saumur had evinced reprehensible acrimony, but no treachery; and the committee, although disposed to regard them unfavourably, could not consign them to a condemnation neither just nor politic. Robespierre was desirous that friendly explanations should be exchanged; but Philippeaux, too impatient to brook delay, composed a virulent pamphlet, wherein he recounted all the circumstances of the war, and mingled many errors with a large amount of truth. This production was calculated to provoke a lively sensation, for it assailed the most decided revolutionists, and accused them of hideous treasons. "What has Ronsin done?" inquired Philippeaux; "intrigued, robbed, and lied! His only expedition is that of the 18th September, and in that he contrived to have 45,000 patriots overwhelmed by 3000 brigands. It was that fatal day of Coron, when, after disposing our artillery in a gorge, at the head of a column six leagues in flank, he concealed himself in a stable, like a cowardly knave, two leagues from the field of battle, and when our unfortunate comrades were destroyed by their own cannon." From this specimen, we may judge that the expressions in Philippeaux's publication were not peculiarly choice or guarded. Unfortunately, too, the committee of public welfare, which he ought, upon every principle of policy, to have interested in his favour, was not treated with becoming respect. Philippeaux, irritated at finding his indignation but coldly partaken, implicdly attributed to the committee some of the delinquencies he charged upon Ronsin, and even used this offensive phrase—"If you had only been deceived."

The work, as we have stated, produced a considerable sensation. Camille-Desmoulins was unacquainted with Philippeaux; but, gratified to learn that in La Vendée the ultra-revolutionists were equally obnoxious as at Paris, and not imagining that excess of anger had so blinded Philippeaux as to make him convert mere errors into treachery, he read his pamphlet with delight, admired his courage, and said, with his usual frankness, to all he met—"Have you read Philippeaux? Pray, read Philippeaux." Every one, in his opinion, ought to peruse a work which demonstrated the dangers the republic had incurred by means of the faction of exaggerated revolutionists.

Camille was warmly attached to Danton, and the feeling was reciprocated. Both thought that since the republic was placed beyond danger by its recent victories, the time had arrived for putting an end to cruelties henceforth useless; that such cruelties, if further prolonged, could only serve to disgrace the revolution; and that the foreigner alone could desire or instigate their continuation. Camille conceived the project of publishing a new journal which he entitled the Old Cordelier, for Danton and he were the oldest members of that celebrated club. The object of the paper was to attack the new revolutionists, who were striving to cast down and sweep over the earliest and best tried revolutionists. Never had this writer, the most remarkable of the revolution, and one of the most natural and lively in the French language, displayed so much grace, originality, and even eloquence. He thus opened his first number (15th Frimaire):—

"Oh Pitt! I pay homage to thy genius! What new emigrants from France to England have offered thee such excellent counsels and means so sure to ruin my country? Thou hast seen that thou wouldst perpetually miscarry against her, unless thou took measures to destroy in public opinion those who, for the last five years, have foiled all thy designs. Thou hast well comprehended that they who have always conquered thee were such as it behoved thee mainly to subdue; that thy surest course lay in causing to be accused of corruption those precisely whom thou hadst been unable to corrupt, and of lukewarmness those whose zeal thou hadst ever failed to cool!" "I have opened my eyes," he added, "and beheld the multitude of our enemies: their numbers roused me from the house of invalids, and carried me again into the conflict. I must write, I must quit the slow pencil of the history of the revolution, which I was drawing at my fireside, to resume the quick and beating pen of the journalist, and follow headforemost the revolutionary torrent. A consulting deputy, whom no one has consulted since the 3d June, I leave my cabinet and easy chair, where I have enjoyed ample leisure to study the new system of our enemies."

Camille highly extolled Robespierre for his conduct at the Jacobin Club, and for the generous aid he had rendered the old patriots; and he expressed himself in the following manner with regard to religion and the proscriptions:—

"With the diseased human mind is necessarily associated the bed of superstitious dreams: and looking at the festivals and processions that are enjoined, the altars and saints that are set up, it seems to me that they do but change the bed of the invalid; save that they take from him the pillow of hope in an after life. For myself, I thus spoke the very day on which I saw Gobel come to the bar, with his double cross borne in triumph before the philosopher Anaxagoras.* If it were not a crime of lese-Mountain to suspect a president of the Jacobins and a procurator of the commune, such as Clootz and Chaumette, I should be tempted to believe that at the tidings of Barrère, 'La Vendée exists no longer,' the King of Prussia mournfully cried out, 'All our efforts, then, will fail against the republic, since the nucleus of La Vendée is destroyed;' and that the subtle Luchesini, to console him, might thus address him—'Invincible hero, I discern a resource; leave me to develop it. I will buy some priests to confess themselves cheats, and inflame the patriotism of others to make a similar declaration. There are at Paris two famous patriots, who will be, by their talents, their exaggerations, and their well-known religious ideas, admirably adapted to receive and second our impressions. All we have to do is, to instruct our friends in France to act in concert with the two great philosophers Anacharsis and Anaxagoras, to stir up their bile effectually, and to dazzle their civism by the rich temptation of the sacristies. [I hope that Chaumette will not complain of this inuendo; the Marquis de Luchesini cannot speak of him in more honourable terms.] Anacharsis and Anaxagoras will imagine they are driving the wheel of reason, whilst it will be that of the counter-revolution; and instead of allowing papistry, now ready to heave its last groan, quietly to expire from decay and inanition, I promise you that, by intolerance and persecution against those who want to mass and be massed, many will be the recruits forced into the ranks of Lescure and Larochejacquelein.'"

Subsequently reverting to the era of the Roman emperors, and pretending to give merely a translation from Tacitus, Camille made a startling allusion to the law against "the suspected." "In former times, at Rome," said he, "according to Tacitus, there was a law specifying crimes of lese-majesty and against the state, and inflicting capital punishment. These crimes of lese-majesty under the republic had never exceeded four kinds—if an army had been abandoned in a hostile country; if seditions were excited; if the members of the constituted bodies had wickedly administered the affairs or the finances of the commonwealth; if the majesty of the Roman people had been degraded. The emperors only required to add a few articles to this law, in order to include in the proscription an indefinite number of citizens, and even entire cities. Augustus was the first to extend this law of lese-majesty, by comprehending within it writings he called counter-revolutionary. Shortly the applications stretched beyond all limitation. When words had become state crimes, only a single step was needed to convert into evidences of treason mere expressions of countenance, melancholy, compassion, sighs, silence itself.

Soon it was adjudged a crime of lese-majesty, or counter-revolution, in the town of Nursia, the rearing of a monument to its inhabitants killed at the siege of Modena; a crime of counter-revolution in Drusus, the inquiry from fortune-tellers whether he should not one day possess great wealth; a crime of counter-revolution in the writer Cremuntius Cordus, having styled Brutus and Cassius the last of the Romans; a crime of counter-revolution in a descendant of Cassius, having in his house a portrait of his ancestor; a crime of counter-revolution in Marcus Scaurus, having composed a tragedy containing a verse capable of two interpretations; a crime of counter-revolution in Torquatus Silanus, spending profusely; a crime of counter-revolution in Petræus, having had a dream about Claudius; a crime of counter-revolution in Pomponius, that a friend of Sejanus had sought an asylum in one of his country-houses; a crime of counter-revolution to deplore the calamities of the times, for that was to arraign the government; a crime of counter-revolution not to invoke the divine spirit of Caligula. For having failed therein, numberless citizens were beaten with rods, condemned to mines or wild beasts, and some even sawed through the body. Lastly, it was a crime of counter-revolution in the mother of the consul Fusius Germinus, having wept the mournful death of her son.

It was necessary to testify joy at the death of a friend or a relative, if a citizen wished to avoid perishing himself.

Every thing gave umbrage to the tyrant. Had a citizen popularity? He was a rival of the prince, who might excite a civil war. *Studio civium in se verteret, et si multi idem audeant, bellum esse. SUSPECTED.

Did he, on the contrary, shun popularity, and hold himself secluded within his domicile? Such a retired life caused him to be remarked, gave him consideration. Quanto metû occultior, tantò plus famâ adeptus.† SUSPECTED.

Was he rich? There was imminent danger that the people would be corrupted by his largesses. Auri vim atque opes Pluti, principi infensas.‡ SUSPECTED.

Was he poor? How now, invincible emperor? Such a man cannot be too closely watched. There is none so enterprising as he who has nothing. Syllam inopem, undè præcipuam audaciam.§ SUSPECTED.

Was he of a sombre, melancholy character, or negligent in his attire? What afflicted him was the successful conduct of public affairs. Hominem publicis bonis mœstum.‖ SUSPECTED."

Camille-Desmoulins further continued this striking enumeration of the suspected in the same strain, and drew a dismal picture of what was passing at Paris, by narrating what had been done at Rome. If the pamphlet of Philippeaux had produced a powerful sensation, the journal of Camille-Desmoulins had a tenfold greater effect on the public mind. Fifty thousand copies of each number were sold in a few days. The demand from the provinces was very considerable; and it was secretly circulated amongst the prisoners, who now read with delight, and with some degree of hope for themselves, that revolutionist who had been hitherto so odious in their eyes. Camille, without desiring that the prison gates should be thrown open, or the revolution be made to retrograde, advocated the institution of a committee, to be styled "of clemency," charged to examine the incarcerated, liberate the citizens confined without sufficient cause, and stay the effusion of blood, where too much had been already shed.

The publications of Philippeaux and Desmoulins exasperated the revolutionary zealots to the last degree, and both were denounced at the Jacobin Club. Hébert assailed them with more than wonted fury, and even proposed to strike the authors from the list of the society. He moreover designated Bourdon [de l'Oise] and Fabre-d'Eglantine as accomplices of Camille-Desmoulins and Philippeaux. It will be remembered that Bourdon [de l'Oise] had purposed, in concert with Goupilleau, to supersede Rossignol; he had since openly quarrelled with the staff of Saumur, and never omitted an opportunity of inveighing against the Ronsin faction in the convention. It was thus he became classed with Philippeaux. Fabre was accused of having taken part in the affair of the false decree, and many were disposed to believe him implicated, although he had been exonerated by Chabot. Feeling his position perilous, and having the worst to fear from a system of extreme severity, he had twice or thrice raised his voice for the system of indulgence, had consequently been altogether discarded by the ultra-revolutionists, and been stigmatised as an "intriguer" in the Père Duchêne. The Jacobins, without adopting the violent propositions of Hébert, decided that Philippeaux, Camille-Desmoulins, Bourdon [de l'Oise,] and Fabre-d'Eglantine, should appear at the bar of the club, to give explanations touching their writings and their speeches in the convention.

The sitting at which they were to appear was attended by a prodigious concourse. The seats were furiously disputed, and some were sold as high as twenty-five francs. It was, in fact, the trial of the two new classes of patriots about to be heard before the all-puissant tribunal of the Jacobins. Philippeaux, although not a member of the society, took his station at the bar, and repeated the charges he had already chronicled, either in his correspondence with the committee of public welfare or in his pamphlet. He treated individuals with no more forbearance than he had previously observed, and twice or thrice gave Hébert the lie direct in most insulting language. These heedless personalities of Philippeaux began to agitate the assemblage, and the sitting threatened to end in tumult, when Danton, ascending the tribune, observed, that in order to judge so grave a question, the utmost attention and calmness were indispensable; that he himself had formed no opinion upon Philippeaux or on the truth of his accusations; that he had already stated to him in person—"Thou must prove thy charges, or carry thy head to the scaffold;" that possibly the only guilt rested with the events; but that, howsoever the case might be, it was necessary that every one should be heard, and, what was of more consequence, be listened to.

Robespierre, speaking after Danton, said that he had not read Philippeaux's pamphlet; that he was merely aware the committee was therein made responsible for the loss of 30,000 men; that the committee had no time to answer libels or carry on a paper war; that at the same time he did not imagine Philippeaux guilty of evil intentions, but led away by his passions. "I do not pretend," Robespierre continued, "to impose silence on the convictions of my colleague; but let him examine himself, and judge whether he be altogether free from vanity and hatred. I consider him urged not less by patriotism than by anger; but let him reflect—let him ponder on the contest he provokes! He will find that the moderates will assume his defence, that the aristocrats will side with him, that the convention itself will be divided, that an opposition party may probably be aroused, which would prove of disastrous import, reviving the struggle through which we have recently passed, and the conspiracies we have had such trouble to suppress." He accordingly besought Philippeaux to weigh his secret motives, and the Jacobins to afford him an attentive hearing.

Than the observations of Robespierre nothing could be more just and appropriate, save that the tone partook too much of the supercilious and dictatorial qualities which had more remarkably characterised all his speeches since he had attained undoubted sway over the Jacobins. Philippeaux resumed, fell back into his former personalities, and provoked fresh disturbance. Danton exclaimed, in an accent of impatience, that "it behoved them to cut short such quarrels, and at once to name a commission to examine the documents adducible in the case." Couthon objected that, before having recourse to such an expedient, it was fitting they should be satisfied that the question at issue was worth the trouble—that, in fact, it was not merely a dispute between man and man; and he proposed to demand from Philippeaux whether on his soul and conscience he believed there had been treachery. Then addressing Philippeaux—"Dost thou believe," said he to him, "on thy soul and conscience, there has been treachery?" "Yes," imprudently answered Philippeaux. "In that case," resumed Couthon, "there is no other mode of proceeding: it is incumbent on us to nominate a commission which shall hear the accused and the accusers, and make its report to the society." The proposition was adopted, and the commission named was instructed to examine, besides the accusations advanced by Philippeaux, the conduct of Bourdon [de l'Oise], Fabre-d'Eglantine, and Camille-Desmoulins.

This occurrence took place on the 3d Nivose (23d December). During the interval occupied by the commission in framing its report, the war by pen and word of mouth raged without intermission. The Cordeliers excluded Camille-Desmoulins from their club. They likewise drew up fresh petitions on behalf of Ronsin and Vincent, and marched to communicate them to the Jacobins, for the purpose of engaging the latter to support them before the convention. That crowd of adventurers and dissolute characters, too, with whom the revolutionary army had been filled, appeared every where throughout the capital, in the promenades, the taverns, the cafés, and the theatres, distinguished by worsted epaulettes and mustaches, making a prodigious clamour for Ronsin their general, and Vincent their minister. They were surnamed the Epauletters, and were much dreaded in Paris. Since the law interdicting the sections from assembling more than twice during the week, those assemblies had resolved themselves into popular societies of a most turbulent character. There were generally two of these societies in each section, and all parties interested in provoking a movement distributed their agents amongst them. The epauletters failed not to frequent such congenial arenas, and, by their assistance, tumult and uproar usually predominated in all.

Robespierre, still firm and inflexible, prevailed with the Jacobins to repudiate the petition of the Cordeliers, and induced them, moreover, to disown all the popular societies formed since the 31st of May. These were acts of energy at once prudential and laudable. The committee, at the same time, amidst all these strenuous efforts to put down the turbulent faction, was obliged to take care lest it might be charged with mild and moderate tendencies. For the preservation of its popularity and strength, it was necessary that it should exert the same rigour against the opposite faction. Wherefore, on the 5th Nivose (25th December), Robespierre was appointed to draw up a new report upon the principles of the revolutionary government, and to adduce reasons for adopting measures of severity against certain eminent prisoners. Always intent, as well from policy as from belief, to charge all disorders upon the pretended foreign faction, he imputed to it the faults of both moderates and zealots. "The foreign courts have vomited on France," he said, "all the artful miscreants whom they hold in their pay. These sit in our administrative bodies, and creep into our sectional assemblies and our clubs; they have even appeared in the national representation; they direct, and will eternally direct, the counter-revolution upon the same plan. They hover around us, surprising our secrets, fomenting our passions, and labouring to influence us even in our opinions." Pursuing this strain, Robespierre exhibited them as alternately stimulating to exaggeration or depressing to effeminacy; exciting at Paris a persecution against religion, and in La Vendée a war of fanaticism; assassinating Lepelletier and Marat, and then agitating amongst the populace, to procure them the assignment of divine honours, with the view of rendering their memory ridiculous and odious; giving to or withholding from the people the necessaries of life, causing specie to appear or disappear at pleasure, and, in short, profiting by all accidents to turn them to account against the revolution and France. Thus, summing up all the evils besetting France at the time, which his prepossessions forbade him to view as inevitable, he attributed them to the foreigner, who, doubtless, might rejoice at them, but had, for his share in their provocation, merely to rely on the inherent vices of human nature, and could never have supplied by conspiracies any agency nearly so effective. In conclusion, denouncing as accomplices of the coalition all the distinguished prisoners still surviving, he proposed to send them forthwith before the revolutionary tribunal. Accordingly, Dietrich, Mayor of Strasburg, Custine, son to the unfortunate general of that name, Biron, and other officers obnoxious as friends of Dumouriez, Custine, and Houchard, were destined for immediate condemnation. A decree of the convention, undoubtedly, was not needed to ensure the sacrifice of these victims by the revolutionary tribunal; but the resolution manifested by thus hastening their execution, afforded a proof that the government was not disposed to relax its sternness. Robespierre moreover proposed to augment by a third the territorial recompenses promised to the defenders of the country.

After this report, Barrère was charged to frame another on the arrests, which were stated to be daily on the increase, and to propound means for ascertaining the grounds of such arrests. The aim of this report was to answer, without professing to do so, the Old Cordelier of Camille-Desmoulins, and his proposition of a committee of clemency. Barrère alluded to "translations of ancient authors" in terms of severity, but recommended, nevertheless, the appointment of a commission to inquire into the causes of arrests, which was almost equivalent with the committee of clemency advocated by Camille. However, upon the observations of some of its members, the convention deemed it expedient to adhere to its previous decrees, which made it obligatory on the revolutionary committees to communicate the motives of arrests to the committee of general safety, and permitted the detained to lodge reclamations with that last-named committee.

The government thus pursued its course between the two parties then gathering strength, secretly inclining towards the moderate party, but still afraid to allow its preference to be too marked. Meanwhile, Camille published a number of his journal yet more energetic than its predecessors, which he specifically addressed to the Jacobins. He styled it "My defence;" and it contained the boldest and most unsparing recriminations upon his adversaries.

Adverting to his expulsion from the Cordelier Club, he said—"Pardon, brethren and friends, if I still venture to assume the title of 'Old Cordelier,' after the resolution of the club prohibiting me from using that designation. But, in truth, the revolt of grandchildren against their grandfather, and their injunction against his bearing his own name, involved so incredible an insolence, that I am determined to plead my cause against the ungrateful progeny. I will see to whom of right the name belongs, whether to the grandpapa, or to the children foisted upon him, of whom he never recognised or so much as knew the decimal fraction, and who yet pretend to thrust him from the paternal sanctuary."

He then proceeded to unfold his opinions. "The vessel of the republic floats between two reefs—the rock of exaggeration and the sandbank of moderatism. Perceiving that the Père Duchêne and nearly all the patriot sentinels were standing on deck, telescope in hand, solely occupied in vociferating, 'Take care! you are running on moderatism!' it became imperative on me, an old Cordelier and elder of the Jacobins, to impose on myself the difficult office, which none of the more youthful would attempt from the dread of forfeiting their popularity, of raising the counter cry, 'Take care! you are about to founder on exaggeration!' And estimate the obligation contracted by all my colleagues in the convention towards me, for having thus hazarded my popularity in order to save the ship wherein my stake was not greater than theirs."

He next justified himself touching that expression which had been so often the theme of invective against him, "Vincent-Pitt governs George-Bouchotte." He said, "I called Louis XVI., in 1787, an egregious noodle of a king, without being shut up in the Bastille therefor. Is Bouchotte a more mighty potentate?"

He subsequently passed his antagonists in review. To Collot-d'Herbois he said, that if he (Desmoulins) had his Dillon, he (Collot) had his Brunet and Proli, both of whom he had defended. To Barrère he said, "We no longer know each other on the Mountain. Had it been an old Cordelier like myself, a rectilineal patriot, Billaud-Varennes, for example, who had worried me so savagely, sustinuissem utique (I would have borne it all); I should have said, 'The hasty Saint Paul gives the good Saint Peter a box on the ear for his sins!' But thou, my esteemed Barrère, the enviable guardian of Pamela!*—thou, the president of the Feuillants, who proposed the committee of twelve!—thou who, on the 2d June, brought under deliberation in the committee of public welfare the question whether Danton should be arrested!—thou, whose other transgressions I could so easily illustrate, if I were inclined to rifle the old sack†—thou becomest on a sudden a deputy-Robespierre, and of a verity apostrophisest me thus sharply!"

"This, after all," added Camille, "is a mere man-and-wife squabble with my friends, the patriots Collot and Barrère; but I am in my turn going to be in a furious passion‡ with the Père Duchene, who calls me 'a miserable intriguer—a fit subject for the guillotine—a conspirator who wants to open the prisons to make a fresh La Vendée—a wheedler bribed by Pitt—the long-eared colt of an ass.' Wait, Hébert, I will be at thee in a moment. But it is not with gross epithets and words I shall assail thee; it is with facts."

Then Camille, who had been upbraided by Hébert with having espoused a wealthy female, and dining at the houses of aristocrats, gave the history of his marriage, which had brought him an income of 4000 livres (£166), and a description of his simple, unostentatious, and indolent life. Reverting to Hébert, he called to recollection the former avocation of the check-taker, the frauds which had caused his dismisssal from the theatre, his sudden and undoubted fortune, and covered him with well-deserved infamy. He recounted and proved that Bouchotte had given Hébert, from the funds of the war-department, first 120,000 francs, then 10,000, and then 60,000, for copies of Père Duchêne distributed in the armies; that such copies did not exceed 16,000 francs in value, and that consequently the nation had been robbed of the surplus.

"Two hundred thousand francs," exclaimed Camille, "to this poor sans-culotte Hébert, for supporting the motions of Proli and of Clootz! Two hundred thousand francs for calumniating Danton, Lindet, Cambon, Thuriot, Lacroix, Philippeaux, Bourdon-de-l'Oise, Barras, Fréron, D'Eglantine, Legendre, Camille-Desmoulins, and almost all the commissioners of the convention! For inundating France with his writings, so singularly fitted to improve the mind and heart, 200,000 francs from Bouchotte! Can any one be surprised, after this, at that filial exclamation of Hébert at the sitting of the Jacobins—'To dare attack Bouchotte! Bouchotte, who has placed sans-culottes generals at the head of the armies! Bouchotte, a patriot so supremely pure!' I am astonished that, in the transports of his gratitude, the Père Duchêne did not add, 'Bouchotte, who has given me 200,000 francs since June!'

You talk to me of the society I keep: but does not every one know that it is with the confidant of Dumouriez, the banker Kock, and with the woman Rochechouart, the agent of the emigrants, that the grand patriot Hébert, after traducing in his journal the most incorruptible men in the republic, departs full of glee, accompanied by his Jacqueline, to pass the beauteous days of summer in the country, to drink the wine of Pitt, and swallow toasts to the ruin of the reputations of the founders of liberty?"

Camille next proceeded to reproach Hébert with the ‡ "Bougrement en colère," the phrase of the public hawkers, who, when selling copies of the Père Duchene, were accustomed to cry in the streets—"He is in a furious passion, the Père Duchêne!" (Il est bougrement en colère, le Père Duchene!) style of his journal. "Know'st thou not, Hébert that when the tyrants of Europe wish to make thei slaves believe that France is enveloped in the darkness of barbarism—that Paris, the city so vaunted for its attic wit and taste, is peopled with Vandals—know'st thou not, poor wretch, that it is refuse from thy publication they insert in their gazettes? As if the people were as ignorant as thou wouldst lead M. Pitt to infer—as if we could speak to him only in language equally loathsome—as if such were the language of the convention and the committee of public welfare—as if thy obscenities were those of the nation—as if sewer of Paris were the Seine!"

Camille subsequently accused him of having added by his articles, to the scandal of the worship of Reason: and thereafter broke out thus indignantly: "So, it is this vile panderer, at a wage of 200,000 francs, who would upbraid me with my wife's income of 4000 livres! It is this intimate friend of the Kocks, the Rochechouarts, and an army of sharpers, who would hold me up to obloquy for the society I frequent! It is this senseless or perfidious scribbler, who would reproach me with aristocratic writings—he, whose sheets I can demonstrate to be the joy of Coblentz and the sole hope of Pitt! This man, struck from the list of menials at a theatre for theft, would have struck from the list of the Jacobins, for their opinions, certain deputies, the immortal founders of liberty! This author of filthiness and depravity would be the regulator of opinion—the Mentor of the French people!"

"Let it not be imagined," added Camille-Desmoulins, "that I am to be intimidated by the terrors of arrest, wherewith rumour so rifely threatens me. We are forewarned that the miscreants meditate another 31st of May against the most energetic men on the Mountain. Oh, my colleagues! I will say to you, in the words of Brutus and Cicero—'Nimium timemus mortem et exilium et paupertatem.' We are too much afraid of death, and exile, and poverty! What! when, day by day, twelve hundred thousand Frenchmen confront batteries bristling with murderous ordnance, and fly from victory to victory, shall we, deputies of the convention, who can never fall, like the soldier, in the obscurity of night, mowed down in the dark without witnesses of his valour—we, whose death suffered for liberty can be none other than glorious and solemn, received, as it must be, in presence of the whole nation, of Europe, and of posterity—shall we be more cowardly than our soldiers?—shall we dread the peril of looking Bouchotte in the face?—shall we not venture to brave the mighty wrath of the Père Duchêne, in order thereby to achieve the victory which the people expect from us—victory over the ultra-revolutionists as well as over the counter-revolutionists—victory over all intriguers, over all knaves, over all the ambitious, over all the enemies of the public weal?

Let it not be believed that, even on the scaffold, being sustained by the inward conviction that I have passionately loved my country and the republic, and rewarded with the esteem and regret of all true republicans, I would exchange my doom for the fortune of this miserable Hébert, who, in his paper, urges to despair and revolt twenty classes of citizens—who, to stupify his mind against the stings of remorse and the recollection of his calumnies, has need of a drunkenness stronger than that of wine, and is fain to lap blood at the foot of the guillotine. What, indeed, is the scaffold to a patriot, but the pedestal to a Sidney or a John de Witt? What, in a time of war wherein I have had two brothers cleaved for liberty, is, after all, this guillotine but a sabre-cut, and the most glorious of all for a deputy, the victim of his courage and his republicanism?"

These quotations will give an idea of the manners of the epoch. The roughness, the stoicism, and the eloquence of Rome and Athens, had revived in France with democratic liberty.

This last number of Camille-Desmoulins caused an agitation yet more considerable than those preceding. Hébert was incessant in his denunciations against him at the Jacobins', and continually urged the production of the report by the commission of inquiry. At length, on the 16th Nivose, Collot-d'Herbois appeared in the tribune to read that report. The audience was as numerous as the day on which the discussion had been first entered upon, and seats were sold equally dear. Collot evinced more impartiality than might have been expected from a friend of Ronsin. He censured Philippeaux for implicating the committee of public welfare in his accusations, for showing favourable dispositions towards suspected individuals, for speaking of Biron with eulogy whilst he assailed Rossignol with virulence; and, in short, for manifesting precisely the same preferences as the aristocrats. He likewise reproached him with a fact, which, under actual circumstances, had some weight; to wit, the having suppressed in his last publication the charges alleged against Fabre-Fond, the brother of Fabre-d'Eglantine. Philippeaux, in truth, being unacquainted with either Fabre or Camille, had at first denounced the brother of the former, whom he deemed to have transgressed in La Vendée. But when he became allied with Fabre by his position, and was associated in accusation with him, he withdrew, from a very natural delicacy, the allegations relative to his brother. This circumstance was of itself sufficient to prove that these parties had been induced, by individual considerations and without concert, to act as they had done, and that they by no means formed a real faction. But the spirit of party inspired different conclusions, and Collot insinuated that there existed a furtive intrigue and cabal amongst the advocates of moderation. He reverted to the past, moreover, and upbraided Philippeaux with his votes respecting Louis XVI. and Marat. As to Camille-Desmoulins, he treated him with much less acrimony; he represented him as a good patriot misled by evil company, whom it was fitting to pardon, with a warning, nevertheless, not again to commit similar delinquencies. He accordingly moved the expulsion of Philippeaux, and a simple censure on Camille.

When he had ceased, Camille, present at the sitting, handed a letter to the president, wherein he declared that his defence was contained in his last number, and craved the society graciously to hear its contents. At his request, Hébert, who justly dreaded the public reading of a paper wherein the villanies of his life were exposed, cried out there was a design to complicate the discussion by adducing calumnies against him, and that, to distract attention, he had been charged with robbing the exchequer, which was an atrocious falsehood. "I have the proofs in my hand!" exclaimed Camille. These words caused prolonged tumult. Robespierre the younger at length said that personal disputes ought not to be entertained; that the society had met for other purposes than the care of reputations, and that if Hébert were a thief, it was not interested in the matter; that those who were burdened with self-reproach, must not interrupt the general debate." At these somewhat criminatory expressions, Hébert vociferated—"I have nothing to reproach myself with." "The troubles of the departments," retorted Robespierre the younger, "are thy handiwork; thou hast contributed to provoke them by attacking the liberty of religion." Hébert was silenced by this direct assault. Robespierre the elder then ascended the tribune, and observing greater caution than his brother, but without being more favourable to Hébert, said that Collot had presented the question under its genuine aspect; that an untoward incident had disturbed the dignity of the discussion; and that all were censurable—Hébert as well as those who had answered him. "What I am about to say," he added, "has reference to no individual. They show bad grace who complain of calumny when they themselves have calumniated. They have no ground for complaining of injustice, who have judged others with inconsiderate precipitation and fury. Let every man probe his conscience, and apply these reflections. I was anxious to prevent the present discussion; I desired that in private interviews, in amicable conferences, each should offer explanations and confess his errors. By such means, the parties might have arrived at a mutual understanding, and spared themselves much scandal. But my counsels were unheeded; pamphlets were circulated the very next day, and the utmost eagerness evinced to foment excitement. At present, all that concerns us in these personal quarrels is, not to ascertain whether on all sides passion and injustice have predominated, but whether the accusations directed by Philippeaux against the persons charged with the most important of our wars are well founded. Such is the point it behoves us to elucidate, not in the interest of individuals, but in that of the republic."

Robespierre, in effect, deemed it fruitless to discuss the allegations of Camille against Hébert, for all were aware of their substantial accuracy. He was furthermore of opinion that they involved nothing which the republic was interested in authenticating; but that, on the contrary, it was of material moment to investigate the conduct of the generals in La Vendée. In accordance with these views, the inquiry relative to Philippeaux was resumed. The whole sitting was devoted to the examination of divers witnesses from the theatre of war; but, from out their contradictory statements, Danton and Robespierre declared they could winnow no precise facts whereon to ground a satisfactory judgment. The debate, already tediously prolonged, was adjourned to the following sitting.

On the 18th the society again met. Philippeaux was absent. The discussion of which he was the subject, having led to no important revelation, had become generally wearisome, and attention was directed to Camille-Desmoulins. He was called upon for explanations touching the encomiums he had passed on Philippeaux, and the relations he held with him. Camille knew him not, so he asseverated; certain facts avouched by Goupilleau and Bourdon had at first persuaded him that Philippeaux spoke truly, and he had been filled with indignation; but now that he perceived, from the inquiry, that Philippeaux had tampered with the truth (which began indeed to transpire on all points), he retracted his eulogies, and allowed he had no longer any opinion on the subject.

Robespierre, once more rising to deliver his sentiments respecting Camille, repeated much of what he had previously stated in his behalf; averring that his character indeed was exemplary, but that this acknowledged estimation gave him no warrant to write against patriots; that his publications were eagerly perused by the aristocrats, to whom they gave especial joy, and were circulated through all the departments; that he had translated Tacitus without comprehending him; that he must be treated like a headstrong boy, who had handled dangerous weapons, and used them noxiously—pledged to forsake aristocrats and other evil society whereby he had been corrupted; and that, whilst granting him forgiveness, the numbers of his journal must be burnt. Hereupon Camille, forgetting the circumspection necessary towards the arrogant Robespierre, exclaimed from his seat—"Burning is not answering." "Very well!" retorted Robespierre, splenetically, "let us not burn, then, but answer; let us now read Camille's numbers. Since he will have it so, let him be covered with ignominy; let the society give vent to its indignation, since he obstinately persists in vindicating his diatribes and his dangerous principles. The man who so strenuously adheres to perfidious writings is perhaps more than misled; if he had been truly sincere, if he had written in the simplicity of his heart, he would not have ventured longer to uphold works proscribed by patriots and welcomed by counter-revolutionists. His courage is merely derivative; it reveals the hidden influence under which he has written his journal; it tells that Desmoulins is the organ of a wicked faction, which has borrowed his pen in order to distil its poison with more security and effect." Camille in vain essayed to speak and propitiate Robespierre; the club refused to hear him, and forthwith passed to the perusal of his papers.

With whatever respect and temper individuals may be disposed to treat one another in the contests of party, it is seldom but that ere long egotism is piqued, and its attendant passions become predominant elements in the strife. With such susceptibility as that of Robespierre on the one hand, and such careless frankness as that of Camille on the other, it was inevitable that collision of opinion should eventually provoke the irascibilities of self-love, and resolve into personal animosity. Robespierre held Hébert and his partisans in too great contempt to enter into altercation with them; but it was far different with a writer so celebrated in the revolution as Camille-Desmoulins; and the latter unfortunately lacked sufficient art in conciliation to avert a rupture.

The reading of Camille's journal occupied two entire sittings. Afterwards the inquiry relative to Fabre was opened. That personage was subjected to a long interrogatory, chiefly with the view of extracting from him what share he had taken in composing the writings recently disseminated. On that point he parried his querists by observing, that he did not attend upon an indictment for punctuation; and, with respect to Philippeaux and Bourdon de l'Oise, he stated he could safely affirm himself to be unconnected with them. At length a motion was formally made to adopt a resolution affecting the four individuals arraigned. But Robespierre, albeit little disposed to shield Camille, proposed to leave the question where it stood, and pass to another subject of greater gravity—one more worthy of the society and more beneficial to the public mind—to wit, the vices and crimes of the English government. "That atrocious government," said he, "conceals, under certain appearances of liberty, a principle of frightful despotism and machiavelism; we must denounce it to its own people, and answer its calumnies by proving its vices of organisation and its unparalleled enormities." The Jacobins were heartily enough inclined to the theme, for it promised a vast field to their mania for invective; but some amongst them desired preliminarily to anathematise Philippeaux, Camille, Bourdon, and Fabre. One voice was even heard to accuse Robespierre of arrogating a species of dictatorship. "My dictatorship," he exclaimed, "is that of Marat and Lepelletier; it consists in being daily and hourly exposed to the daggers of the tyrants. But I am weary of the disputes perpetually arising in the heart of the society, and which lead to no useful end. Our veritable enemies are foreigners; it is they we must confront—it is their webs we must unravel." Robespierre, in consequence, renewed his proposition, and prevailed in carrying, amidst loud applause, that the society, setting aside all disputes at issue between individuals, should devote the ensuing sittings to discuss, without interruption, the vices of the English government.

This was adroitly to divert the unquiet imagination of the Jacobins, and direct it upon a topic calculated to afford lengthened occupation. Philippeaux had retired without awaiting the decision. Camille and Bourdon were neither expelled nor confirmed; all further mention of them was avoided, and they were content to withhold attendance at the society. As for Fabre-d'Eglantine, although Chabot had entirely exculpated him, the facts which daily came to the knowledge of the committee of general safety no longer permitted his confederacy to be matter of doubt: it became necessary to issue a warrant of arrest against him, and to unite him with Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, and Julien of Toulouse.

From all these discussions there remained an impression unfavourable to the new moderates. Amongst the parties lately on trial there had been in reality no sort of concert. Philippeaux, almost a Girondist heretofore, was unacquainted with Fabre, Camille, and Bourdon; Camille alone was indifferently connected with Fabre; and as to Bourdon, he was a complete stranger to the other three. But it was incontinently inferred that a secret faction was in existence, whereof they were the dupes or accomplices. The facility of character, the epicurean tastes of Camille, and two or three banquets he had partaken with the rich financiers of the epoch; the proved confederacy of Fabre with stockjobbers, and his recent opulence, all strengthened the supposition that they were combined with the pretended corrupting faction. None yet ventured to designate Danton as their leader; but, if he were not accused in a public manner, if Hébert in his paper and the Cordeliers in their tribune still respected that redoubtable revolutionist, in conversation such sinister inferences circulated freely.

The most hurtful man to the party was Lacroix, whose exactions in Belgium were so notorious that they might be safely charged upon him without risking a denunciation for calumny, and without his venturing to retort. He was classed with the moderates, on account of his former connexion with Danton, and defiled them by his infamy.

The Cordeliers, meanwhile, indignant that the Jacobins had abstained from passing judgment on the arraigned, resolved—1st, That Philippeaux was a calumniator; 2d, That Bourdon, the inveterate accuser of Ronsin, Vincent, and the war department, had lost their confidence, and was in their estimation but an accomplice of Philippeaux; 3d, That Fabre, who partook the sentiments of Bourdon and Philippeaux, was only a more artful intriguer; and, 4th, That Camille, already excluded from their ranks, had likewise lost their confidence, although he had in times past rendered good service to the revolution.

After Ronsin and Vincent had been detained in prison for some time, they were liberated, for it was impossible to bring them to trial on any feasible ground. Ronsin could not be prosecuted for his conduct in La Vendée, as the events of that war were enveloped in profound obscurity, nor more so for his performances at Lyons, since that would start a dangerous question, and involve a censure on Collot-d'Herbois and the ruling system of the government. It was equally difficult to impeach Vincent for certain acts of alleged despotism in the offices of the war department. An arraignment for political opinions was the only process available against either, and the moment had not yet arrived for hazarding the experiment. They were accordingly set at liberty,* to the great joy of the Cordeliers and all the epauletters of the revolutionary army.

Vincent was a young man of twenty and some years, a species of enthusiast, whose fanaticism amounted to disease, and to whom alienation of mind might be rather imputed than personal ambition. One day, as his wife, who visited him in confinement, was recounting to him the passing events, moved with indignation at the recital, he sprang upon a lump of raw meat, and, as he tore it with his teeth, passionately repeated, "Thus would I devour all the miscreants!" Ronsin, alternately a mediocre pamphleteer, a contractor, and a general, combined considerable intelligence with undoubted courage and great activity. Naturally prone to exaggerated dogmas, but ambitious withal, he was the most distinguished of those adventurers who had pressed forward to serve as the instruments of the new government. Nominated chief of the revolutionary army, he revolved the means of turning his position to account, either for his own behoof or for the advancement of his proper system. He and Vincent, when confined together in the prison of the Luxembourg, had always demeaned themselves as superiors; from the first, they boasted they would prevail over intrigue, issue forth in triumph by the exertions of their partisans, and then return to enlarge the captive patriots and dispatch all the other prisoners to the guillotine. Throughout their detention they had cruelly annoyed the unfortunate persons incarcerated with them; and when they were happily removed, they left them full of terror.

No sooner beyond the walls of the Luxembourg than they loudly proclaimed they would have their revenge, and speedily find means to reckon with their enemies. The committee of public welfare had been almost constrained to liberate them; but it was not slow in perceiving it had unchained two furies, whom it was essential to render with all promptitude incapable of injury. At the period of their release there remained at Paris 4000 men of the revolutionary army. These were in great part composed of adventurers, thieves, and Septembrizers, who assumed the mask of patriotism, and infinitely preferred a roving and plundering career in the interior to incurring a life of hardship and peril by joining the armies on the frontiers. Those contemptible bullies, with their fierce mustaches and long swords, exercised an insufferable despotism in all public places. Besides, possessing artillery, munitions, and an enterprising leader, they might really become dangerous to the governing power. To them were joined the restless characters swarming in the offices of Vincent's department. That person was their civil chief, as Ronsin was their military one. They held correspondence with the commune through Hébert, the substitute of Chaumette, and through Pache the mayor, who made it a point to entertain all parties and to court men of formidable influence. Momoro, one of the presidents of the Cordelier Club, was their faithful partisan and advocate with the Jacobins. Thus Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, Chaumette, and Momoro, were classed together; and to the list were added Pache and Bouchotte, as functionaries who allowed them to usurp two important branches of authority.

These men observed no measure in their discourse against the national representatives, who designed, as they alleged, to perpetuate their power and show favour to aristocrats. One day, happening to dine with Pache, they met at his table Legendre, the friend of Danton, formerly the imitator of his vehemence, now of his reserve, and the victim of that imitation, for he encountered the attacks which the boldest shrunk from directing against Danton himself. Ronsin and Vincent took the opportunity of assailing him in terms of contumely. Vincent, who had been under obligations to him, saluted him, saying that he saluted the old and not the new Legendre; that the new Legendre had become a moderate, and had forfeited all title to esteem. Vincent afterwards sneeringly asked him whether he had worn the costume of a deputy in his missions. Legendre having answered that he wore it in the armies, Vincent observed that it was doubtless a very grand uniform, but unworthy of true republicans; adding, that he would dress up an effigy in the costume, assemble the people, and say to them—"Behold the representatives you have given yourselves! They preach equality to you, and deck themselves in gold and feathers!" He moreover intimated that he would set fire to the aforesaid effigy. Legendre, thereupon, told him he was a fool and a seditious knave. The polite dialogists rose to end their encounter by personal combat, but were restrained by the pitiable terror of their host. Legendre, addressing himself to Ronsin, who appeared more calm, urged him to tranquillise Vincent; to which appeal Ronsin responded by stating that his friend Vincent was certainly hot, but that his character suited the circumstances of the times, and that such men were needed in the present emergency. "You have a faction," he added, "in the heart of the convention; unless you take care to get rid of it, you will render us a severe account." Legendre left the house with indignation, and repeated abroad what he had seen and heard during the entertainment. The conversation thus becoming public, gave a more striking idea of the audacity and frenzy of the two men so recently liberated from thraldom.

At the same time, these parties professed a high respect for Pache and his virtues, as the Jacobins had formerly done when he was in the ministry. It was the fortune of Pache to charm by his complaisance and mildness the most violent factionists. They were delighted to find their passions approved by a man bearing all the outward semblance of eminent sagacity. The new revolutionists, they affirmed, would make him an important personage in their government; for, without having any definite aim, without having formed any project, or indeed possessing the requisite hardihood for an insurrection, they vapoured prodigiously, after the fashion of all disturbers, who begin by testing and stimulating their spirit in words of sound and fury. They every where proclaimed the time arrived for new institutions. The only objects that met their approbation in the actual system of the government were the revolutionary tribunal and army. Consequently, they imagined a constitution whereof the prominent features were a supreme tribunal presided by a grand-judge, and a military council directed by a generalissimo. In this government, trials, as well as administrative details, would be conducted upon military principles. The generalissimo and the grand-judge were the two chief personages. To the tribunal would be assigned a grand-accuser, under the title of censor, whose functions were to consist in instituting prosecutions. Thus, in this scheme, the wild offspring of revolutionary ferment, the two material, if not solitary provinces of government, were to condemn and give battle. We are ignorant whether the project originated with some enthusiast in a delirium, or with several amongst the extreme party; and whether it had any other existence than in verbal froth, or was regularly digested; but this much is certain, that its model was to be found in the revolutionary commissions established at Lyons, Marseilles, Toulon, Bordeaux, and Nantes, and that the imagination being heated by the awful occurrences in those great cities, their ruthless executors longed to govern all France on the same plan, and to make the violence of a day the type of a permanent government. As yet one only of the individuals proposed to be elevated to these supreme dignities was designated. Pache was admirably adapted for the office of grand-judge; and, accordingly, the confederates gave out that he was destined to fill it, and should assuredly do so. Without knowing any thing of the scheme in embryo, or of this extraordinary dignity of grand-judge, many repeated as matter of gossip—"Pache is to be made grand-judge." This rumour circulated without being either explained or comprehended. As to the post of generalissimo, Ronsin, although general of the revolutionary army, ventured not to aspire, nor his partisans to propose him for it, because a greater name than his was required for such a dignity. Chaumette, too, was indicated by certain of the initiated as censor, but his name was more rarely mentioned. Amidst the various reports, none became well-established save that which affirmed Pache to be the intended grand-judge.

During the whole course of the revolution, whenever the passions of a party, after long incitement, were ready to burst the trammels of control, it was always a defeat, a treason, a dearth, some calamity, in short, which served as the pretext for explosion. The example was not belied in the present instance. The second law of the maximum, which, stretching beyond the stores of retailers, fixed the value of commodities at the place of production, determined the cost of transport, and settled the profit of the wholesale dealer and also that of the retailer, had, we are aware, been passed; but trade still eluded in various ways the despotism of the law, evading it above all in the most disastrous form—stagnation. Articles of consumption were not less withheld than formerly; and if they were no longer refused to purchasers at the par value of assignats, they were hoarded or not moved, and thus ceased to be transported to the great emporiums of commerce. This general stagnation of trade naturally caused great scarcity. Nevertheless, the extraordinary efforts of the government, and the indefatigable labours of the committee for supplies and provisions, had partly succeeded in preventing an extreme deficiency of grain, and, above all, in allaying the dread of a famine, equally formidable as the reality, on account of the doubts and uncertainties it provokes in commercial relations. But a new calamity had lately happened to aggravate existing difficulties, namely, a falling off in the supply of meat. The droves of cattle that La Vendée sent into the neighbouring provinces before the insurrection, no longer arrived. The departments of the Rhine had likewise ceased to furnish any since they had become the seat of war; whence there resulted a considerable diminution in the actual quantity forwarded from the grazing districts. Furthermore, the butchers, buying animals at a high price and obliged to sell them at the arbitrary rate of the maximum, laboured diligently to evade the law. The good meat was reserved for the rich, or for the thriving tradesmen, who were able and content to pay extravagantly. Clandestine sales were made in great abundance, especially in the environs of Paris and in the country; so that there remained merely the refuse for the people, and for such buyers as visited the public shops, and bargained on the basis of the maximum. Thus the butchers were compensated for the low price at which they were constrained to sell by the inferior quality of their merchandise. The populace raised furious outcries against the weight and quality of the meat, against merry-makings, and against the secret markets established around Paris. Upon the failure of cattle fit for the shambles, it had been found necessary to slaughter cows with calf. The populace instantly exclaimed that the butcher aristocrats wished to destroy the species, and loudly demanded the penalty of death against all who should kill cows or ewes with young. But this was far from being the extremity of the evil; vegetables, fruits, eggs, butter, fish, no longer appeared in the markets. A cabbage often realised twenty sous (tenpence). The carts were met on the highways, surrounded by clamorous competitors, and their burdens purchased at any price; little arrived in Paris, where the people were anxiously but fruitlessly awaiting the necessary supplies. Whenever any branch of industry is opened, persons are quickly found to prosecute it. Employment was to be gained by scouring the country, and forestalling gardeners and farmers bringing vegetables and other produce to market; and a multitude of men and women eagerly assumed the labour, buying the articles on account of affluent individuals, by paying for them above the maximum value. Wherever a market better provisioned than others was heard of, thither speeded those active interlopers, and carried away every edible fragment at prices far superior to the fixed tariff. The people were moved with extreme wrath against those who followed this trade; it was even said that in the number were many of those unfortunate public females whom the ordinances of Chaumette had driven from their wretched avocation, and who, as a means of livelihood, had embraced this novel profession.

To obviate all these inconveniences, the commune had ordained, on the reiterated petitions of the sections, that the butchers should no longer be permitted to meet the droves of cattle on the way, or traffic out of the ordinary markets; that they might kill only in the authorised slaughter-houses; that meat should be sold only in the stalls; that none should be allowed to anticipate the farmers in their progress to town, but that upon their arrival they should be directed by the police, and distributed in equal proportions amongst the different markets; and that it should be unlawful to take station at the butchers' doors before six in the morning, it often happening that persons rose at three for that purpose.

These multiplied regulations were all inadequate to relieve the people from the sufferings they endured. The ultra-revolutionists racked their imaginative powers for additional expedients. A final idea had occurred to them, to wit, that the ornamental gardens so numerous in the faubourgs of Paris, and especially in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, might be put under cultivation. The commune, which refused them nothing, had immediately ordered a survey and allotment of those gardens, upon which being accomplished, it was determined that potatoes and pot-herbs should be there reared. Moreover, they had surmised that the cause of vegetables, dairy produce, and poultry, not arriving in the city, was imputable to the aristocrats who had withdrawn to their country-houses. It was a fact that many of the wealthy classes had retreated to the concealment of their residences around Paris. Certain sections appeared before the commune, urging it to pass an ordinance or to demand a law for the purpose of compelling their return. Chaumette, however, feeling that such an interference would be too odious a violation of personal liberty, contented himself with delivering a threatening oration against the aristocrats in retirement around the city. He addressed to them an invitation to re-enter Paris; and further, at his instance, the village municipalities were exhorted to keep a strict watch on their proceedings.

Impatience under the distress, meanwhile, attained an alarming height. In all the markets a frightful disorder reigned. Tumults arose every instant. Applicants had to stand in a row at the doors of the butchers, and notwithstanding the prohibition to attend there before a certain hour, the same eagerness to anticipate others was still evinced. A custom which had originated at the bakers' shops was adopted here also: a rope was attached to the post of the stall, which each grasped and firmly held to maintain his station. But it happened, as before the bakers', that mischievous or backward persons cut the cords, whereupon the ranks were confounded, the attendant throng was thrown into the direst confusion, and vehement wrangles, nay, pugilistic struggles, repeatedly ensued.

All ingenuity seemed baffled. The people could not, as previous to the 31st May, complain that the convention refused a law for the maximum, the object of all hopes, since it in truth granted every demand. The wildest imagination being now at a loss for devices, the convention indeed was no longer troubled with suggestions or commands. Still, however, it was impossible that the voice of vituperation should be stilled: the epauletters, the clerks in Bouchotte's war-offices, and the Cordeliers, exclaimed that the cause of the dearth lay in the moderate faction of the convention; that Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeaux, Bourdon de l'Oise, and their friends, were the authors of all the evils afflicting the community; that existence was no longer possible under such calamities, and that recourse must be had to extraordinary means; adding the old phrase in requisition during every insurrection—"We want a chief." Then they whispered mysteriously amongst themselves—"Pache must be made grand-judge."

At the same time, although this violent party could bring considerable means to bear, and had in its favour the revolutionary army and a famine, the government and public opinion, as represented by the all-pervading Jacobins, were arrayed against it. Ronsin, Vincent, and Hébert were constrained to profess outward respect for the established authorities, to conceal their designs, and to cabal in the shade. At the eras of the 10th August and the 31st May, the conspirators, masters of the commune, the Cordelier, Jacobin, and all the clubs, and having in the national assembly and its committees numerous and energetic partisans, could prosecute their plots in the face of day, openly instigate the people to abet them, and use large masses in the execution of their purposes; but the case was very different with the party of ultra-revolutionists.

The paramount authority of the time refused no extraordinary measures of defence or even of vengeance; no acts of treachery belied its vigilance; on the contrary, victories on all the frontiers attested at once its strength, ability, and zeal. Consequently, those who assailed that authority and promised superior energy or capacity, were obviously influenced by views of personal ambition or by an inordinate thirst for disorder. Such, in truth, was the public conviction, and the caballists could have but slender hopes of drawing the people in their wake. Thus, although they might become formidable if left to agitate, they were very partially so if timeously grappled with.

The committee narrowly observed them, and it continued, in a series of reports, to analyse the two opposing parties. In the ultra-revolutionists it perceived veritable conspirators to destroy; but in the moderates it beheld merely old friends still participating its opinions, whose patriotism seemed above suspicion. But, to avoid even the semblance of retrogression in the suppression of the ultra-revolutionists, it was necessitated to condemn the moderates, and remind them ever and anon of the sword of terror. These ventured to retort. Camille published further numbers of his journal; Danton and his friends combated in discourse the reasons of the committee; and thus ensued an avowed warfare carried on by the press and by verbal recrimination. Acrimony was of course engendered; and Saint-Just, Robespierre, Barrère, and Billaud, who had originally repudiated the moderates solely from policy and in order to strengthen their hands against the ultra-revolutionists, now began to attack them with the virulence of personal spleen and hatred. Camille had previously assailed Collot and Barrère, as we narrated at the time. In his letter to Dillon, he had ridiculed the dogmatical fanaticism of Saint-Just and the monkish austerity of Billaud, in a strain of sarcasm they bitterly resented. Robespierre, also, he had incensed at the Jacobin Club, and, even whilst grossly lauding him, he had contrived to rouse all the implacable ire of the man. Danton was offensive in their eyes on account of his fame; and now that he stood aloof from the conduct of affairs, censuring the government, and appearing to instigate the caustic and *gossiping pen of Camille, he necessarily became still more odious to them. It was not probable that Robespièrre would again incur the hazard of defending him.

Robespierre and Saint-Just, who were accustomed to draw up expositions of principles in the name of the committee, and were in some sort charged with the moral part of the government, whilst Barrère, Carnot, Billaud, and others, undertook the material and administrative part, presented two reports, the one "on the moral principles which ought to actuate the revolutionary government," and the other on the detentions whereof Camille had complained in his Old Cordelier. It is interesting to learn how two such sombre spirits understood the revolutionary government, and what were their means of regenerating a state.

"The principle of the government-democratic is virtue," said Robespierre,† "and its agency, whilst consolidating, is terror. We propose to substitute, in our native country, morality for selfishness, probity for honour, principles for usages, duties for civilities, the empire of reason for the tyranny of fashion, contempt of vice for contempt of mischance, stateliness for insolence of bearing, high-mindedness for vanity, the love of glory for the love of pelf, honest men for polite society, merit for intrigue, genius for wit, truth for show, the charms of content for the lassitude of voluptuousness, the greatness of man for the pettiness of the great, a people magnanimous, puissant, and happy, for a people agreeable, frivolous, and wretched; that is to say, all the virtues and marvels of a republic for all the vices and absurdities of a monarchy."

To attain this desirable end, an austere and energetic government was needed, so he maintained, fitted to surmount resistances of every kind. On the one hand was brutal and lustful ignorance, seeking only for riot and confusion in the republic; and on the other, vile and effeminate corruption, sighing for the enjoyments of former luxuriousness, and incapable of submitting to the hardy virtues of democracy. Hence two factions; the one striving to carry all things to extremes—to dethrone God himself under the plea of attacking superstition, and to shed torrents of blood under the pretext of avenging the republic; the other weak and vicious, boasting itself "not sufficiently virtuous to be so inexorable," and ignominiously lamenting over all the sacrifices which the consolidation of virtue rendered necessary. "The first of these factions," Saint-Just averred,* "wishes to convert liberty into a bacchanal, the latter into a prostitute."

Robespierre and Saint-Just set forth the follies of certain agents of the revolutionary government, and of two or three procurators of communes, who had pretended to revive the energy of Marat; and they also alluded to the various extravagances of Hébert and his associates. They afterwards descanted on the failings of weakness, complaisance, and sensibility, imputed to the new moderates; reproaching them with mourning over the lot of generals' widows, of intriguing women belonging to the old nobility, and of all female aristocrats, and with incessantly expatiating on the severities of the republic, although far inferior to the cruelties of monarchies. "You have," said Saint-Just, "one hundred thousand persons in detention, and the revolutionary tribunal has already condemned three hundred of the guilty. But under the monarchy you had four hundred thousand prisoners; fifteen thousand illicit traders were hanged every year; three thousand men were broken on the wheel; and even at the present day, there are four millions of captives in Europe to whose cries you are insensible, whilst your parricidal moderation would allow all the enemies of your own government to triumph! We are overwhelmed with reproaches, whilst kings, a thousand times more cruel than we, are left to slumber in crime!"

The two reporters added, agreeably to the preconceived system, that both factions, in appearance antagonistic, had a common basis, the foreigner, who incited them to their respective agitation with the design of ruining the republic.

We here perceive how much of fanaticism, policy, and hatred was incongruously commingled in the system of the committee. Camille deemed himself and his friends attacked by allusions and even by direct expressions. He replied, in his Old Cordelier, to the assumption or theory of virtue by upholding the principle of happiness. He stated that he loved the republic because it was calculated to increase general felicity; because commerce, industry, and civilisation had been developed with greater lustre at Athens, Venice, and Florence, than in any monarchy; and because a republic alone could realise that deceptive promise of the monarchy, "A fowl in the pot." "What would Pitt care that France were free," exclaimed Camille, "if freedom only served to carry us back to the ignorance of the old Gauls, to their coarse and uncouth raiment, their braccæ and sagi, to their food of acorns, and to their huts of clay? Far from lamenting, it occurs to me that Pitt would give very many guineas to have such liberty established amongst us. But the English government would be rendered frantic if that were said of France which Dicœarchus said of Attica—'In no part of the world can a man live more agreeably than at Athens, whether he have money or have none. Those who have acquired wealth, by commerce or by their industry, are able to procure every imaginable comfort; and as to those who are yet struggling with the world, there are so many workshops where they may earn enough to divert themselves at the Anthesteries, and yet put something aside, that none can have cause to complain of poverty, without implying a reproach on himself for idleness.'

I therefore hold that liberty does not exist in an equality of privations, and that it would convey the highest eulogium on the convention if it could thus speak in testimony of itself—'I found the nation sans culottes [breechless], and I leave it culottée [breeched].'"

"How delectable a democracy was that of Athens!" added Camille. "Solon did not pass therein for a debauchee; he was not less regarded as the model of legislators, and proclaimed by the oracle the first of the seven sages, although he cared not to confess his inclination for wine, women, and music; and he has a reputation for wisdom so firmly established, that even at the present day his name is pronounced in the convention and the Jacobin Club as that of the greatest legislator. How many amongst us are held as aristocrats and Sardanapaluses who have published no such profession of faith!

And the divine Socrates, one day, meeting Alcibiades gloomy and thoughtful, probably because a letter from Aspasia had troubled him—'What distresses you?' said to him that gravest of Mentors; 'have you lost your shield in battle? Have you been overcome in the camp, on the race-course, or in the hall of arms? Has some one sung better or played more sweetly on the lyre than you at the general's table?' How admirably does this depict the manners of the time! What amiable republicans!"

Camille subsequently complained that not only the manners of Athens, but the freedom of language prevalent in that republic, were alike proscribed. Aristophanes, he said, represented generals, orators, philosophers, and the people themselves, on the stage; and the people of Athens, sometimes pourtrayed in the character of an old man, sometimes in that of a youth, far from being irritated, proclaimed Aristophanes victor of the games, and rewarded him with crowns and plaudits. Many of those comedies were directed against the ultra-revolutionists of that age, and were filled with the bitterest raillery. "And if any one," added Camille, "should now translate one of those pieces represented 430 years before Christ, under the Archon Stenocles, Hébert would assert at the Cordelier Club that it could only be a work of yesterday, the invention of Fabre-d'Eglantine, levelled at him and Ronsin, and that the translator was the cause of the scarcity."

"Nevertheless," resumed Camille, mournfully, "I err when I state that men are changed; they have always been the same: liberty of speech met with no greater impunity in ancient republics than in modern. Socrates, accused of having denied the gods, drank hemlock; Cicero, for having attacked Antony, was included in the proscription."

In this passage the writer seemed to predict that license would be no more pardoned in him than in so many of the illustrious dead. His pleasantries, his lively eloquence, in truth, greatly exasperated the committee. Whilst it merely kept a watchful eye on Ronsin, Hébert, Vincent, and the other agitators, it harboured a deadly hatred against the open-hearted Camille, who laughed at its systems; against Danton, who was held to instigate him in the tone of his articles; and, moreover, against all the supposed friends or partisans of those two leaders.

* Report of the 8th Ventose (26th February).

In adherence to its prescribed line of conduct, the committee presented two decrees in connexion with the reports of Robespierre and Saint-Just, tending, it averred, to render the people happy at the expense of their enemies. By these decrees, the committee of general safety was solely invested with the faculty of examining the reclamations of prisoners, and of liberating them if ascertained to be patriots. All those, on the other hand, who were recognised as enemies of the revolution, should remain in confinement until the peace, and then be banished for life. Their possessions, provisionally sequestrated, were appointed to be divided amongst indigent patriots, of whom lists were to be framed by the communes.* This was, in reality, an agrarian law, applied against the suspected for the profit of the patriots. These decrees, conceived by Saint-Just, were intended as answers to the ultra-revolutionists, and as measures calculated to preserve the committee its reputation for energy.

Meanwhile, the caballists bestirred themselves with increasing violence. There is nothing to prove that their designs were definitively considered, or that they had brought Pache and the commune into their confederacy. But they agitated in like manner as before the 31st May; they incited the popular societies, the Cordeliers, and the sections, busied themselves in propagating alarming rumours, and sought all means to profit by the troubles and discontent springing from the scarcity, which every day rendered more general and severe.

Suddenly inflammatory placards and tracts appeared, affixed and distributed in the various markets, insisting that the convention was the cause of all the calamities affecting the people, and that the dangerous faction which was striving to revive the Brissotins and their hateful system must be thence rooted out. Some of these publications even maintained that the entire convention ought to be renewed, a chief nominated, and the executive power organised, &c. In short, all the ideas that Vincent, Ronsin, and Hébert, were known to entertain, formed the staple of these productions and seemed to betray their origin. At the same time, the epauletters, more turbulent and overbearing than ever, were heard openly to threaten that they would scour the prisons and exterminate the enemies whom the corrupt convention persisted in sparing. They asserted, moreover, that numerous patriots were unjustly confounded in captivity with the aristocrats, but whom it was their intention to select from the impure, and invest at once with liberty and arms. Ronsin, in grand costume as general of the revolutionary army, wearing a tri-coloured scarf and a huge scarlet tassel, and accompanied by several of his officers, visited the prisons, inspected the registers, and drew up analogous lists.

On the 15th Ventose (6th March), the section of Marat, under the presidency of Momoro, assembled, and indignant, as it recited, at the machinations of the enemies of the people, it resolved by acclamation that it was in a state of resistance; that the table of the declaration of rights should be veiled; and that it would remain in such state until food and liberty were assured to the people, and their enemies effectually punished. During the same evening, the Cordeliers mustered in a tumultuous gathering; their orators expatiated on the public sufferings, and recounted the persecutions recently undergone by those two pre-eminent patriots, Ronsin and Vincent, who, they alleged, had been ill whilst in the Luxembourg, and been denied the common privilege of a physician to attend them. In consequence, the country was declared in danger, and the declaration of rights ordered to be veiled. It was thus that all the insurrections had commenced, by resolutions purporting the suspension of all law, and the determination of the people to resume the exercise of their sovereignty.

* Decrees of the 8th and 13th Ventose, year 2.

On the morrow, the section of Marat and the Cordeliers appeared before the commune to intimate their resolutions, and induce it to adopt similar proceedings. Pache discreetly avoided attendance. One named Lubin presided at the council-general. He replied to the deputation with evident embarrassment. He said it seemed surprising that the moment when the convention was taking such energetic measures against the enemies of the revolution, and in relief of indigent patriots, should be selected to hoist the signal of distress and to veil the declaration of rights. Then pretending to justify the council-general, as if it were accused, he affirmed that the council had directed all its energies to ensure adequate supplies and their equitable distribution. Chaumette discoursed in a manner equally vague. He recommended peace and concord, and strongly urged the completion of the reports on the cultivation of the ornamental gardens and on the provisioning of the capital, wherein, according to the decrees, supplies were to be accumulated as in a menaced fortress.

Thus the leaders of the commune hesitated: the movement, although tumultuous, was not sufficiently powerful to carry them in its wake, or to inspire them with courage to betray the committee and the convention. The disorder prevailing nevertheless was extreme. An insurrection was commencing precisely as those which had heretofore succeeded, and one calculated to provoke equal apprehension. By an unlucky fatality, too, the committee of public safety was deprived at the time of its most influential members. Billaud-Varennes and Jean-Bon-Saint-André were absent on affairs of administration; Couthon and Robespierre were indisposed, and the latter was disabled from coming forth to rule his faithful Jacobins. Upon Saint-Just and Collot-d'Herbois alone devolved the task of combating the danger. They repaired together to the convention, where the members were congregating in all the hurry and trepidation of unseasonable affright. On their proposition, Fouquier Tinville was immediately summoned, and charged to use all diligence in discovering the distributors of the incendiary writings circulated in the markets, the agitators who stirred up the popular societies, and all the conspirators, in short, who threatened the public tranquillity. He was enjoined by an express decree to arrest them forthwith, and to render within three days his report thereon to the convention.

It availed little to have extorted a decree from the convention, for that body had never refused such means against perturbators; the Girondists, for instance, had been freely armed therewith against the insurgent commune; hence its execution altogether depended on the committee enlisting opinion in its favour. Collot, who enjoyed great popularity amongst the Jacobins and Cordeliers by his proficiency in club oratory, and, moreover, by an acceptable force of revolutionary sentiment, undertook that charge, and proceeded in all haste to the Jacobin Club. Scarcely had the members thereof assembled, than he presented to them a portraiture of the factions then endangering liberty, and of the plots in preparation. "A fresh campaign," he said, "is about to open; the labours of the committee, which so auspiciously terminated the last campaign, were preparing for the republic fresh victories. Relying on your confidence and approbation, which it has always assiduously laboured to merit, the committee was pursuing its operations, when suddenly our enemies have endeavoured to fetter it in its course; they have stimulated patriots against it, with the view of setting them in opposition to it, and of inciting them to slaughter each other. They wish to make us soldiers of Cadmus; they would have us immolated by the hands of our comrades. But no, we will not be the soldiers of Cadmus! Thanks to your excellent spirit, we will remain friends, and we shall be the soldiers of liberty alone! Supported by you, the committee will know how to resist with energy, to repress the agitators, to expel them from the ranks of the patriots; and, after that indispensable sacrifice, to prosecute its labours and your victories. The post in which you have placed us," added Collot, "is perilous; but none of us trembles before the danger. The committee of general safety accepts its painful mission to watch and pursue all the enemies who manœuvre in secret against liberty; the committee of public welfare neglects nothing to fulfil its vast duties; but both require to be supported by you. In these days of danger, we are but few. Billaud and Jean-Bon are absent; our friends Couthon and Robespierre are ill. We remain therefore in small force to combat the enemies of the public weal: we must either be sustained by you or retire." "No, no," cried the Jacobins; "you need not retire—we will support you!" Vociferous acclamations accompanied these encouraging expressions. Collot continued, and narrated what had passed at the Cordelier Club. "There are men," said he, "who have lacked courage to suffer a few days' detention—men who have undergone no trials during the revolution—men whose advocacy we have undertaken when we deemed them oppressed, and who strive to excite an insurrection in Paris, because they have been confined a few seconds. An insurrection, because two men have suffered—because a physician did not attend them when they were unwell! Cursed be they who seek an insurrection!" "Yes, yes! cursed! cursed!" responded all the Jacobins in chorus.

"Marat was a Cordelier," resumed Collot-d'Herbois, "and Marat was a Jacobin. Well! he was persecuted also, assuredly much more than these men of a day; he was dragged before the tribunal where none but aristocrats ought to appear: did he provoke an insurrection? No. The sacred insurrection, the insurrection appointed to free humanity from its oppressors, takes birth in sentiments purely generous, not in such petty feelings as those wherewith these men would fainly actuate us. But we will not fall into their snares. The committee of public welfare will not yield to intriguers; it is taking strong and vigorous measures; and, though it be destined to perish, it will not recoil from its glorious task!"

When Collot ceased, Momoro essayed to justify the section of Marat and the Cordeliers. He allowed that a veil had been cast over the declaration of rights, but he disavowed the other charges; he denied the design of an insurrection, and asserted that the section of Marat and the Cordeliers were animated with the very purest sentiments. When conspirators are constrained to retract and to prevaricate, they are already doomed. When it comes to pass that they dare not avow their insurrectionary purpose, and that the mere announcement of their aim fails to fire a mine of sympathy in their favour, they are substantially powerless. Momoro was heard with marked disapprobation; and, ultimately, Collot was commissioned to proceed, in the name of the Jacobins, to fraternise with the Cordeliers, and to redeem those erring brethren from the thraldom of pernicious monitors.

The night being already far advanced, Collot was unable to visit the Cordeliers until the following day, the 17th Ventose (8th March); but the danger, however formidable at first, had visibly declined in magnitude. It had been made evident that opinion was not favourably disposed towards the conspirators, if that name could be applied to them. The commune had shrunk at the critical moment, and the Jacobins had adhered to the committee and to Robespierre, although that potential leader was debarred from appearing amongst them. The Cordeliers, albeit excited and impetuous, but feebly directed, and, above all, deserted by the commune and the Jacobins, could scarcely be expected to resist the congenial declamation of Collot-d'Herbois, and the honour of seeing in their tribune so renowned a member of the government. Vincent, with all or more than his wonted frenzy; Hébert, with his despicable journal, of which he multiplied the numbers; and Momoro, with his resolutions of the Marat section—were utterly incompetent to instigate a decisive movement. Ronsin alone, with his epauletters and a considerable store of munitions, was in a position to have attempted a sudden onslaught. Nor did he lack the requisite audacity; but whether he found his friends deficient in the daring which animated his own breast, or whether he could not sufficiently rely on his troop, it is certain he remained inactive; and from the 16th to the 17th, the crisis reached not beyond the ferment of agitation and redundant menaces. The epauletters spread through the popular societies, and threw them all into boisterous tumult; but they were overawed from having recourse to arms.

On the evening of the 17th, Collot repaired to the Cordelier Club, where he was hailed with congratulatory acclaim. He explained to the members "that the secret enemies of the revolution were seeking to beguile their patriotism; that they had been moved to declare the republic in a state of distress, whereas royalty and aristocracy alone were, at the moment, in the throes of agony; that wicked men had endeavoured to divide the Cordeliers and Jacobins, who ought, on the contrary, to compose but one family, united in principles and views; that the project of an insurrection, and the veil thrown over the declaration of rights, had gladdened the hearts of aristocrats, and that yesterday they had all imitated the example, and shrouded in their saloons the declaration of rights; and that consequently, to avoid thus signally gratifying the common enemy, it behoved them with all speed to unveil the sacred code of nature." The Cordeliers were regained by such assurances, although a great number of Bouchotte's subordinates was amongst them; they hastened to signalise their repentance by tearing away the crape hung before the declaration of rights and delivering it to Collot, with an entreaty to assure the Jacobins that they would always march in an identical path.

Within a few minutes Collot-d'Herbois was in the midst of the Jacobins, proclaiming to them their victory over the Cordeliers and the ultra-revolutionists. The conspirators were thenceforth abandoned on all sides; the only resource left them was a bold and sudden attack, which, as we have intimated, was almost impossible. The committee of public welfare promptly resolved to prevent any such desperate movement on their part, by causing the principal leaders to be arrested, and sending them forthwith before the revolutionary tribunal. It ordered Fouquier to collect the facts necessary to prove a conspiracy, and to prepare articles of impeachment without delay. Meanwhile, Saint-Just was commissioned to make a report to the convention against the united factions which threatened the tranquillity of the state.

On the 23d Ventose (13th March), Saint-Just presented his report. In conformity with the adopted system, he still pourtrayed the foreigner as instigating two factions seemingly adverse—the one composed of seditious men, incendiaries, plunderers, defamers, and atheists, who laboured to throw the republic into chaotic confusion by exaggeration; the other composed of corruptionists, stockjobbers, and extortioners, who, having yielded to the seductions and allurements of pleasure, tended to enervate and dishonour the republic. He alleged that the first of these two factions had taken the initiative, and had endeavoured to raise the standard of revolt, but that it would be speedily suppressed; and he concluded by demanding in consequence a decree of death against all, in general terms, who had meditated the subversion of the existing authority, assisted in corrupting the public mind and republican manners, impeded the arrival of supplies, and contributed in any manner to the plan hatched by the alien. Saint-Just subsequently added, that, from this time forth, "It was necessary to in- scribe on the order of the day, justice, probity, and all republican virtues."

In this report, indited in a spirit of fanatical violence, all the factions were equally menaced; but there were explicitly devoted to the mercies of the revolutionary tribunal only the ultra-revolutionary conspirators, such as Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, &c., and the corruptionists Chabot, Bazire, Fabre, and Julien, the fabricators of the false decree. A sinister reserve was affected towards those whom Saint-Just stigmatised as "indulgents" and "moderates."

In the course of the same evening, Robespierre appeared at the Jacobin Club with Couthon, and both were greeted with enthusiastic cheers. The members surrounded them, congratulated them on the re-establishment of their health, and promised towards Robespierre in particular an unlimited devotion. He moved an extraordinary sitting for the morrow, with the view of elucidating the mystery of the detected conspiracy. The sitting was voted at once. The obsequious eagerness of the commune was equally striking. On the proposition of Chaumette himself, it was resolved to solicit a formal communication of the report delivered by Saint-Just to the convention; and meanwhile messengers were dispatched to the printing-office of the republic to obtain a copy for immediate perusal. All submitted with perfect docility to the triumphant power of the committee of public welfare. During that night, Fouquier-Tinville took into custody Hébert, Vincent, Ronsin, Momoro, Mazuel, one of Ronsin's officers; and, lastly, the foreign banker Kock, an ultra-revolutionary stock-jobber, at whose table Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, frequently regaled themselves and arranged all their schemes. Thus the committee had two foreign bankers available to convince the sceptical that the two factions were impelled by the coalition. The Baron de Batz could serve to prove the fact against Chabot, Julien, Fabre, against all alleged corruptionists and moderates, in short; and Kock was adducible to prove the same charge against Vincent, Ronsin, and the ultra-revolutionists.

The prisoners enumerated had surrendered themselves without resistance, and they were consigned the following day to the Luxembourg. Its previous occupants thronged joyfully forward to witness the arrival of those furious characters who had so cruelly terrified them by the threat of a renewed September. Ronsin evinced infinite firmness and indifference; the dastardly Hébert drooped in hopeless depression, Momoro was struck with consternation, and Vincent fell into convulsions. The report of these arrests circulated rapidly through Paris, and produced general satisfaction. Unfortunately, it was attended with a further rumour that all was not yet finished, and that the adherents of every faction were to be instantly crushed. The assertion was accredited in the extraordinary sitting of the Jacobins. After each had recounted what he knew of the conspiracy, of its authors, and of their projects, some were there who roundly intimated that all suspected plots were to be investigated, and that a report would be framed on other men besides those actually seized.

The offices of the war department, the revolutionary army, and the Cordelier Club, were all struck at in the persons of Vincent, Ronsin, Hébert, Mazuel, and Momoro. An inclination was felt to aim a blow at the commune also. The rumour touching the office of grand-judge being destined for Pache, had been universally disseminated; but he was known to be incapable of engaging in a conspiracy, to be docile towards the supreme authority, and to be respected by the people; wherefore it was deemed advisable to refrain from the possibly hazardous experiment of sending him to join his late associates. The arrest of Chaumette seemed preferable; for although he was neither bolder nor more dangerous than Pache, yet he had been, from vanity and a species of infatuation, the author of many most imprudent resolutions on the part of the commune, and one of the most zealous apostles of the worship of Reason. Accordingly, the unfortunate procurator was apprehended and transmitted to the Luxembourg, in company with Bishop Gobel, principal actor in the famous scene of the abjuration, and Anacharsis Clootz, already excluded from the convention and the Jacobin Club on account of his foreign origin, his nobility, his wealth, his universal republic, and his atheism.

When Chaumette arrived at the Luxembourg, its numerous inmates, the whole body of the suspected, pressed eagerly to meet him, and discharged upon his head a storm of raillery. He, poor creature, with an insatiable passion for declamation, was utterly devoid of Ronsin's audacious spirit or of Vincent's furious excitement. His lank hair and demure furtive aspect gave him the appearance of a missionary; and in reality he had filled the part with respect to the newly invented faith. The prisoners derided him for his requisitions against courtesans, against aristocrats, against the suspected, and regarding the famine. One amongst them addressed him, with a low bow, thus—"Philosopher Anaxagoras, I am suspected, thou art suspected, we are suspected." Chaumette attempted to exculpate himself in a deprecatory and trembling tone. But thenceforward he never ventured to leave his cell, or to appear in the court amidst his fellow-captives.

After thus securing the purposed victims, the committee devolved on its consort of general safety the task of framing the articles of accusation against Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, Julien of Toulouse, and Fabre. All five were included in the same indictment, and remitted to the revolutionary tribunal. At this moment, it was learned that a female emigrant, pursued by a revolutionary committee, had found an asylum under the roof of Herault-Séchelles. Already that well-known deputy, who joined to a large fortune high birth, an elegant exterior, and an accomplished and graceful mind—who was the friend of Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, Proli—and who often shuddered to find himself in the ranks of those fearful revolutionists—had fallen under suspicion, and the merit of being the principal author of the existing constitution had been long forgotten. The committee hastily seized the occasion to order his arrest, first because it bore him no love, and secondly because it desired to show it would proceed without any scruple against all moderates surprised in delinquency, and treat them with no greater measure of indulgence than other offenders. Thus the wrath of the redoubtable committee fell indiscriminately on men of all ranks, all opinions, and all degrees of merit.

The trial of a portion of the conspirators commenced on the 1st Germinal (20th March). In the same arraignment were combined Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, Momoro, Mazuel, Kock the banker, Leclerc, a young Lyonnese who had become the head of a department in the war-office under Bouchotte; Ancar and Ducroquet, commissioners of supplies; and certain other members of the revolutionary army and the war ministry. To maintain the supposition of confederacy between the ultra-revolutionary faction and that of the foreigner, with these were confounded Proli, Dubuisson, Pereyra, and Desfieux, who had never held any relations with them. Chaumette was reserved to figure hereafter with Gobel and the other instigators of the worship of Reason; except that Clootz, who ought to have been associated with the latter, was tacked to Proli in his capacity of a foreigner. The accused were nineteen in number. Ronsin and Clootz were the most firm and undaunted. "This," said Ronsin to his fellows in misfortune, "is a political trial; what avail your papers and your labours at justification? You will be condemned. When you ought to have acted, you talked; now learn to die! For myself, I swear you will never see me quail; endeavour to do as much.'

The despicable Hébert and Momoro uttered grievous lamentations, asserting, amongst other things, that liberty was ruined. "Liberty ruined!" exclaimed Ronsin, "because a few miserable individuals are about to perish! Liberty is immortal; our enemies will fall after us, and liberty will survive the whole!" Recriminations subsequently passing amongst them, Clootz exhorted them not to aggravate their calamities by mutual invectives, and he repeated to them the famous apologue—

> "Je revais cette nuit que, de mal consumé, > Côte à côte d'un gueux on m'avait inhumé."*

The quotation had its effect, and they ceased to upbraid each other with their common fate. Clootz, still full of his philosophical opinions though so near the scaffold, laboured diligently to eradicate the last remnants of deism which might be still lingering in their minds, and to the last preached the cause of nature and reason with ardent zeal and an inconceivable contempt of death.

They were conducted to the tribunal amidst a prodigious concourse of spectators. The recital of their conduct has shown us in what their conspiracy really consisted. Clubbists of the lowest grade, the dregs of official schemers, thieves and murderers enrolled in the revolutionary army, they had exhibited the usual exaggeration of inferiors, of subordinates intrusted with commissions, who invariably exceed their mandate. Thus they had endeavoured to urge the revolutionary government into a mere military commission, the abolition of a state religion into a proscription of all worship, republican manners into revolting coarseness, liberty of speech into the most disgusting grossness, democratic jealousy and severity with regard to individuals, in fine, into a system of the most atrocious defamation. Abusive expressions against the convention and the ruling committee, wild schemes of government verbally propounded, turbulent motions at the Cordelier Club and in the sections, foul placards and tracts, a visit by Ronsin to the prisons, to ascertain whether any patriots were confined therein as he himself had lately been; lastly, certain vapouring menaces, and an attempt at a movement under favour of the general scarcity—such were their plots. Herein was little more than the vile and stupid effervescence of restless iniquity. A conspiracy profoundly laid and concerted with the foreigner, was far above the capacity of such despicable creatures. That was the perfidious allegation of the committee, which the infamous Fouquier-Tinville was charged to maintain before the tribunal, and which the tribunal had orders to hold irrefragably demonstrated.

The insulting language in which Vincent and Ronsin had indulged towards Legendre, when dining in his company with Pache, and their reiterated propositions for organising the executive power, were adduced as substantiating the project to annihilate the national representation and the committee of public welfare. Their repasts at the house of Kock the banker were alleged as attesting their correspondence with the foreigner. This charge was further supported by testimony of a different character. Certain letters written from Paris to London, and inserted in the English newspapers, had announced that, judging from the prevailing agitation, fresh movements might be anticipated. These letters were held to prove that the foreigner was in the confidence of the accused, since he could so accurately foreshow their purposes. The scarcity, with which they had reproached the government to excite the people, was imputed to them alone; for Fouquier, rendering calumny for calumny, maintained that they were the authors of this very dearth, by causing the waggons bearing vegetables and other produce to be pillaged. The munitions collected at Paris for the revolutionary army were charged upon them as preparations for the conspiracy. The visit of Ronsin to the prisons was given as evidence of a design to arm the suspected and to turn them loose on the Parisians. Lastly, the writings distributed in the markets, and the veil thrown over the declaration of rights, were represented as overt acts of actual sedition. As for Hébert, he was covered with infamy. His political acts and his journal were scarcely alluded to; it was deemed enough to prove against him petty thefts of shirts and handkerchiefs.

But let us turn from the odious discussions between such degraded criminals and the equally degraded accuser, of whom a terrible government made use to accomplish the sacrifices it required. Holding aloof in its elevated sphere, that government marked out the individuals who were obstacles in its way, and left to its attorney-general Fouquier-Tinville the task of satisfying forms by falsehoods. If, in this hideous hecatomb, sacrificed to the exigency of public tranquillity, any particular victims merit a separate notice, they are those unfortunate strangers, Proli and Anacharsis Clootz, arraigned as agents of the coalition. Proli, as we have narrated, being intimately acquainted with Belgium, his native country, had blamed the ignorant violence of the Jacobins in that state; he had, moreover, admired the talents of Dumouriez, and avowed it before the tribunal. His knowledge of foreign courts had on different occasions rendered him useful to Lebrun, and this he also avowed. "Thou hast blamed the revolutionary system in Belgium," said his judges; "thou hast admired Dumouriez, thou hast been the friend of Lebrun; therefore art thou an agent of the foreigner." There was not another fact adduced against him. As to Clootz, his universal republic, his creed of reason, his income of a hundred thousand livres, and certain endeavours on his part to save a female emigrant, sufficed to convict him. Scarcely had the third day of the investigation commenced, than the jury declared itself sufficiently informed, and forthwith condemned at one swoop the whole array of intriguers, agitators, and aliens, to the pains of death. One only was excepted, a person named Laboureau, who had served in the affair as a spy of the committee. On the 4th Germinal (24th March), at four in the afternoon, the condemned were conveyed to the place of execution. The crowd was equally great as on any previous occasion. Places on waggons and on tables disposed around the scaffold were openly let to the highest bidders. Neither Ronsin nor Clootz quailed, to use their own terrible expression. Hébert, overwhelmed with disgrace, shame, and scorn, made no effort to surmount his terror; he repeatedly fainted on the way, and the populace, brutal as he himself was vile, followed the fatal cart, repeating the cry of the news-venders, "He is in a furious passion, the Père Duchêne!"

Thus were these worthless characters sacrificed to the indispensable necessity of consolidating a firm and vigorous government: and here the essential need of order and obedience was not one of those sophisms under cover of which governments are wont to immolate their victims. All Europe menaced France, and at the very time, every presumptuous demagogue was endeavouring to arrogate a share of authority, and endangering the public welfare by incessant contests. In such an exigency, it was absolutely requisite that some superior and energetic men should seize and appropriate this disputed authority, hold it to the exclusion of all, and be thereby enabled to direct its whole force in resisting combined Europe. If we experience any regret, it is to witness the employment of falsehood against such despicable persons; to see amongst them a man of great courage, Ronsin; an inoffensive maniac, Clootz; and a foreigner, possibly an intriguer, but no conspirator, and possessing a high degree of merit, the unfortunate Proli.

* [This apologue is a short poem of ten lines, the composition of a Caen poet, named Patrix, and written on his deathbed. It contains but a trite moral. The poet dreams that, dying, he is buried by the side of a beggar, and disgusted with such company, he abuses his companion in opprobrious terms, and commands him to begone. The beggar reminds the aristocratic poet that where they have now met there is no distinction of rank. D'Israeli thus translates the concluding lines of the beggar's reply:—

> "Here all are equal—now thy lot is mine!—
> I on my dunghill, as thou art on thine!"]

When the Hébertists had undergone their final doom, the indulgénts exhibited infinite joy, and exclaimed every where that they must have been right in denouncing Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, since the committee of public welfare and the revolutionary tribunal had consigned them to death. "Of what, therefore, can we be accused?" they said. "Our only offence is having reproached those factious individuals with designing to overthrow the republic, destroy the National Convention, supplant the committee of public welfare, add the danger of religious to that of civil war, and provoke general confusion. This is precisely what Saint-Just and Fouquier-Tinville upbraided them with, when sending them to the scaffold. In what can we be conspirators or enemies of the republic?"

Nothing could be more just than these reflections, and the committee thought exactly as Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeaux, or Fabre, respecting the danger of that anarchical turbulence. In proof whereof, Robespierre, since the 31st May, had constantly defended Danton and Camille, and as constantly animadverted upon the anarchists. But, as we have already intimated, the committee, in crushing the latter, exposed itself to the stigma of moderatism, and was constrained to display unrelenting rigour in the contrary direction, in order to avoid compromising its revolutionary reputation. Albeit holding identical sentiments with Danton and Camille, the circumstances of the times made it imperative that it should censure their opinions, repudiate them in its public documents, and, in short, appear not to favour them more than the Hébertists themselves. In his report against the two factions, Saint-Just had accused the one equally with the other, and had observed an ominous silence with regard to indulgents. At the Jacobin Club, Collot had stated that all was not concluded, and that a report was preparing against others besides the men actually arrested. To these menaces was joined the apprehension of Herault-Séchelles, the friend of Danton, and one of the most esteemed personages of the epoch. Such indications were far from announcing any intention to relax in severity, and yet it was repeated on all sides that the committee purposed to retrace its steps, to mitigate the revolutionary system, and to take vengeance on destroyers of every description. Those who ardently longed for such return to a more merciful policy—the detained, their families, all the peaceable citizens, in short, harassed under the name of "indifferents"—gave way to those indiscreet hopes, and openly affirmed that the government of blood was at length about to finish. This was soon the general opinion; it circulated rapidly in the departments, especially in those of the Rhone, where some months previously such atrocious vengeance had been wreaked, and through which Ronsin had spread such terror. At Lyons, the inhabitants breathed freely for a moment, ventured to look their oppressors in the face, and seemed to warn them that their cruelties would be brought to a speedy termination. At these rumours, at these anticipations of the middle and peaceable class, the patriots no longer restrained their indignation. The Jacobins of Lyons wrote to those of Paris that aristocracy was again rearing its head; that in a short time they would be unable to hold their ground; and that, if strength and encouragement were not given to them, they would be driven to commit self-murder, like the patriot Gaillard, who had thrust a dagger into his body on the occasion of Ronsin's first arrest.

"I have seen letters," said Robespierre to the Jacobins, "from some of the Lyonese patriots: they all evince the same despair; and if some prompt remedy be not applied to their sores, they will have no solace but in the recipe of Cato and Gaillard. The pernicious faction, which, affecting an extravagant patriotism, was furtively plotting the immolation of the patriots, has been suppressed; but that is of little consequence to the foreigner, so long as another is rampant. If Hébert had been victorious, the convention was scattered, the republic fell into chaos, and tyranny was satisfied; but with the moderates, the convention loses its energy, the crimes of the aristocracy remain unpunished, and the tyrants triumph. The foreigner, therefore, has as much hope from the one as from the other of these factions, and he suborns them all without relying solely on any. What cares he for Hébert dying on the scaffold, if traitors of another kind remain to him, ready to aid in accomplishing his designs? You have then done nothing so long as a faction is still extant and left to be destroyed; the convention is resolute in its purpose to exterminate them all, even to the last fragment."

Thus was it made apparent that the committee had felt the necessity of clearing itself from the reproach of moderation by a new sacrifice. Robespierre had heretofore defended Danton, when a turbulent faction would have struck that most renowned of patriots at his very side. At that time both policy and their common danger counselled him to vindicate his old colleague; but now that audacious faction was no more. By longer defending this now unpopular colleague, he incurred the certain hazard of compromising himself. Besides, the conduct of Danton was calculated to awaken certain misgivings in his jealous breast. What was Danton's position aloof from the committee? In close association with Philippeaux and Camille-Desmoulins, he seemed the instigator and veritable leader of that new opposition which harassed the government with incessant censures and most pungent raillery. Seated in front of the tribune, whence the members of the committee propounded their views, Danton had for many a day borne a scowling and contemptuous expression as he heard and eyed them. His demeanour, his words, eagerly caught up and repeated from mouth to mouth, his intimacies, all tended to demonstrate that, after thus alienating himself from the government, he had resolved into its bitter detractor, and kept himself apart from all contact, as if to set in opposition against it his own great revolutionary name. For, be it remembered, although sunk in popularity, he still enjoyed an extraordinary reputation for hardihood and political genius. Thus, were Danton removed, no commanding influence would remain without the pale of the committee, to eclipse or discredit the secondary men of whom it was composed, such as Saint-Just, Couthon, and Collot-d'Herbois. By consenting to the sacrifice, also, Robespierre would at once get rid of a rival, restore to the government its reputation for energy, and enhance his own fame for virtue by smiting a man so generally accused of unduly relishing money and pleasure. Moreover, he was especially urged thereto by all his colleagues, to whom Danton was more obnoxious than to himself. Couthon and Collot-d'Herbois were conscious that the celebrated tribune held them in supreme contempt. Billaud, envious, cold-blooded, and ruthless in temperament, looked malignantly on a man before whom he felt himself, as it were, insignificant and overawed. Saint-Just, dogmatical, austere, and arrogant, was the very antithesis to a vivacious, free, and open-hearted revolutionist; and he foresaw that, were Danton dead, he would become the second person in the republic. All, in fine, were aware, that in his project for remodelling the committee, Danton held that Robespierre alone ought to be retained. They therefore surrounded their potential colleague, and in truth found no great difficulty in wringing from him a concurrence in what so agreeably flattered his ambition and pride. We cannot recount the precise arguments that influenced the decision, or assign the day whereon it was taken; but, as by some secret concert, they all suddenly became threatening and mysterious. Amongst those who narrowly watched the lowering portents, no doubt was felt as to their real intentions. At the convention and the Jacobin Club, it is true, they observed an absolute silence; but the sinister rumour travelled in a quick under-current. It was stated that Danton, Camille, Philippeaux, and Lacroix, were marked as sacrifices to the authority of the committee. Some common friends of Danton and Robespierre, alarmed at these intimations, and judging that if such a blow were struck none could henceforward deem himself in security, nay, that Robespierre even could not be altogether tranquil, endeavoured to bring them together and provoke a mutual explanation. Robespierre, shrouding himself in an obstinate silence, refused to reply to these overtures, and maintained a stern and sullen reserve. When they spoke to him of the friendship he had formerly testified for Danton, he answered as an accomplished hypocrite, that he was powerless either for or against his colleague; that justice would always shield innocence; that for himself, his whole life had been a continual sacrifice of his affections for his country; and that if his friend were guilty, he would sacrifice him with regret, but still he must sacrifice him, as any other criminal, to the republic.

The true intent of these evasions was sufficiently obvious; and those anxious peace-makers were convinced that Robespierre purposely avoided contracting any engagement towards Danton, but reserved to himself the liberty of giving him up to his colleagues. Meanwhile, the rumour of the impending arrests acquired greater consistence. The friends of Danton surrounded him, and earnestly besought him to rise from his species of slumber, to shake off his indolence, and to erect once more that revolutionary front which had never been shown in vain during the storm. "I know," said Danton, "they want to arrest me. But," he added, "they will not dare!" And, after all, what could he do? To fly was impossible. What country would have afforded an asylum to this terrible revolutionist? And ought he by flight to have confirmed all the calumnies of his enemies? Moreover, he truly loved his country. "Can a man carry his country at the sole of his foot?" he often exclaimed. On the other hand, if he remained in France, but few means of resistance were available to him. The Cordeliers were devoted to the ultra-revolutionists, and the Jacobins to Robespierre. The convention was paralysed and terror-stricken. Where was the support on which he could rely? This question has not been sufficiently considered by those who, seeing this extraordinary man overturn the throne on the 10th August and arouse the whole population against aggressive foreigners, have expressed such amazement that he fell without a struggle. Revolutionary genius does not consist in regaining a lost popularity, or in creating forces which have no existence, but in directing the affections of a people when fully possessed. The generous sentiments of Danton, and his alienation from affairs, had almost wholly deprived him of the popular favour, or at all events had not left him enough to subvert the reigning authority. Impressed with the conviction of his comparative impotence, he remained quiescent, and repeated—"They will not dare!" He might, in fact, with some reason, believe that before so formidable a name and such great services, his adversaries would hesitate. He thus sunk back into his lethargy, or, more correctly speaking, into that proud indifference of strong minds awaiting expectant danger without using undignified exertions to avert it.

The committee still observed a gloomy silence, whilst sinister rumours continued thickly to circulate. Six days had elapsed since the execution of Hébert, and it was now the 9th of Germinal. The peaceable class of citizens, who had formed indiscreet hopes from the suppression of the furious faction, suddenly originated a report that the community would be speedily freed from the two martyrs, Marat and Chalier; that sufficient had been detected in their lives to transform them, as rapidly as Hébert, from patriots into miscreants. This assertion, founded on the idea of a retrograde movement, was propagated with singular industry; and on all sides men were heard repeating that the busts of Marat and Chalier were about to be broken. Legendre foolishly denounced these inconsiderate words before the convention and the club of Jacobins, as if to protest, in the name of his friends the moderates, against any such design. "Be under no alarm," said Collot to the Jacobins; "these reports will be belied. We have directed the thunderbolt on the infamous men who were deceiving the people—we have torn from them the mask which concealed their deformity; but they are not alone in their iniquity! We will tear away all possible masks. Let not the indulgents imagine that it is for them we have fought—that it is for them we have here held such glorious sittings! We shall soon undeceive them."

In fact, the very next day, 10th Germinal (31st March), the committee of public welfare, to invest its determination with the greater authority, called to its counsels the committee of general safety and the committee of legislation. When all the members were assembled, Saint-Just arose, and, in one of those violent and insidious reports he knew so well how to frame, he denounced Danton, Desmoulins, Philippeaux, and Lacroix, and proposed their apprehension. The members of the two other committees, dismayed and trembling, durst offer no resistance, but hoped rather to keep the danger from themselves by signifying a ready adherence. The strictest silence was enjoined; and during the night of the 10th Germinal, Danton, Lacroix, Philippeaux, and Camille-Desmoulins were surprised, arrested, and lodged in the Luxembourg.

Almost by dawn the intelligence had travelled over Paris, throwing its inhabitants into a species of stupor. The members of the convention assembled in terror and silence. The committee, which was invariably to be waited for, having already assumed all the offensive insolence of power, had not yet arrived. Legendre, who had not been deemed sufficiently important to be arrested with his friends, hastened to occupy the tribune. He said, "Citizens, four members of this assembly have been arrested last night; I know that Danton is one of them—I am ignorant of the names of the others; but whoever they may be, I move that they be heard at the bar. Citizens, I declare that I esteem Danton as pure as myself; and I have yet to learn that any thing can be possibly alleged against me. I will not attack any member of the committees of public welfare and general safety; but I am justified in expressing my apprehension that private antipathy and personal feelings have dragged from liberty men who have rendered the most signal and beneficial services. The man who, in September 1792, saved France by his energy, surely deserves a hearing, and ought to have the privilege of explanation accorded him, when he is accused of having betrayed his country."

To obtain for Danton the power of addressing the convention, was the best expedient for saving him and foiling his adversaries. Several members, in consequence, intimated their opinion in favour of hearing him; but, in the midst of the discussion, Robespierre, preceding the committee, arrived, mounted the tribune, and in an angry and menacing tone spoke in these terms:—"From the unusual excitement pervading this assembly, from the agitation caused by a previous speaker, it is plain that some question of great interest occupies you; that the point at issue is, whether a few individuals shall this day prevail over the country. But how could you forget your principles so far as to entertain a proposition for granting to certain persons what you have formerly refused to Chabot, Delaunay and Fabre-d'Eglantine? Why this difference in favour of particular individuals? What care I for the eulogiums which men pass on themselves and their friends? Fatal experience has taught us to distrust such eulogies. Our province is to inquire, not whether a man has performed such or such a patriotic act, but what has been his whole course of conduct.

Legendre professes ignorance as to the names of those who are arrested. The whole convention knows them. His friend Lacroix is amongst the number; why does Legendre feign to be ignorant of that? Because he is well aware that none can with decency defend Lacroix. He has spoken of Danton, because he thinks, doubtless, a privilege is attached to that name. No; we will have no privileges—we will have no idols!"

At these last words great applause was manifested; and the cowardly members, then trembling before an idol, hailed with seeming rapture the downfall of one that was no longer to be feared. Robespierre continued: "In what is Danton superior to Lafayette, Dumouriez, Brissot, Fabre, Chabot, or Hébert? What is said of him that may not be said of them? And yet, did you exhibit any delicacy towards them? You are told of the despotism of the committees, as if the confidence the people have reposed in you, and which you have delegated to those committees, was not a sure guarantee of their patriotism. Fears are affected, too; but, I say, whoever trembles at this moment is guilty, for innocence never dreads public vigilance."

Here arose further plaudits from those very poltroons who were then sitting in mortal trepidation, and who would fain prove they had no fear. "And in me also," added Robespierre—"in me also it has been sought to inspire terror. I have been emphatically warned, that after attaining Danton, the danger might reach myself. I have been so admonished in writing. The friends of Danton have loaded me with letters, they have besieged me in person with exhortations; they imagined the remembrance of an old intimacy—a bygone faith in false virtues—would induce me to relax my zeal and passion for liberty. Indeed! I assert that if the dangers of Danton were certain to become mine, such a consideration would not weigh with me for an instant. Now especially it behoves us all to evince some courage and greatness of soul. Vulgar minds or guilty men alone dread to see their prototypes fall, because, having then no longer a barrier of the criminal before them, they stand exposed to the glare of truth; but if such vulgar minds exist, there are in this assembly sufficient of the heroic cast, who will know how to brave all factitious terrors. Moreover, the number of the guilty is not great; crime has found but few partisans amongst us, and the country will be delivered at a trifling sacrifice."

Robespierre had now acquired sufficient confidence and assurance to say whatever suited him, and never perhaps had he exhibited greater ingenuity or greater perfidy. To speak of the sacrifice he made in abandoning Danton, to arrogate merit therefor, to defy such danger as might thence accrue, and to reassure the cowardly by alluding to the small number of the guilty, was assuredly a master-stroke of hypocrisy and address. So all his colleagues in the convention decided, without a dissentient voice, that the four deputies arrested the previous night should not be heard at their bar. At that moment Saint-Just appeared, and proceeded to read his report. On him was generally devolved the task of vilifying victims, because, to the subtlety required for contorting facts and giving them a signification abhorrent to truth and candour, he joined a rare proficiency in the style vituperative and vigorous. Never on any previous occasion had he been more horribly eloquent or more unscrupulous; for all his hatred, howsoever intense it might be, could not have so blinded his judgment as to set down all he advanced in good faith. After reviling Philippeaux, Camille-Desmoulins, and Herault-Séchelles, at great length, and more directly accusing Lacroix, he came eventually to Danton, and invented facts utterly false, or perverted acknowledged facts in an atrocious manner. According to him, Danton, covetous, lazy, mendacious, and dastardly even, had sold himself to Mirabeau, afterwards to Lameth, and, in concert with Brissot, had drawn up the petition which led to the massacre of the Champ-de-Mars, not with the view of subverting royalty, but in order to get the best citizens destroyed; thereafter he had departed with impunity to enjoy himself, and spend the fruit of his perfidies at Arcis-sur-Aube. He had concealed himself on the 10th August, and had reappeared only to make himself minister; he had then allied himself with the Orleans party, and procured the election of Orleans and Fabre to the national deputation. Leagued with Dumouriez, having for the Girondists a mere affected hatred, and holding it always in his power to unite with them, he had been decidedly opposed to the 31st May, and even endeavoured to cause the arrest of Henriot. When Dumouriez, Orleans, and the Girondists were punished, he had negotiated with the party which proposed to put Louis XVII. on the throne. Grasping at money from every quarter—from Orleans, the Bourbons, and the foreigner—dining with bankers and aristocrats, deep in every intrigue, prodigal of promises to all parties, a veritable Catiline in short, rapacious, debauched, idle, a corruptor of public morals, he had gone a second time to bury himself at Arcis-sur-Aube, in order to revel on the ample produce of his cupidity. He had finally returned thence, and recently entered into confederacy with all the enemies of the commonwealth, with Hébert and his gang, by the common link of the foreigner, for the especial purpose of assailing the committee, and the men whom the convention had intrusted with its confidence.

After listening to this iniquitous report, the convention decreed an impeachment against Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeaux, Herault-Séchelles, and Lacroix.

Those unfortunate deputies had been conducted to the Luxembourg. Lacroix said to Danton, "Arrest us!—us! I could never have imagined it!" "Thou couldst never have imagined it?" remarked Danton; I knew it—I was forewarned!" "Thou knewest it!" exclaimed Lacroix, "and didst nothing! See the effect of thy usual indolence; it has ruined us!" "I did not think," observed Danton, in reply, "they would have ever dared to execute their design."

All the prisoners had crowded to the gate, eager to see the celebrated Danton, and that interesting Camille, who had illumined their dungeons with a ray of cheerfulness and hope. Danton was, as usual with him, calm, stately, and withal gay; Camille seemed astounded and melancholy; Philippeaux excited and elevated by his danger. Herault-Séchelles, who had preceded them at the Luxembourg by a few days, hastened to meet his friends, and merrily saluted them. "When men commit folly," observed Danton, "they certainly ought to know how to laugh at it." Then perceiving Thomas Paine, he said to him, "What thou hast done for the happiness and liberty of thy country, I have in vain attempted to do for mine; I have been less fortunate, but not more culpable. I am doomed to the scaffold; well, my friends, we must go there cheerfully!"

On the following day, 12th Germinal, the articles of impeachment were sent to the Luxembourg, and the accused ordered to be transferred to the Conciergerie, for the purpose of appearing before the tribunal. Camille was roused to fury as he perused the odious falsehoods wherewith the indictment was surcharged. He soon grew tranquil, however, and exclaimed, with deep affliction, "I go to the scaffold for having shed a few tears over the fate of so many unfortunate victims. My only regret in dying is that I could not serve them!" All the detained, whatever their political opinions, testified the most lively interest in his behalf, and offered up ardent vows for his acquittal. Philippeaux spoke a few words about his wife, and then remained calm and serene. Herault-Séchelles retained that gracefulness of mind and manner which distinguished him even amongst men of his own rank; he embraced his faithful servant, who had followed him to the Luxembourg, but was debarred from accompanying him to the Conciergerie, consoling him with words of comfort, and exhorting him to fortitude. Fabre, Chabot, Bazire, and Delaunay, were directed to be removed at the same time, it being determined to try them conjointly with Danton, in order to throw disgrace on his case by an appearance of confederacy with forgers. Fabre was ill, and almost dying. Chabot, who from the recesses of his prison had never ceased writing to Robespierre, imploring his pity in abject terms, and lavishing on him the basest flattery, without, however, moving his obdurate heart, was now convinced that death was inevitable, and for him equally assured infamy; he accordingly resolved upon self-destruction. He swallowed corrosive sublimate; but acute agony having forced him to utter cries, he confessed his attempt, accepted relief, and was carried to the Conciergerie in as wretched a condition as Fabre. A somewhat more noble sentiment seemed to animate him amidst his anguish—it was that of sorrow for having compromised his friend Bazire, who had taken no part in the fraudulent transaction. "Bazire!" he repeatedly exclaimed, "my poor Bazire! what hast thou done?"

At the Conciergerie the accused inspired equal curiosity as at the Luxembourg. They occupied the apartment of the Girondists. Danton conversed with his accustomed energy. "On such a day it was," said he, "that I caused the revolutionary tribunal to be instituted. I ask pardon for the act of God and men. My design was to prevent a fresh September, and not to send a pestilence on humanity." Reverting to his scorn for the colleagues who were assassinating him—"These brother-Cains," he exclaimed, "understand nothing about government. I leave every thing in frightful disorder." Then depicting the impotence of the paralytic Couthon and the cowardly Robespierre, he ridiculed them in gross but original expressions, which still announced a singular vivacity of spirit. For a moment he evinced some slight regret for having taken part in the revolution. "It were better to be a poor fisherman than to govern men," he said. This was the only phrase of the sort he uttered.

Lacroix betokened astonishment on witnessing the number and deplorable state of the prisoners in the cells. "What!" cried a voice, "did not the carts loaded with victims teach you what was passing in Paris?" The surprise of Lacroix was unaffected, and it is a lesson for men who, in ardent pursuit of a political object, give too little heed to the individual sufferings of the unfortunate, and seem as if they believed not in their existence because not actually beheld.

On the following day, the 13th Germinal, the accused were conducted before the tribunal to the number of fifteen. The list was incongruously made up of the five leading moderates, Danton, Herault-Séchelles, Camille, Philippeaux, and Lacroix; of the four charged with forgery, Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, and Fabre-d'Eglantine; of Chabot's two brothers-in-law, Junius and Emanuel Frey; of the contractor D'Espagnac, and the ill-fated Westermann, accused of having taken part in the corruption and intrigues of Danton; and of two foreigners, friends of the panels, the Spaniard Guzman and the Dane Diederichs. The design of the committee, in this singular amalgamation, was to confound the moderates with the corruptionists and aliens, in order still to maintain the paradox, that moderation was the joint offspring of a falling off from republican virtue and the subornation of the foreigner. The concourse assembled to witness the trial was beyond all precedent immense. Some vestiges of that interest Danton had so long inspired were revived by his appearance at the bar. Fouquier-Tinville, the judges, and the jurymen, all subaltern revolutionists drawn from obscurity by his potent hand, sat abashed in his presence: his confident and haughty demeanour overawed them, and he seemed rather the accuser than the accused. The president, Hermann, and Fouquier-Tinville, instead of selecting the jurymen by lot, as the law enjoined, flagrantly nominated the leet, and fixed upon such exclusively as they called "the solid." They then proceeded to interrogate the prisoners. When Danton was asked the usual questions upon his age and domicile, he answered disdainfully that he was thirty-four, and that his name would be shortly in the Pantheon, himself in nonentity. Camille blasphemously replied, that "he was thirty-three years old, the age of the sans-culotte Jesus Christ when he perished." Bazire was twenty-nine. Herault-Séchelles and Philippeaux were each thirty-four. Thus were talents, courage, patriotism, and youth, found united in this hecatomb, as amid that offered up in the persons of the Girondists.

Danton, Camille, Herault-Séchelles, and others, protested against their cause being confounded with that of forgers. No heed, however, was given to their reclamation. The court first proceeded to investigate the charges against Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, and Fabre-d'Eglantine. Chabot persisted in his former statement, and boldly maintained that he had taken part in the conspiracy of the stockjobbers solely for the purpose of betraying it. His assertion gained no credence, being devoid of probability on several grounds; if founded in fact, he would have privately intimated his object to some member of the committees, more promptly revealed the machination, and abstained from keeping the funds in his possession. Delaunay was adjudged guilty at once; and Fabre, too, notwithstanding his artful defence, that when he made alterations and erasures in the copy of the decree, he imagined it to be merely the draft of an intended law, was convicted by Cambon, whose frank and unsuspected testimony was conclusive. He proved, in fact, that the projects of laws were never signed; that the copy Fabre had interlined was attested by all the members of the commission of five; and that, consequently, he could not have altered it under the idea that it was a simple draft. Bazire, whose confederacy only amounted to concealment of the fraud, was heard impatiently in his defence, and forthwith assimilated with the rest. The tribunal then passed to D'Espagnac, who was accused of having corrupted Julien of Toulouse, with the view of inducing him to support his contracts, and of being concerned in the intrigue of the East India Company. In this instance, the facts were substantiated by written documents, and all the ingenuity of D'Espagnac failed to invalidate such evidence.

Herault-Séchelles was subsequently interrogated. Bazire had been declared guilty as the friend of Chabot; so against Herault was the like judgment pronounced for having been the friend of Bazire, for having had through him some knowledge of the stockjobbing plot, for having assisted an emigrant, for having been the companion of moderates, and for having furnished grounds of suspicion, by his mildness, his elegance, his fortune, and his ill-disguised regrets, that he was in truth a moderate himself.

After Herault was disposed of, Danton was called upon. A profound silence reigned through the assemblage as he arose to reply. "Danton," said the president, addressing him, "the convention accuses you of having conspired with Mirabeau, with Dumouriez, with Orleans, with the Girondists, with the foreigner, and with the faction striving to restore Louis XVII." "My voice,' answered Danton, in his own sonorous tones, "that voice which has so often made itself heard in the cause of the people, will have no difficulty in repelling calumny. Let the knaves who accuse me appear, and I will cover them with ignominy. Let the committees come forward—I will answer only before them: I want them both as accusers and witnesses. Let them appear. At the same time, I care little for you and your judgment. I have already told you, nonentity will soon be my asylum. Life is a burden to me; tear it from me. I long to be freed from it!" Whilst uttering these words, Danton was filled with indignation; his feelings revolted at the idea of answering before such men. His demand for the appearance of the committees, and his expressed intention to reply only in their presence, embarrassed the tribunal, and caused a general agitation. Their confronting him in open court would have doubtless proved a cruel exposure to them; they must have been overwhelmed with confusion, and the condemnation might perhaps have become impossible.

"Danton," said the president, after a pause, "audacity is the accompaniment of crime; calmness that of innocence." At this phrase, Danton exclaimed—"Individual audacity is reprehensible, undoubtedly; but that national audacity of which I have so many times given the example, with which I have so often served liberty, is the most meritorious of all the virtues. Such audacity is mine; such it is I here display for the republic against the cowards who accuse me. When I see myself so basely calumniated, can I restrain my indignation? It is not from a revolutionist like me that you must expect a cold studied defence. Men of my order are inestimable in revolutions—on their forehead is the genius of liberty stamped!" As he thus spoke, Danton threw aloft his head, and surveyed the judges in an attitude of defiance. His formidable expression produced a profound sensation. The people, whom a manifestation of power always affects, sent forth an applauding murmur. "I," continued Danton—"I accused of having conspired with Mirabeau, Dumouriez, Orleans—of having crawled at the feet of vile despots! It is I whom you summon to answer to 'inevitable, inflexible justice!'* And thou, infamous Saint-Just, wilt answer to posterity for thy accusation against the mainstay of liberty! In looking over this list of horrors," added Danton, holding up the articles of impeachment, "I feel my whole being shudder!"

The president again recommended him to be more calm, and cited the example of Marat, who had demeaned himself respectfully before the tribunal. Danton resumed, and said that, since they desired it, he would recount his life. He then proceeded to narrate the difficulties he had encountered in attaining municipal rank, the efforts of the Constituent Assembly to counteract him in his object, the resistance he opposed to the designs of Mirabeau, and, above all, his conduct on that famous day when, surrounding the royal carriage with an immense concourse, he prevented the journey to Saint-Cloud. Thereafter, he recalled the time when he led the people to the Champ-de-Mars to sign a petition against royalty, and the occasion of that celebrated petition; the boldness wherewith he first proposed the overthrow of the throne in 1792; the courage with which he proclaimed the insurrection on the evening of the 9th August, and the firmness he displayed during the twelve hours of conflict. Here, incensed almost to suffocation when he reflected on the charge against him of having concealed himself at the crisis of the 10th August, he broke forth into a strain of passionate invective. "Where," he exclaimed, "are the men who found it necessary to exhort Danton to show himself on that day? Where are the privileged and gifted beings whose energy he borrowed? Let them come forth, my accusers! It rouses all the vigour of my mind when I demand them. I will unmask the three wretched knaves who have encompassed and entrapped Robespierre. Let them but appear, and I will plunge them into the nonentity whence they ought never to have emerged!" The president once more interrupted him by ringing his bell. Danton drowned its sound with his stentorian voice. "Do you not hear me?" asked the president. "It is fitting the voice of a man defending his honour and his life," replied Danton, "should stifle the noise of thy bell." His indignant excitement began, however, to fatigue him; his tone became fainter, and the president considerately besought him to take a little rest, in order to recommence his defence with more calmness and tranquillity.

Danton acceded, and was silent. The public prosecutor next called upon Camille, whose Old Cordelier was read over with comments, he vainly repudiating the interpretations given to his writings. Lastly came the turn of Lacroix, whose conduct in Belgium was bitterly assailed, and who, after the example of Danton, claimed the appearance of several members of the convention, and formally insisted on compliance.

This first hearing produced a powerful impression on the public mind. The crowd which surrounded the Palace of Justice, and extended even to the bridges, gave tokens of being greatly agitated. The judges were overawed and terror-stricken. Vadier, Vouland, and Amar, the most detestable members of the committee of general safety, had witnessed the proceedings, concealed in the printing-office contiguous to the hall of the court, and communicating with it by a small window. From that position they had looked on with deep alarm, as they beheld the undaunted hardihood of Danton and the visible emotions of the audience. They began to entertain serious doubts that the condemnation was practicable. Hermann and Fouquier had both repaired, immediately after the tribunal adjourned, to the committee of public welfare, and made known to it the demand of the accused touching the appearance of several members of the convention. The committee seemed unprepared to act in the emergency; Robespierre had retired for the day, and Billaud and Saint-Just alone were present. They instructed Fouquier to refrain from giving any decisive answer; to prolong the discussion so as to consume the three days without affording explanations; and then to make the jurymen declare they were sufficiently informed.

Meanwhile, the excitement caused by the trial in the Palace of Justice, the committee, and all Paris, was fully participated in the prisons, whose inmates took a lively interest in the accused, since they felt that no hope could exist for any if such revolutionists were condemned. In the Luxembourg was at this time immured the unfortunate Dillon, the friend of Desmoulins, by whom he had been defended; he had learnt through Chaumette, who, being exposed to the like danger, now made common cause with the moderates, what had passed before the tribunal. Chaumette obtained the information from his wife. Dillon, whose imagination was easily heated, and who, moreover, sometimes sought, as an old soldier, to drown sorrow in wine, spoke indiscreetly to a person named Laflotte, confined in the same prison, telling him that it was time for good republicans to rise against vile oppressors, that the people had appeared to be moved, that Danton had claimed to answer before the committees, that his condemnation was far from being assured, that the wife of Camille-Desmoulins, by distributing assignats, might arouse the populace, and that, if he himself could contrive to escape, he would muster a body of resolute men sufficient to rescue the republicans about to be sacrificed by the tribunal. These words were but the idle effusions of intoxication and anger. It would appear, however, that some proposal was entertained for transmitting a thousand crowns and a letter to Camille's wife. The treacherous Laflotte, trusting to obtain life and liberty by denouncing a plot, hastened to the governor of the Luxembourg, and made before him a declaration, wherein he represented a conspiracy on the point of breaking out both within and without the prisons, for the purpose of delivering the accused and assassinating the members of the two committees. We shall soon see to what purposes this infamous deposition was made subservient.

On the following day the confluence was equally great at the Palace of Justice. Danton and his companions, still firm and unyielding, again demanded the appearance of several members of the convention and the two committees. Fouquier, constrained to answer, stated that he did not oppose any necessary witnesses being called. "But it is not sufficient," objected the accused, "that he offers no obstacle, he must himself summon them to attend." Fouquier thereupon remarked that he would summon all those who might be named, excepting members of the convention, because it lay with that assembly to determine whether its members could be cited. The accused again exclaimed that they were denied the means of defending themselves. The whole court was thrown into the utmost confusion. The president proceeded to question certain others of the panels, Westermann, the two Freys, and Guzman, and then hastily broke up the sitting.

Fouquier immediately wrote to the committee, apprising it of what had occurred, and requesting instructions how to meet the reiterated demands of the accused. The position was full of embarrassment, and all hesitated as to the course to be pursued. Robespierre affected indifference, and declined giving any opinion. Saint-Just alone, more resolute and bold than his colleagues, maintained that they ought not to recoil; that all further discussion must be interdicted, and the accused at once sent to execution. At this moment the deposition of the prisoner Laflotte, forwarded to the police by the keeper of the Luxembourg, was placed before the committee. Saint-Just promptly detected in it the proof of a conspiracy laid by the accused, and the pretext for a decree abruptly to terminate their dispute with the tribunal. The next morning, accordingly, he appeared before the convention, and assured it that a great danger threatened the country, but that it was the last, and that, if braved with courage, it would be speedily surmounted. "The accused now before the revolutionary tribunal," he said, "are in open revolt; they menace the tribunal; they carry their insolence so far as to throw balls of crumbs at the heads of the judges; they excite the people, and may even succeed in deluding them. Nor is this indeed all: they have hatched a conspiracy in the prisons; the wife of Camille has received money in order to provoke an insurrection; General Dillon is to break from the Luxembourg, put himself at the head of his confederates, massacre the two committees, and liberate the guilty." At this false and hypocritical relation, the complaisant convention wrung with cries of "Horrible! horrible!" and forthwith unanimously voted the decree proposed by Saint-Just. By virtue of this enactment, the tribunal was to continue, without adjournment, the trial of Danton and his accomplices; and was moreover authorised to order from the bar such of the panels as should fail in respect to the court or endeavour to excite disturbance. A copy of the decree was instantly transcribed. Vouland and Vadier departed to carry it to the tribunal, where the third sitting had commenced, and where the redoubled energy of the accused was throwing Fouquier into the most pitiable perplexity.

On this third day, in fact, the prisoners had determined to persist more strenuously than ever in their reclamations. All of them arose together, and urged Fouquier to summon the witnesses they had demanded. They required furthermore that the convention should nominate a commission to receive the denunciations they were prepared to make against the design of a dictatorship harboured by the committees. Fouquier was completely at a loss what answer to return. In the midst of his embarrassment, an usher advanced to call him out of court. He proceeded into an adjoining chamber, where he found Vouland and Vadier, who, flushed and out of breath, cried to him, "We have the miscreants! Here is what will relieve you from all further trouble!" And they placed in his hands the decree which Saint-Just had just extorted. Fouquier grasped it with rapture, returned to the hall, craved liberty to address the tribunal, and read aloud the fatal document. Danton started passionately to his feet: "I take the audience to witness," he exclaimed, "that we have not insulted the tribunal." "That is true!" shouted several voices in the hall. The whole multitude, indeed, betokened amazement, indignation even, at so glaring a denial of justice to men formally arraigned. The sensation was general and unequivocal: the judges were intimidated.

"One day," added Danton, "the truth will be known. I see great calamities preparing for France. Behold the dictatorship; it shows itself openly and without disguise!" Camille, on hearing the Luxembourg, Dillon, and his wife, spoken of in the decree, exclaimed, in an accent of despair, "The miscreants! not content with taking my life, they would also murder my wife!" Danton perceived at the end of the hall, in the corridor, Vadier and Vouland, who were there lurking to witness the effect of the decree. He pointed to them with his finger: "See," he cried, "those infamous assassins! They hover around us; they will not quit us until we are bereft of life itself!" Vadier and Vouland disappeared in tremor. The tribunal, as the shortest mode of avoiding remonstrances, dissolved the sitting.

The following was the fourth day, and the jury had the power to supersede further discussion by declaring itself sufficiently informed. Accordingly, without affording the accused time to defend themselves, the jury demanded the termination of the process. Camille yielded to an impulse of wrath: he declared to the jurymen that they were assassins, and called upon the people to testify to their iniquity. The officers approached to remove him, with his companions in misfortune, from the hall. He resisted, and they dragged him out by force. Meanwhile, Vadier and Vouland addressed the jurymen in exciting terms, who, however, stood not in need of such instigation. The president Hermann and Fouquier followed them into their retiring-room. There Hermann had the incredible effrontery to tell them that a letter written to foreigners had been intercepted, which placed the connivance of Danton with the coalition beyond doubt. Three or four jurymen alone ventured to vindicate the accused; they were overborne by the majority. The foreman of the jury, one Trinchard, returned to the hall hideous with savage joy, and pronounced, in the tone and manner of a ferocious maniac, the iniquitous verdict.

It was deemed advisable to avoid the hazard of any additional outbreak on the part of the newly condemned, by bringing them into the hall of the tribunal to hear their sentence; wherefore an usher descended to the prison for the purpose of reading it to them. They dismissed him, however, without allowing him to finish the document, exclaiming at the same time that they were ready to be conducted to death. The condemnation being finally pronounced, Danton, upon whom indignation had recently acted as a powerful stimulant, relapsed into calmness, and recovered all his scorn for the beings who persecuted him. Camille, easily pacified, shed a few tears over his wife; and, fortunate in a happy improvidence, he had no idea he was really destined to death, a conviction which would have rendered his last moments insufferable. Herault was gay and lively as usual. The whole of the ill-fated band, in fact, evinced exemplary firmness; and Westermann, in particular, showed himself worthy his renown for courage.

They were executed on the 16th Germinal (5th April). The infamous gang bribed to insult victims followed the carts. Camille, incensed at this atrocious outrage, attempted to address the multitude, and poured forth the most vehement imprecations against the base and hypocritical Robespierre. The wretches employed thus to vituperate retorted upon him in the foulest language. He, in the violence of his action, had torn his shirt, and stood, the object of their gross derision, with his shoulders bare to the skin. Danton, casting upon the ruffians a calm and scornful look, said to Camille—"Be tranquil, and never mind that vile rabble." Arrived at the foot of the scaffold, Danton was about to embrace Herault-Séchelles, who extended his arms towards him; the executioner interposing to prevent him, he spoke thus terribly to that functionary, but with a smile on his countenance—"Thou canst be then more cruel than death! Away; thou wilt not, a moment hence, prevent our heads embracing in the pannier!"*

Such was the end of that Danton who had played so signal a part in the revolution, and had been so instrumental to its onward course. Daring, ardent, panting for excitement, eager for the gratifications of pleasure, he had rushed into the stormy career with qualities fitting him especially to shine in days of turmoil and terror. Prompt and positive, unaffected by either the difficulty or the novelty of an extraordinary position, none could better judge what means were necessary, or had less fear or scruple in adopting them. He had deemed it imperative to terminate the struggles between the monarchy and the revolution, and he perpetrated the 10th of August. Menaced by the Prussian invasion, he had conceived it indispensable to overawe France and commit it past recall to the system of the revolution; he directed, it is said, the massacres of September, and, even though ordaining them, he saved a multitude of victims. At the commencement of the great year 1793, the convention was astounded at the spectacle of all Europe under arms; he pronounced, comprehending them in all their profundity, those remarkable words—"A nation in a revolution is more likely to conquer its neighbours than to be conquered." He held that twenty-five millions of men, whom a popular government might venture to move, could have nothing to dread from a few hundreds of thousands accoutred by monarchs. He proposed, therefore, to arouse the people, to levy contributions on the rich; in short, he it was who invented all those revolutionary measures which have left so terrible a remembrance, but which nevertheless saved France. This man, so potential in action, relapsed into indolence and the life of pleasure he had always coveted, during the intervals of danger. He delighted even in the most innocent enjoyments—such as the country, a beloved wife, and attached friends, are so calculated to impart. Then he forgot the vanquished, or at least to hate them, and could even render them justice, pity, and defend them. But during those periods of repose, so necessary to his impassioned temperament, his rivals gradually acquired by perseverance that renown and influence he had achieved in a single day of peril. The fanatics reproached him with effeminacy and gentleness, overlooking the fact that, in point of political cruelty, he had rivalled them all in the dismal days of September. Whilst confiding in his fame, procrastinating from indolence, and revolving in his brain noble projects for restoring mild laws, for restricting the reign of violence to the era of danger, for separating the exterminators, irrevocably involved in the ruthless effusion of blood, from the men who had yielded only to the force of circumstances—for organising France, in fine, and reconciling it with Europe—he was surprised by the colleagues to whom he had abandoned the government. These, after striking a blow against the ultra-revolutionists, were constrained, to avoid the appearance of retrograding, to smite with equal rigour the party of the moderates. Thus policy demanded victims, malevolence and envy selected them, and sent to the scaffold the most celebrated and the most dreaded man of his epoch. Danton succumbed, despite his renown and services, before the formidable power he had contributed to establish; but by his undaunted boldness he rendered his fall at least doubtful for a moment.

Danton possessed a mind uncultivated doubtless, but great, capacious, and, above all, simple and solid. He drew upon its resources only when spurred by exigency, and never for the mere purpose of shining; consequently he spoke little, and disdained to write. According to a contemporary, he had no pretension, not even that of comprehending what he was ignorant of, a pretension so common in men of his order. He was accustomed to heed Fabre-d'Eglantine, and to leave the part of oratory to his young and talented friend Camille-Desmoulins, whose lively imagination was to him an inexhaustible source of delight, and whom he had the grief to involve in his fall. He died with his usual fortitude, and communicated it to his friend. Like Mirabeau, he quitted the world, proud of himself, and believing his faults and his life sufficiently expiated by his great services and his ultimate projects.

The leaders of the two parties, then, had been sacrificed. They were speedily followed by their adherents on both sides, men of the most opposite principles being blended and tried together, in order still further to accredit the opinion that they were accomplices in the same plot. Chaumette and Gobel appeared side by side with Arthur Dillon and Simon. The Grammonts, father and son, Lepallu, and other members of the revolutionary army, were classed with General Beysser before the tribunal. Lastly, the wife of Hébert, formerly the inmate of a convent, was placed at the bar with the youthful spouse of Camille-Desmoulins, scarcely in her twenty-third year, redolent of beauty, grace, and innocence. Chaumette, whom we recollect so eminent for submissiveness and docility, was accused of having conspired at the commune against the government, of having starved the people, and sought to inflame them by his extravagant ordinances. Gobel was regarded as the accomplice of Clootz and Chaumette. Arthur Dillon had intended, so it was alleged, to throw open the prisons of Paris, slaughter the convention and the tribunal, and rescue his friends. The members of the revolutionary army were arraigned as agents of Ronsin. General Beysser, who had so powerfully contributed to save Nantes in concert with Canclaux, and who was suspected of an attachment to federalism, was charged as an accomplice of the ultra-revolutionists. The records of the

* ["They proceeded to execution with the assurance usual at that period. A large body of troops had been called to arms, and their escort was very considerable. The crowd, generally boisterous and exulting, was silent. Camille-Desmoulins, even on the fatal cart, was still amazed at his condemnation, and could scarcely credit it. 'This then,' he exclaimed, 'is the recompense awarded to the first apostle of liberty!' Danton carried his head erect, and surveyed the concourse with a tranquil and haughty gaze. At the foot of the scaffold, he was affected for a moment. 'Oh, my well-beloved!' he cried; 'oh, my wife! I will see thee then no more!' But, instantly recovering himself—'Danton, no weakness!'

Thus perished the tardy but last defenders of humanity and moderation; the last who advocated peace amongst the conquerors of the revolution, and mercy towards the vanquished. After them, no voice was heard for a while against the dictatorship of terror; it struck, from one end of France to the other, multiplied and silent blows. The Girondists had endeavoured to prevent this violent system, the Dantonists essayed to counteract it; all perished, and the victors had so many more victims to immolate as they counted more enemies. So sanguinary a career, once entered upon, its limit was to be found only in the destruction of its authors. The Decemvirs, after the definitive fall of the Girondists, had inscribed terror as the order of the day; after the fall of the Hébertists, they had made it justice and probity, because those were impure factionists; after the fall of the Dantonists, they rendered it terror and all the virtues, because they stigmatised them as the party of indulgents and immoralists."—Mignet, vol. ii. pp. 47, 48.]

Vendéan war show how preposterous was the allegation of an understanding between the staff of Nantes and that of Saumur. The woman Hébert was doomed under the character of her husband's coadjutor. Seated on the same bench with the wife of Camille, she said to her, "You are fortunate; no charge is raised against you. You will be saved." In fact, all that could be assigned against that young female, was the crime of having loved her husband too well, and of having continuously wandered with her children around the jail, to see their father and point him out to them. However, both were condemned; and the consorts of Hébert and Camille perished as guilty of an identical conspiracy. The unfortunate Madame Desmoulins died with a courage worthy of her husband and her own virtue. Since the deaths of Charlotte Corday and Madame Roland, no victim had inspired a more tender interest, or excited more unfeigned regret.

CHAPTER XXXII.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE LAST CONDEMNATIONS AGAINST THE PARTIES OPPOSED TO THE GOVERNMENT.—EFFORTS OF THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE TO CONCENTRATE ALL POWER IN ITSELF.—THE CONVENTION, UPON A REPORT OF ROBESPIERRE, PROCLAIMS, IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH PEOPLE, THE RECOGNITION OF THE SUPREME BEING, AND THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

The government, then, stood in the midst, with the ruins of two hostile parties strewed on each side. The first, that of the ultra-revolutionists, was really formidable, or might have become so; the second, that of the new moderates, was, so to speak, innocuous. The destruction of the latter, therefore, was not justified by necessity, but was judged advisable, in order to clear the committee from any imputation of moderate tendencies. The committee had acted in the sacrifice hypocritically, and without conviction; solely moved, indeed, by envy, hatred, and malice. It had been found difficult, however, to plant this final blow; we have seen the whole body hesitate, and Robespierre retreat to his domicile as in the days of imminent peril. But Saint-Just, stimulated by his indomitable courage and his jealous malignity, remained steadfast at his post, reanimated Hermann and Fouquier, the vile instruments of judicial iniquity, alarmed the convention, extorted from it a decree of death, and thereby consummated the work of blood. The final effort required by authority to render itself absolute, is generally the hardest to achieve;* it has need of all its strength to surmount the ultimate obstacle; but that effectually subdued, all yield and bow before it; it has thenceforth only to wield its sovereignty. Then occurs the period of its development, its profligacy, its course to ruin. Whilst every tongue is silenced, and every countenance wears the downcast expression of obsequiousness and submission, hatred rankles in all hearts, and the materials of retribution are prepared even in the hour of overweening triumph.

At present, therefore, the committee of public welfare, after successfully contending with two classes of men, so differently actuated, who had manifested a disposition to control or merely to animadvert on the exercise of its sway, had become irresistible. The winter months were past. The campaign of 1794 (Germinal, year 2) was about to open with the advent of spring. Formidable armies were in motion to deploy on all the frontiers, and to illustrate abroad the terrible power so ruthlessly administered at home. Whosoever had appeared to resist, or to evince any interest in those recently bereaved of life, felt it incumbent to record with all speed his abject acquiescence and contrition. Thus Legendre, who had made an effort on the day Danton, Lacroix, and Camille-Desmoulins were arrested, and who had endeavoured to move the convention in their favour, hastened to repair his imprudence, and to abjure his friendship for the late victims. Several anonymous letters had been sent to him, wherein he was urged to smite the tyrants, who, it was alleged, had now thrown off the mask. Legendre appeared at the Jacobin Club on the 21st Germinal (10th April), denounced these unauthenticated communications, and complained that he should be taken for a Séide, whose hand was always ready to grasp a dagger. "And now," said he, "since I am forced to it, I declare to the people, who have always heard me speak with sincerity, that I consider it demonstrated the conspiracy, of which the leaders have ceased to breathe, really existed, and that I was the dupe of traitors. I have found the proofs in different documents deposited with the committee of public welfare, above all, in the criminal behaviour of the accused before the national justice, and in the machinations of their accomplices, who would fain arm an honest man with the homicidal poniard. I was, before the discovery of the plot, the intimate friend of Danton; I would have answered for his principles and his conduct with my head; but now I am convinced of his guilt—I am persuaded he would have plunged the people into the depths of error. I might perhaps have fallen into the pit myself, if I had not been enlightened in time. I tell the anonymous scribblers who would induce me to poniard Robespierre, and render me the instrument of their evil purposes, that I was born in the bosom of the people, that I make it my glory to remain there, and that I will sooner die than abandon their rights. They will write me no letter I shall not take to the committee of public welfare."

The spirit of submission thus exemplified in Legendre, was general throughout France. A multitude of addresses arrived from all parts of the country, wherein the convention and the committee of public welfare were congratulated on their energy. The number of these addresses was incalculable. In all styles, in forms the most grotesque, one vied with the other in expressing approbation of the acts of the government, and in acknowledging its justice. Rhodez transmitted the following manifesto:—"Worthy representatives of a free people!—It is in vain the sons of Titan have raised their proud heads; the thunderbolt has laid them prostrate! What, citizens! sell liberty for vile riches! The constitution you have given us has shaken all thrones, has struck terror into all kings. Liberty advancing with giant strides—despotism crushed—superstition eradicated—the republic resuming its unity—conspirators discovered and punished—faithless mandatories, base and perfidious functionaries, falling under the axe of the law—the irons of the slaves in the New World broken—such your trophies! If intriguers still exist, let them tremble! Let the death of the conspirators attest your triumph! For yourselves, representatives, live happy under the wise laws you have made for the prosperity of all nations, and receive the tribute of our affection!"*

It was not from any abhorrence of sanguinary measures that the committee smote the ultra-revolutionists, but in order to strengthen authority, and to sweep away the impediments that checked its action. Hence we find it constantly thereafter aiming at a twofold object—to render itself more formidable, and to concentrate all power in its own hands. Collot, who had become an orator of the government at the Jacobin Club, expounded its policy in terms singularly energetic. During a vehement discourse, wherein he intimated to all the constituted authorities the new route they were expected to follow, and the peculiar zeal they were to manifest in the exercise of their functions, he said—"The tyrants have lost their vigour; their armies quail in presence of ours; already some despots are seeking to withdraw from the coalition. In this state, there remains to them but one hope, founded on intestine conspiracies. We must not cease, therefore, to keep a watchful eye on traitors. Like our brethren, conquerors on the frontiers, let us have our weapons at our shoulders and fire all together. Whilst our external enemies fall beneath the blows of our soldiers, let internal enemies fall beneath the blows of the people. Our cause, supported by justice and energy, will be triumphant. Nature herself works this year for the republicans; it promises them a twofold abundance. The blades as they sprout announce the overthrow of tyrants. I repeat to you, citizens, let us be vigilant at home, whilst our warriors fight abroad. Let the functionaries intrusted with the public surveillance redouble their carefulness and zeal; let them be thoroughly impressed with this idea, that there is not perhaps a street or an alley in which a traitor meditating a last plot may not be found. Let that traitor meet death, and death the most prompt! If the administrators, if the public functionaries wish to find a place in history, now is the favourable moment for attempting it. The revolutionary tribunal has already secured an eminent position in its records. Let all the administrations learn to imitate its zeal and its inexorable energy; let the revolutionary committees, above all, redouble their vigilance and activity, and let them beware how they yield to the solicitations with which they are besieged, whereby they are moved to an indulgence most fatal to liberty."

* [The passage, if accurately rendered, should represent the last barrier as always the most difficult to break down; but even as it stands in the text, it is open to much objection. The Chinese have a saying, "that in a journey of ten paces, nine are half the distance;" but as Madame de Staël observes (De l'Allemagne, vol. ii. p. 156), its application is chiefly confined, in Europe at least, to German dramatists, who never know how to finish their pieces.]

Saint-Just presented to the convention a formidable report on the general police of the republic. He therein repeated the fabulous history of the various conspiracies, representing them as the outbreak of vice against the austere system of the republic. He said that the government, so far from relenting, must smite continually, until it had extirpated all the beings whose corruption formed an obstacle to the establishment of virtue. He passed the accustomed eulogy on severity, and sought to prove, as was usual at the time, by similes of all kinds, that the origin of great institutions was necessarily terrible. "What would an indulging republic become?" he exclaimed. "We have encountered the sword with the sword, and the republic is founded. It has emerged from the bosom of storms: such an origin is in common with the world sprung from chaos, and with man wailing at his birth." In pursuance of these maxims, Saint-Just proposed a general measure against ex-nobles. This was the first of the kind, thus distinctly framed, that had been propounded. Danton, in the preceding year, during a paroxysm of wrath, had caused all aristocrats to be declared beyond the pale of the law. That decree being incapable of execution on account of its comprehensiveness, another had been substituted which condemned all suspected persons to provisional detention. But no specific law against ex-nobles had yet been enacted. Saint-Just exhibited them as the irreconcilable enemies of the revolution. "Whatever you may do," said he, "you will never satisfy the enemies of the people, unless you re-establish the tyranny. They must go, therefore, elsewhere in quest of slavery and kings. They cannot make peace with you; you do not speak the same language; you will never understand each other. Drive them forth, then! The world is not inhospitable, and the public welfare is amongst us the supreme law."

He accordingly submitted a decree banishing all ex-nobles and aliens from Paris, from fortified towns, and from maritime places, and putting out of the pale of the law such as should not have obeyed the decree in the space of ten days. Other articles of the enactment imposed on all authorities the emphatic duty of redoubling their activity and zeal. The convention applauded the proposition, as it never failed to do, and voted it by acclamation. Collot-d'Herbois, the vindicator of the decree before the Jacobins, added his tropes to those wherewith Saint-Just had enlightened the national representatives. "It is necessary," he said, "to expel the unwholesome humours of the aristocracy from the body politic; the more it transpires, the healthier will it become."

Such were the steps taken by the committee to manifest the rigour of its future policy. We now proceed to its acts for the greater concentration of power. In the first place, it resolved upon the disembodiment of the revolutionary army. Organised according to a conception of Danton, that army had originally been serviceable in enforcing the fiats of the convention, whilst there yet survived any relics of federalism; but having become the rallying-point for perturbators and adventurers of the worst grades, and having, moreover, availed the recently suppressed demagogues as a supporting basis, it was deemed necessary to disperse it. Besides, the government, being every where implicitly obeyed, had no further occasion for this horde of satellites to carry its orders into execution. In consequence, it was disbanded by decree. The committee then proposed the abolition of the different ministries. These were felt still to possess too much importance, as respected the members of the supreme committee. Either they left all to be done by the committee, in which case they were useless; or they essayed to act, and then they became obnoxious rivals. The instance of Bouchotte, who, when governed by Vincent, had so often and so greatly embarrassed the committee, was an instructive example. In consequence, the ministries were abrogated. In their stead were instituted the following twelve commissions:—

1. Commission of civil administration, police, and courts of justice.
2. Commission of public instruction.
3. Commission of agriculture and arts
4. Commission of trade and magazines.
5. Commission of public works.
6. Commission of public aids.
7. Commission of transport, post, and mails.
8. Commission of finance.
9. Commission of organisation and direction for the land forces.
10. Commission of the navy and colonies.
11. Commission of arms, ammunition, and mines.
12. Commission of foreign relations.

These commissions, all dependent on the committee of public welfare, were merely so many boards amongst whom the details of administration were distributed. Hermann, who presided at the revolutionary tribunal during the trial of Danton, was rewarded for his zeal by being nominated chief of one of these commissions. In fact, the most important was confided to him, that "of civil administration, police, and courts of justice."

To promote the centralisation of power, other measures were likewise adopted. According to the law bearing on revolutionary committees, one was enjoined in each commune, or section of a commune. The rural communes being very numerous, and thinly populated, it resulted that the committees were too multifarious, and their duties scattered and trifling. Their composition, moreover, was unsatisfactory. The peasants, although ardent revolutionists for the most part, were uneducated, and the municipal functions had therefore devolved in general on landowners living upon their estates, who were but indifferently disposed to exercise their power in the spirit of the government; in consequence whereof, the surveillance of the country, and, above all, of country seats, was flagrantly neglected. To remedy this obnoxious state of things, the revolutionary committees of communes were suppressed, and those of districts alone maintained. By this expedient, the police was concentrated, and rendered more effective, being exclusively vested in the burghers of districts, who were nearly all firm Jacobins, and jealous of the old gentry.

The Jacobins formed the principal association or club, and the only one patronised by the government. They had invariably vindicated its principles and interests, and had, like it, pronounced equally against the Hébertists and Dantonists. The committee of public welfare was anxious that this favoured society should absorb the majority of the others, and thus concentrate in itself the influence of opinion, as it, the committee, had already engrossed the whole power of the government. This idea was highly flattering to the ambition of the Jacobins, and they made the greatest efforts to realise it. Since the meetings of sections had been limited to two in the week, in order that the people might attend them, and secure the adoption of revolutionary motions, the sections had resolved into popular societies. The number of such societies was very great in Paris, there being two or three in each section. We have previously mentioned the complaints to which they had given rise. It was asserted that the aristocrats, that is to say, clerks and apprentices discontented with the conscription, old servants of the nobility, all those, in short, who had any motive for resisting the revolutionary system, mustered in these societies, and exhibited the hostility they dared not manifest at the Jacobin Club or in the sections. The vast number of these secondary associations prevented their effectual supervision, and opinions were often promulgated within them which none would have ventured to whisper elsewhere. Their abolition had already been the subject of discussion. The Jacobins had no right to entertain such a topic, and the government could have taken no steps in the matter, without appearing to interfere with the liberty of assembling and deliberating in common, a franchise dearly valued at the time, and held to be of right unlimited. The difficulty was thus obviated. On the proposition of Collot, the Jacobins decided that they would receive no more deputations on the part of societies formed in Paris since the 10th August, and that all correspondence with them should be discontinued. As to those which had been formed in Paris before the 10th August, and which enjoyed the privilege of correspondence, they resolved that a report should be framed on each of them, to ascertain whether they ought to retain that advantage. This measure chiefly concerned the Cordeliers, already assailed in the persons of their leaders, Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, and since regarded with jealousy and suspicion. Thus, all the sectional societies were branded by this resolution, and the Cordeliers were condemned to undergo the ordeal of an inquiry.

The effect anticipated from this measure was soon realised. All the sectional societies, intimidated or persuaded, appeared in rotation before the convention and the Jacobin Club, to announce their voluntary dissolution. All of them adopted the language of congratulation, equally towards the convention and the Jacobins, and declared that, wholly devoted to the public interest, they were ready to separate of their own accord, since their meetings had been deemed hurtful to the cause they desired to serve. Thenceforth, the parent society of the Jacobins alone remained in Paris, and its affiliated societies in the provinces. It is true, the Cordelier Club still lingered precariously. Originally formed by Danton, towards whom, as its founder, it had been signally ungrateful, and ultimately subservient to Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, it had for a while disquieted the government and rivalled even the Jacobins. The outcasts of Vincent's ministry, and of the revolutionary army, continued to assemble in its hall. As a club, it could not be directly dissolved; but the report concerning it was presented, which set forth that, for some time, it had corresponded rarely and negligently with the Jacobin. and that, in consequence, it appeared useless to prolong the privilege of correspondence. On that occasion, certain Jacobins proposed for discussion the question, whether more than one popular society was necessary in Paris. They even ventured openly to maintain, that a single centre of opinion ought to be established, and fixed at the Jacobin Club. The society passed to the order of the day on these propositions, and even refrained from deciding whether the right of correspondence should be preserved to the Cordeliers. But the existence of that celebrated club had virtually terminated: completely discredited, it dwindled into insignificance, and the Jacobins rested, with their train of affiliated societies, the sole masters and regulators of opinion.

After having centralised opinion, if we may so speak, endeavours were directed to regulate its expression, to render it less boisterous and less embarrassing to the government. Hitherto, the main occupation of the Jacobins had consisted in perpetually censuring and denouncing all public functionaries, magistrates, deputies, generals, and administrators. That mania for vituperating and assailing the agents of power had been attended with its inconveniences, but with its advantages, likewise, so long as their zeal and opinions could be reasonably doubted. But now that the committee possessed all authority, watched its agents with unremitting vigilance, and selected them in a truly revolutionary spirit, the Jacobins could no longer be permitted to indulge in their habitual suspicions, or to tantalise functionaries for the most part discreetly chosen and under close supervision. Such a license, indeed, would have involved danger to the state. It was with reference to Generals Charbonnier and Dagobert, who had been both calumniated, whilst the one was gaining advantages over the Austrians and the other laying down his life in Cerdagne stricken with years and wounds, that Collot-d'Herbois took the opportunity of complaining to the Jacobins concerning this reckless propensity to revile generals and functionaries of all grades. Adhering to the custom of charging all on the dead, he attributed this rage for denunciation to the remnants of the Hébert faction, and urged the Jacobins no longer to tolerate these public attacks, which caused the society, as he said, to lose much precious time, and tended to lower in estimation the agents appointed by the government. Thus premising, he concluded by moving the appointment of a committee of the society, with instructions to receive denunciations, and transmit them in secrecy to the committee of public welfare; which proposition was adopted. In this manner, denunciations were deprived of their troublesome and outrageous character, and the demagogical spirit began to settle down into the quietude of formality and routine.

Thus, then, to declare unmitigated hostility towards the enemies of the revolution, and to centralise administration, police, and opinion, were the first cares of the committee, and the immediate results of its victory over the two parties. Doubtless ambition now commenced to instigate its determinations, much more than during the earlier moments of its existence, yet not so greatly as might be inferred from the prodigious extent of power it had grasped. Instituted at the opening of the campaign of 1793, and in the midst of other urgent perils, it was at once the offspring and the resource of dire necessity. Once established, it had gradually assumed a greater share of power, as the exigencies of the state arose, and had so advanced to the dictatorship itself. Its position amid the universal confusion and the dissolution of all authority was such, that it could not reorganise without gaining power, or effect good without the antidote of ambition. Its last measures redounded unquestionably to its own profit, but they were in themselves prudent and beneficial. The major part, indeed, had been suggested to it; for in a society undergoing the process of reconstruction, many things, amidst the latitude of invention, must be forced on the creative authority. But the moment approached when ambition was to be its sole monitor, and when the interest of the state was to become subordinate to that of its own predominance. Such is man; he cannot continue long disinterested, but too soon blends the consideration of self with the mission assigned him.

The last subject that demanded the attention of the committee of public welfare, was one which has at all times seriously occupied the organisers of nations or communities, namely, religion. It had already taken moral sentiments under its protection, by inscribing, "probity, justice, and all the virtues, on the order of the day." Religious sentiments remained to challenge its regard.

And here let us digress for an instant, to remark the singular progression of the systems from time to time upheld by these dogmatists of the ruling party. When the Girondists were to be supplanted, they described them as moderates and emasculate republicans, spoke incessantly of patriotic energy and public salvation, and sacrificed them to those ideas. When from the conquering ranks two new parties arose, the one furious, brutal, extravagant, ready to rush into anarchy and revolting profanation, the other indulgent, frank, and friendly to mild manners and social enjoyments, they passed from ideas of patriotic energy to those of order and virtue. They decried the fatal moderation which was enervating the vigour of the revolution; they asserted the whole phalanx of the vices to be arrayed against the austerity of the republican spirit; on either side they saw violence repudiating all idea of order, effeminacy and corruption outraging all idea of morality, delirious impiety rejecting all idea of God, and then they deemed the republic, like virtue, assaulted by all the evil passions at once. The word "virtue" forthwith became the predominant motto, and justice and probity were formally installed as "the order of the day." By an easy transition they were moved to maintain the existence of a Supreme Being, the immortality of the soul, the obligation of the moral code; and thus were they led to promulgate a solemn profession of faith, or, in other words, to prescribe the religion of the state. A decree of the convention was all the agency they needed, and that medium they resolved to use. Thus they encountered anarchists with the watchword of order, atheists with the invocation of God, and libertines with the vindication of morality. Their system of virtue had already received a signal development. In addition to other motives, moreover, they were extremely solicitous to remove from the republic the stigma of impiety, which all Europe had agreed in fixing upon it; and they prepared to assert, in the face of the world, what has been often said to intolerant priests, reproaching others with profaneness because they hesitated to accept all their dogmas—WE BELIEVE IN GOD.

Reasons derived from considerations of a different nature likewise urged them to adopt a decisive measure touching religious faith. The ceremonies appointed for the worship of Reason had been abolished; no particular mode of celebrating the tenth days or decades had been instituted; and, whilst meeting the moral and religious wants of the people, it was likewise of importance to gratify their imagination, and to provide them with occasions of public congregation. The period, besides, was peculiarly favourable: the republic, victorious at the close of the preceding campaign, had opened the present under most flattering auspices. Instead of the deficiency of means which had crippled its efforts during the previous year, it was now, by the foresight of its government, prepared with ample military resources. From the dread of undergoing the horrors of conquest, it had passed to the brilliant anticipation of carrying victory into other lands; whilst on the domestic arena perfect submission had succeeded to formidable insurrections. And if constraint still continued to fetter the operations of internal commerce, owing to the assignats and the maximum, nature seemed beneficently disposed to make amends, and to shower its richest gifts on France, by the promise of an abundant harvest. From all the provinces the reports coincided that the crops would be doubly prolific, and arrive at maturity a month earlier than usual. This, then, was the moment for prostrating the republic, saved, victorious, loaded with benefits, at the footstool of the Eternal. Grand and affecting the occasion to those who believed, opportune to those upon whom political ideas alone operated!

A singular spectacle is here offered to reflection. Dogmatists, in whose eyes no human agreement or prepossession was worthy of regard; who, from their extraordinary contempt for all other nations, and their equally extraordinary self-sufficiency, cared for no opinion, and scrupled not to defy that of the whole world; who, in the matter of government, had superseded all principles for the maxim of stern necessity, and had admitted the authority only of certain citizens temporarily elected; who had rejected all gradation of classes, and had feared not to abolish the most ancient and firmly rooted of creeds—they, these dogmatists, paused before two ideas, morality and the Divine Being! After having repudiated all those from which they conceived mankind might be set free, they remained subject to the influence of these two, and had sacrificed a party to each. If all were not sincere in their belief, all at least felt the absolute need of order amongst men, and, as the essential means of supporting that human order, they perceived the necessity of recognising a general and intelligent Providence in the universe. It is the first time, in the history of the world, that the demolition of every subsisting authority left society a prey to the government of minds purely systematic (for the English, at the era of their commonwealth, put implicit faith in the Christian dispensation); and those very minds, which had so contemptuously spurned all received ideas, yet retained and adopted those which involved the sanctity of morals and the Godhead. This example is solitary in the annals of the world. It is grand and striking. The historian is justified in staying his narrative to ponder on such things.

Robespierre was the reporter on this solemn occasion, and most appropriately so, according to the distribution of parts arranged amongst the members of the committee. Prieur, Robert-Lindet, and Carnot, attended in silence to the details of administration and of war. Barrère compiled the majority of the reports, particularly those which had reference to the operations of the armies, and in general all such as required extempore delivery. Collot-d'Herbois, skilful in the art of declamation, was deputed to the clubs and popular meetings, there to harangue in the interest of the committee. Couthon, despite his paralytic infirmity, also moved to and fro, spoke in the convention, in the Jacobin Club, and in assemblies of the people; and possessed the art of interesting his hearers, not only by his bodily affliction, but also by the kind and gentle tone he assumed even when uttering the most violent doctrines. Billaud, less inclined to personal exertion, devoted his time to the correspondence, and occasionally treated on questions of general policy. Saint-Just, young, bold, and active, passed rapidly between fields of battle and the committee; when he had sufficiently impressed the armies with terror and energy, he returned to frame sanguinary reports against parties marked out for death. Lastly, Robespierre, their universal chief, was consulted on all subjects, but spoke only on great occasions. High moral and political questions were reserved exclusively for him, such eminent themes being alone deemed worthy his talent and ineffable merit. Thus the distinction of reporter upon the topic now appointed for discussion fell to him of right. None had declared more vehemently against atheism, none was held in such deep respect, none enjoyed so great a reputation for purity and virtue; none, in short, was more fitted, from his ascendancy and dogmatism, to take upon him this species of pontificate.

Never had so fair an opportunity occurred for imitating Rousseau, whose opinions he professed, and of whose style he made a continual study. The talents of Robespierre had been wonderfully developed in the long struggles of the revolution. This cold and unimaginative being had learnt to extemporise with great readiness and fluency; and when he wrote, his productions were distinguished for perspicuity, brilliancy, and strength. In his style something of Rousseau's caustic and sombre humour might be detected; but he could never engraft the noble sentiments or the generous and impassioned soul of the author of Emile.

He appeared in the tribune on the 18th Floreal (7th May), with a sedulously wrought discourse. Profound attention was accorded him. "Citizens," so he commenced his address, "it is in the period of prosperity that it behoves nations, equally with individuals, to probe themselves, if I may so speak, in order that they may listen to the voice of wisdom in the stillness of their passions." He then proceeded to unfold his subject at large. The republic, as he represented, was virtue; and all the adversaries it had encountered were only so many varieties of vices contending against it, and fostered by kings. The anarchists, the corruptionists, and the atheists, had all been the agents of Pitt. "The tyrants," he stated, "satisfied with the audacious conduct of their emissaries, had eagerly held up to the odium of their subjects the extravagances they themselves had paid for; and, feigning to believe them committed by the French people, seemed to say to them, 'What will you gain by shaking off our yoke? You see the republicans are no better than we are!'" Brissot, Danton, and Hébert, were reviewed by him in succession; but whilst indulging in virulent declamation against those pretended enemies of virtue, tirades which from repetition had become nauseous, he was coldly heard. He speedily abandoned that part of his subject, however, and turned to the inculcation of truly great and moral ideas, most ably expounded. He then obtained universal applause. He observed with reason that it was not as authors of systems that the representatives of the nation ought to reprobate atheism and proclaim deism, but as legislators seeking the most suitable principles for men united in a social compact. "What signify to you, legislators," he exclaimed, "the various hypotheses whereby certain philosophers explain the phenomena of nature? You may safely leave all such points to their interminable disputations; it is neither as metaphysicians nor as theologians you are called upon to view them: in the eyes of the legislator, all that is useful to the world and practically beneficial is truth. The idea of the Supreme Being and of the immortality of the soul is a continual incitement to justice; therefore is it sociable and republican. Who has invested thee," he continued, apostrophising an atheist, "with a mission to teach the people that the divinity has no existence—thou who evincest such zeal for that barren doctrine, but who art ever lukewarm for thy country? What profit dost thou find in persuading man that a blind force rules over his destinies, and smites at hazard both crime and virtue—that his soul is but a volatile essence, absorbed in the dreariness of the tomb? Will the idea of his nonenity inspire him with more pure and elevated sentiments than that of his immortality?—will it inspire him with more respect for his fellow-men and for himself—with more devotedness towards his country—with more heroism to brave tyranny—with more contempt for death or voluptuousness? Ye who regret the loss of a virtuous friend, cherish ye not the thought that his noblest part has escaped the stroke of death? Ye who weep over the shroud of a son or a partner, are you consoled by him who tells you that nothing remains of those beloved beings but vile dust? Ye unfortunates who fall beneath the blow of the assassin, is not your last sigh an appeal to eternal justice? Innocence on the scaffold can make the tyrant quail on his triumphal car. Would it have that power if the grave levelled the oppressor and the oppressed?"

Robespierre, still intent on presenting the question in its political phase, added these remarkable observations: "Let us here take a lesson from history. Remark, I pray you, how the men who have influenced the destinies of states were determined towards the one or the other of the two antagonist systems by their personal character and the nature of their political views. See with what profound art Cæsar, pleading in the Roman senate in favour of Catiline's accomplices, wanders into a digression against the belief in the immortality of the soul, so adapted did he esteem such ideas to extinguish in the hearts of the judges the energy of virtue—so intimately did he deem the cause of crime allied with that of atheism! Cicero, on the contrary, invoked against the traitors both the sword of the law and the vengeance of the gods. Socrates, dying, conversed with his friends on the immortality of the soul. Leonidas, at Thermopylæ, supping with his companions in arms on the eve of executing the most heroic purpose human virtue ever conceived, invited them for the morrow to another banquet in a new world. Cato hesitated not between Epicurus and Zeno. Brutus, and the illustrious band who partook his dangers and his glory, also belonged to that sublime sect of stoics, who maintained such lofty ideas of the dignity of man, who pitched their enthusiasm for virtue so high, and indeed overstrained heroism itself. Stoicism reared emulators of Brutus and Cato even in the dismal ages which followed the loss of Roman liberty; stoicism redeemed the honour of human nature, degraded by the vices of Cæsar's successors, and above all by the patience of the people."

Clinging to the subject of atheism, Robespierre spoke in a singular strain concerning the encyclopedists.* "That sect," he said, "in political views always stopped short of the rights of the people; in moral views it went far beyond the overthrow of religious prejudices. Its coryphœi occasionally declaimed against despotism, and they were pensioned by despots; they sometimes wrote books against the court, and sometimes dedications to kings, speeches for courtiers, and madrigals for ladies-in-waiting; they were arrogant in their works, and cringing in antechambers. That sect propagated with the utmost zeal the doctrine of materialism, which obtained amongst nobles and wits; to it we partly owe that species of practical philosophy, which, reducing selfishness into a system, regards human society as a war of stratagem, success as the measure of justice or injustice, probity as a matter of taste or convenience, the world as the patrimony of adroit knaves.

Amongst those who, at the time of which I speak, distinguished themselves in the career of letters and philosophy, one man, by the elevation of his soul and the grandeur of his character, showed himself worthy to be the preceptor of the human race. He attacked tyranny with all the sincerity of his heart; he spoke with enthusiasm of the Divinity; his vigorous and honest eloquence depicted in glowing colours the charms of virtue, and vindicated those consolatory doctrines which reason gives for support to humanity. The purity of his opinions, founded on nature and a profound hatred of vice, equally with his unalterable contempt for the intriguing sophists who arrogated the title of philosophers, drew upon him the enmity and persecution of his rivals and false friends. Ah if he had witnessed this revolution, of which he wa the precursor, who can doubt that his generous mind would have embraced with ardour the cause of justice and equality?"*

Robespierre subsequently laboured to dispel the idea that the government, in asserting the dogma of a Supreme Being, was promoting the interests of priests. On this topic he thus expressed himself:—"What is there in common between priests and the Deity? Priests are to ethics what charlatans are to medicine How infinitely is the God of nature different from the God of priests! I know nothing so much resembling atheism as the religions they have fabricated. By degrading the Supreme Being, they have annihilat him as much as in them lay; they have made him sometimes a ball of fire, sometimes an ox, sometimes a tree, sometimes a man, sometimes a king. Priests have created a God after their own likeness; they have made him jealous, capricious, covetous, cruel, and implacable. They have treated him as in times past the mayors of the palace treated the descendants of Clovis, in order that they might reign in his name and usurp his place; they have chained him in heaven as in a palace, and have called him on earth only to demand for their own profit tithes, lands, honours, luxury, and power. The veritable temple of the Supreme Being is the universe; his creed, virtue; his worship, the gladness of a multitude assembled before him to strengthen the bands of universal brotherhood, and to offer him the homage of pure and sensible hearts."

In conclusion, Robespierre advocated the expediency of festivals in a nation. "Man," said he, "is the noblest object in nature, and the most magnificent of all spectacles is that of an immense congregation." In consequence, he propounded a scheme for holding assemblies on all the tenth days or decades.

His report was closed amidst the most deafening applause. He then formally proposed the decree, which was adopted by acclamation. It set forth—

Art. 1st. "The French people recognise the existence of the Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul."

Art. 2d. "They acknowledge that the worship worthiest of the Supreme Being is the observance of the duties of man."

Subsequent articles enacted the institution of festivals, "with the view of recalling man to a sense of the Divinity and the dignity of his own being." They were to take their names from the events of the revolution, or from the virtues most beneficial to mankind. Besides the festivals of the 14th July, 10th August, 21st January, and 31st May, the republic was henceforth to celebrate the following:—To the Supreme Being; to the human race; to the French people; to the benefactors of mankind; to the martyrs of liberty; to liberty and equality; to the republic; to the liberty of the world; to the love of country; to the hatred of tyrants and traitors; to truth; to justice; to modesty; to glory; to friendship; to frugality; to courage; to good faith; to heroism; to disinterestedness; to stoicism; to love; to conjugal constancy; to paternal love; to paternal tenderness; to filial piety; to infancy; to youth; to manhood; to old age; to misfortune; to agriculture; to industry; to forefathers; to posterity; to happiness.

A solemn festival was ordained for the 20th Prairial, the plan whereof was confided to David. It ought to be added, that in this decree the freedom of religious worship was again confirmed.

Robespierre's report had been ordered to be printed the moment it was concluded. During the same day, the commune and the Jacobin Club called for its public perusal, greeted it with vociferous plaudits, and deliberated upon the propriety of repairing en masse to tender their thanks to the convention for the sublime decree it had just passed. Remarks had been current upon the fact, that, after the sacrifice of the two factions, the Jacobins had refrained from manifesting their satisfaction, or congratulating the committee and the convention. A member now reminded them of that reproach, and stated that the present occasion was most opportune for proving the union of the Jacobins with a government so worthy of esteem. An address was accordingly voted and presented to the convention by a deputation of Jacobins. Its concluding paragraph was thus couched:—"The Jacobins have come this day to thank you for the solemn decree you have passed; they will come again to unite with you in the celebration of that glorious day when the festival to the Supreme Being will draw together virtuous citizens from all parts of France, to sing the hymn of virtue."

The president replied to the deputation in a somewhat magniloquent strain. "It is worthy," he said, "of a society which fills the world with its renown, which enjoys so vast an influence over public opinion, which has at all times been found in alliance with the most courageous amongst the defenders of the rights of man, to visit the temples of the laws, to render homage to the Supreme Being."

The president continued, and after a long oration on the subject, transferred it for exhaustion to Couthon. He, Couthon, forthwith proceeded to deliver a vehement harangue against atheists and corruptionists, and a pompous eulogy on the society. He then proposed, on this solemn day of gladness and thanksgiving, to render the Jacobins a tribute long and justly due to them, to wit, the acknowledgment, that, since the commencement of the revolution, they had never ceased to merit well of the country. The motion was adopted amidst the most enthusiastic cheering. The assembly broke up in transports of joy, and in a state bordering on delirium.

If the convention had received numerous addresses after the execution of the Hébertists and Dantonists, they were infinitely exceeded by those transmitted to it in consequence of the decree proclaiming belief in the Supreme Being. Ideas and phrases become contagious amongst the French with extraordinary rapidity. Among a people so quick and communicative, the idea which occupies a few minds is speedily the idea which occupies all, and the phrase which is on a few tongues is quickly on all. Addresses poured in from all quarters, congratulating the convention on its sublime decrees, and thanking it for having established virtue, proclaimed the Supreme Being, and restored hope to mankind. All the sections appeared in their order to express the like sentiments. The section of Marat, on presenting itself at the bar, apostrophised the Mountain, saying—"Beneficent Mountain! Sinai-protector! deign to receive our expressions of gratitude and felicitation for all the sublime decrees thou daily emittest for the happiness of the human race. From thy avenging hand hath darted the salutary thunderbolt, which, crushing atheism, imparts to all true republicans the consolatory conviction of living free, under the eye of the Supreme Being, and in the expectancy of an immortality hereafter. Long live the convention! long live the republic! long live the Mountain!" All these addresses besought the convention, as before, to retain power. One, indeed, urged it to sit until the reign of virtue was established in the republic on imperishable bases.

From this time forth, the words "virtue" and "Supreme Being" were in all mouths. Over the portals of temples, where had been written "to Reason," was now displayed in large characters, "To the Supreme Being." The remains of Rousseau were transported to the Pantheon. His widow was presented to the convention, and gratified with a pension.

Thus the committee of public welfare, triumphant over all factions, enfeoffed in al authority, placed at the head of an enthusiastic and victorious nation, proclaiming the reign of virtue and the creed of a Supreme Being, was at the pinnacle of its power and the consummation of its systems.

* [Robespierre here alludes to Rousseau.]

CHAPTER XXXIII.

STATE OF EUROPE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE YEAR 1794.—POLICY AND PLANS OF THE ALLIES AND OF FRANCE.—OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN.—VICTORY OF TURCOING.—CLOSE OF THE WAR IN LA VENDEE, AND BEGINNING OF THAT OF THE CHOUANS.—EVENTS IN THE FRENCH COLONIES.—DISASTER OF ST DOMINGO.—LOSS OF MARTINIQUE.—NAVAL BATTLE.

THE winter had been employed in Europe and in France to make preparations for the approaching campaign. England was still the soul of the coalition, and continued to incite all the powers of Europe to destroy, on the banks of the Seine, a revolution which alarmed her, and a rival which was hateful to her. The implacable son of Chatham had made prodigious efforts this year to crush France. However, he had not obtained from parliament the means proportioned to his vast projects without encountering obstacles. Lord Stanhope, in the upper house, Fox and Sheridan in the lower house, had always opposed the system of the war. They refused the supplies demanded by the ministers, and were content to grant only so much as was needful for defending the coasts; above all, they protested against the war being described as "just and necessary;" it was, on the contrary, they averred, iniquitous, ruinous, and justly signalised by reverses. They asserted its alleged motives, the opening of the Scheldt, the dangers of Holland, and the necessity of defending the British constitution, to be false and groundless. Holland had not been exposed to peril by the opening of the Scheldt, and the British constitution was not menaced. The aim of the ministers was, they maintained, to subjugate a nation which had presumed to become free, and to augment their own influence and authority under pretence of resisting the machinations of French Jacobins. The war itself had been carried on by disgraceful means. Civil war and domestic massacres had been fomented; but a brave and generous people had foiled the schemes of its adversaries by a courage and efforts without example. Stanhope, Fox, and Sheridan, concluded that such a contest would dishonour and ruin England. They erred in the latter respect. The English opposition may frequently reproach the government with commencing unjust wars, but never disadvantageous ones. If the war waged against France had no just motive, it was supplied with excellent political reasons, as we shall have occasion to show; and the opposition, misled by its generous sentiments, overlooked the advantages which must thence result to England.

Pitt pretended to be alarmed at the threats of descent bellowed from the tribune of the convention. He asseverated that certain Kentish yeomen had been heard to say, "The French are coming to bring us the rights of man." On such expressions (due, it was said, to his own gold) he professed to ground his fears for the constitution. He denounced the constitutional societies of England, which had been stirred into somewhat greater activity by the example of the clubs in France, and maintained that they were striving to establish a convention under the pretext of promoting parliamentary reform. In consequence, he demanded the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the seizure of papers belonging to such societies, and the prosecution of some of their members. He asked, moreover, for permission to enrol volunteers, and support them by means of benevolences or subscriptions; and for authority to augment the army and navy, and to take into pay a body of 40,000 aliens, French emigrants, and others. The opposition offered a strenuous resistance. It held that no cause warranted the suspension of the most precious of English liberties; that, as the accused societies deliberated in public, their views openly expressed could involve no conspiracy; that those views were general throughout the country, extending, as they did, only to the enforcement of parliamentary reform; that the immoderate augmentation of the army was dangerous to the English people; that if volunteers might be armed by subscription, it would become feasible for the minister to levy armies without the sanction of parliament; that, to subsidise so great a number of foreigners, was a profligate waste of money, and intended merely to reward French traitors. Notwithstanding the remonstrances of the opposition, which had never displayed greater eloquence or less numerical strength—for it mustered only thirty or forty votes—Pitt obtained all he desired, and carried the whole of the measures he had propounded.

Having thus procured the allowance of his various demands, he doubled the militia, increased the army to 60,000 men and the navy to 80,000, organised additional corps of emigrants, and filed criminal informations against several members of the constitutional societies. The English jury, a more solid guarantee than the parliament, acquitted the defendants; but this was of little moment to Pitt, who had now at his disposal unlimited means of repressing the least political movement, and of deploying a colossal might in Europe.

The moment was opportune for profiting by an universal war, to overwhelm France, to annihilate her navy, and to wrest from her her colonies—results infinitely more sure and desirable in the eyes of Pitt than the suppression of certain political and religious doctrines. He had succeeded the previous year in arming against France the two maritime powers bound by every tie of interest to remain in alliance with her, Spain and Holland; and he strove diligently to keep them steadfast in their political error, and to derive the greatest possible aid therefrom against the French navy. England could send from her ports at least one hundred ships of the line, Spain forty, Holland twenty, without reckoning a multitude of frigates. How was France, with the fifty or sixty vessels remaining to her since the conflagration of Toulon, to resist such forces? Thus, although not a single naval battle had been yet fought, the English flag domineered in the Mediterranean, the Atlantic Ocean, and the Indian seas. In the Mediterranean, the English squadron menaced the Italian states which desired to preserve neutrality, and blockaded Corsica to force it from French possession, whilst, nearer home, they awaited an opportunity for disembarking troops and munitions in La Vendée. In America, they hovered round the Antilles, and sought to profit by the deplorable contentions amongst the whites, mulattoes, and blacks, to secure them for the British crown. In the Indian seas, they accomplished the establishment of British supremacy, and the ruin of Pondicherry. One campaign more, and French commerce was destroyed, whatever might be the fortune of arms on the continent. Thus the war waged by Pitt against France was eminently politic, and the opposition erred in blaming it on the score of utility. It will have judged correctly only in one contingency, and that contingency has not yet happened;—if the national debt, continually on the increase, and now become enormous, be really beyond the resources of the country, and must one day result in bankruptcy, England will have exceeded its means, and acted improvidently in contending for an empire which has exhausted its elements of strength. But this is yet a mystery of the future.

Pitt refrained from no measure, however violent, which promised to facilitate his views, and aggravate the evils of France. The Americans, happy and content under Washington, freely ploughed the seas, and began to prosecute that vast carrying trade, which proved to them so rich a source of wealth during the long wars in Europe. The English squadrons stopped the American ships, and impressed sailors from their crews. Upwards of five hundred vessels had already undergone that violation, which formed the subject of vehement but hitherto fruitless remonstrances on the part of the American government. Nor was this all: under favour of their neutrality, the Americans, Danes, and Swedes, frequented the French ports, conveying supplies of corn, which the scarcity rendered extremely valuable, together with numerous articles required in navy-yards, and bearing away in return the wines and other products of the French soil. Owing to this intervention of neutrals, commerce was not entirely interrupted, and the most importunate wants of consumption had been satisfied. England, considering France in the light of a besieged fortress to be starved and reduced to despair, regarded with a malevolent eye these rights of neutrals, and had addressed to the northern courts divers notes, replete with sophistry, designed to justify a dereliction of international law.

Whilst employing these various modes of maritime hostility, England still maintained 40,000 men in the Low Countries, under the orders of the Duke of York. Moreover, Lord Moira, who had failed to arrive in time before Granville, was lying at Jersey with his flotilla, and a disembarking force of 10,000 men. In fine, the English exchequer held funds at the disposition of all the belligerent powers.

On the continent, martial ardour had somewhat cooled. The powers, not having the same interest in war as England, and carrying it on, indeed, simply for pretended principles, were far from exhibiting either similar zeal or similar activity. England laboured strenuously to reanimate them all. Holding Holland under thraldom by means of the Prince of Orange, she constrained it to furnish its contingent to the allied army of the north. Thus that unfortunate nation had its ships and its troops in the service of its most formidable enemy, and acting in opposition to its surest ally. Prussia, despite the mysticism of its king, had lost much of the illusion so sedulously propagated amongst its people during the last two years. The retreat of Champagne in 1792, and that of the Vosges in 1793, had certainly not tended to encourage it. Frederick William, who had exhausted his treasure and weakened his army in a war which could have no result advantageous to his kingdom, and which, in the most favourable point of view, could only serve the interests of the house of Austria, would have willingly receded from it. Besides, a subject infinitely more interesting to him called his attention to the north: Poland was in agitation, and its dissevered members aiming at a rejunction. England, plying him in this state of uncertainty, prompted him to continue the war by the all-powerful stimulus of gold. She concluded at the Hague, in her own name and in that of Holland, a treaty whereby Prussia was bound to furnish 62,400 men to the coalition. These forces were to be under the command of a Prussian, and their future conquests to belong in common to the two maritime powers, England and Holland. In return, these two states guaranteed a monthly subsidy of £50,000 sterling to Prussia for the maintenance of its troops, and the reimbursement of its expenditure for bread and forage. They furthermore granted the sum of £300,000 to defray the charges of entering on the campaign, and £100,000 for the return into the Prussian confines. At this price, Prussia continued the impolitic war it had commenced.

The house of Austria had no longer any object of solicitude in France, since the queen-consort of Louis XVI. had expired on the scaffold. Austria must have had less reason than any other country to dread the contagious influence of the revolution, since even thirty years of political discussions have failed to excite her phlegmatic subjects. She made war on France, therefore, from a motive of vengeance, from respect for her engagements, and from the desire of gaining certain fortresses in Flanders; perhaps, also, from the futile hope of grasping a portion of the French provinces. She evinced greater ardour than Prussia, but not much more of real activity, for she did but complete and re-organise her battalions without augmenting their number. A considerable proportion of her troops was in Poland, since she had, like Prussia, potential reasons for looking to the rear, and keeping a steady gaze on the Vistula as well as on the Rhine. The Gallicias bespoke her attention not less, assuredly, than Belgium and Alsace.

Sweden and Denmark adhered to their sage neutrality, and replied to the sophisms of England with befitting spirit. They stated that the public law was immutable; that no reason existed for infringing it with respect to France, or for extending to an entire country the rules of blockade, which were only applicable to a besieged fortress; that the Swedish and Danish vessels were well received in France, not encountering barbarians, as was generally surmised, but a government which acted uprightly towards foreign merchants, and treated them with all the regard due to the subjects of nations with whom it was at peace; and that, consequently, they had no motive for breaking asunder advantageous relations. Accordingly, although Catherine, being favourably inclined towards the projects of England, seemed to pronounce against the rights of neutral nations, Sweden and Denmark persisted in their resolution, observed a firm and prudent neutrality, and concluded a treaty whereby the two countries pledged themselves to maintain the rights of neutrals, and to enforce the clause in the treaty of 1780, which closed the Baltic to the armed vessels of powers which possessed no port in that sea. France, therefore, might still expect to receive corn, and the timber and hemp necessary for her navy, from the north.

Russia, albeit affecting boundless indignation against the French revolution, and amusing the emigrants with many lofty expectations, had in reality her attention concentrated on Poland, and only entered with such apparent warmth into the policy of the English to obtain their concurrence in her own. Herein may be found the explanation of England's silence on so momentous an event as the disappearance of a kingdom from the political stage. At this period of general spoliation, indeed, when England was gathering acquisitions so rapidly in the south of Europe and in every sea, it little became her to speak the language of justice to the co-partitioners of Poland. Thus the coalition, which accused France of having fallen into barbarism, committed in the north the most audacious robbery ever planned by political rascality, contemplated a similar appropriation of the Gallic provinces, and contributed to destroy for ever the liberty of the seas.

The German princes obeyed the impulse of the house of Austria. Switzerland, protected by its mountains and its institutions from being drawn into the crusade for the cause of monarchy, persisted in its system of non-intervention, and thus covered by its neutrality the eastern provinces of France, the least defensible of all. The Swiss acted the same part on the continent as the Americans, Swedes, and Danes, on the seas; they rendered analogous services to French commerce, and reaped a corresponding recompense. They imported horses, of which the French armies stood in great need, and cattle, which had become deficient since the Vosges and La Vendée had been ravaged by war, and they exported the products of French manufactures, thus constituting themselves the intermediate agents of a most profitable traffic. Piedmont continued the war probably with regret, but it could not consent to lay down its arms after having lost two provinces, Savoy and Nice, in the desperate and inconsiderate game. Most of the other Italian states desired to remain neutral, but in this design they were exposed to much annoyance. The republic of Genoa had suffered the mortification of beholding the English perpetrate within its harbour an unworthy act—a veritable outrage on the law of nations. They had seized on a French frigate, anchored under shelter of Genoese neutrality, and massacred the crew. Tuscany had been obliged to dismiss the French resident. Naples, which had acknowledged the republic when the French squadrons threatened its shores, demonstrated its hostility when the English flag was unfurled in the Mediterranean, and undertook to furnish 18,000 auxiliary troops to Piedmont. Rome, happily impotent, anathematised the French, and allowed their diplomatic agent, Basseville, to be murdered within her walls. Lastly, Venice, although little gratified by the demagogical language of French republicans, was decidedly opposed to embarking in the war, and hoped, under favour of her distant position, to escape its embroilment. Corsica was on the point of falling, since Paoli had declared for the English; Bastia and Calvi were the only possessions left to the French in the whole island.

Spain, the least blameable of all the allies, continued an impolitic war, and participated in the grievous blunder of Holland. The imagined duties of thrones, the victories of Ricardos, and the weight of English influence, determined it to attempt another campaign, despite its great exhaustion and its deficiency in soldiers, and, above all, in funds. The celebrated Alcudia effected the disgrace of D'Aranda for having recommended peace.

The political state of Europe, therefore, had undergone scarcely any modifications since the preceding year. Interests, errors, faults, and crimes, were in 1794 the same as in 1793. England alone had materially augmented its forces. The allies still possessed in the Low Countries one hundred and fifty thousand men, Austrians, Germans, Dutch, and English. Twenty-five thousand or thirty thousand Austrians were at Luxumbourg, and sixty thousand Prussians and Saxons in the vicinity of Mayence. Fifty thousand Austrians, including a proportion of emigrants, lined the Rhine from Manheim to Basle. The Piedmontese army amounted to forty thousand men, with seven thousand or eight thousand Austrian auxiliaries. Spain had levied recruits to recompose its battalions, and had demanded pecuniary aid from the clergy; but its army was not greater than in the preceding campaign, being still restricted to sixty thousand men, distributed between the Eastern and Western Pyrenees.

It was on the north the allies proposed to strike the most decisive blow, basing their operations on Condé, Valenciennes, and Le Quesnoy. The celebrated Mack had arranged a plan at London, from which mighty results were anticipated. On this occasion the German tactician, evincing greater hardihood than heretofore, had included a march on Paris in his scheme of campaign. Unfortunately, he was a little too late in arriving at this degree of boldness, for it was no longer possible to take the French by surprise, and their means of resistance were almost incalculable. His plan consisted in capturing one additional fortress, that of Landrecies, concentrating in force on that point, drawing the Prussians from the Vosges to the Sambre, and marching forward, with the precaution of leaving two corps on the wings, the one in Flanders, the other on the Sambre. At the same time, Lord Moira was to disembark troops in La Vendée, and aggravate the enemy's danger by a double march on Paris.

To take Landrecies, when they possessed Valenciennes, Condé, and Le Quesnoy, was, on the part of the allies, a superfluous caution; to cover their communications towards the Sambre was wisely judged; but to detach a corps to guard Flanders, when it behoved them to form the largest possible invading mass, was highly injudicious; to draw the Prussians on the Sambre was of doubtful policy, as we shall learn hereafter; finally, to effect a diversion in La Vendée, was impracticable by the lapse of many months, for the great Vendéan war had been suppressed. The comparison of the event with the design, however, will more clearly show the futility of the plans transcribed in London.*

The coalition, we have stated, had not called forth its utmost resources. There were, in fact, at this moment, but three powers really active in Europe—England, Russia, and France. And, for sufficient reasons, England was intent on the sovereignty of the seas, Russia on the appropriation of Poland, and France on the preservation of its existence and liberty. These were the only three great interests powerfully excited; that of France alone was noble, and in its vindication she manifested an indomitable energy, of which history records no other example.

The permanent requisition, decreed in the month of August of the preceding year, had already produced considerable reinforcements to the army, and contributed to the successes which terminated the last campaign; but that great measure was not destined to exhibit all its effects until the present year. Under the impetus of that extraordinary movement, twelve hundred thousand men had quitted their homes, and lined the frontiers or crowded the dépôts in the interior. The business of embodying these recruits had been diligently prosecuted. A battalion of the line was incorporated with two battalions of the new levy, by which means excellent regiments were formed. Seven hundred thousand men had been already organised on this plan, and dispatched to the frontiers or stationed in fortresses. There were, including garrisons, 250,000 men in the north, 40,000 in the Ardennes, 200,000 men on the Rhine and the Moselle, 100,000 on the Alps, 20,000 on the Pyrenees, and 80,000 between Cherbourg and La Rochelle. The expedients employed to equip these troops had not been less prompt or extraordinary than those to muster and discipline them. The manufactories of arms established in Paris and in the departments had quickly attained the activity sought to be given them, and furnished cannons, muskets, and swords, in amazing quantities. The committee of public welfare, perfectly conversant with the peculiar genius of the French people, had skilfully contrived to render the preparation of saltpetre a subject of emulation. During the previous year, it had ordered cellars to be visited with the view of separating the saline mould. Subsequently, it went a step further: it framed a series of instructions, drawn up with admirable simplicity and perspicuity, to enable the citizens themselves to apply the requisite process to the earth of cellars. It moreover retained some practical chemists to teach the mode of manipulation. A taste for the employment was speedily disseminated; those who had received lessons imparted the information to their neighbours, and in a little while each house supplied several pounds of the precious commodity. Certain of the Parisian quarters congregated to bear in pomp to the convention and the Jacobin Club the saltpetre they had fabricated. The idea of a festival was started, wherein each person should advance and deposit his offering on the altar of the country. The salt was shaped in emblematic forms; all sorts of epithets were lavished on it; the people styled it "the avenging salt," "the liberating salt," &c. Thus it furnished them with a topic of amusement; but they produced considerable quantities of the essential article, and the government had gained its object. Some degree of confusion was naturally attendant on so singular an occupation. The cellars were dug up, and the earth, after being subjected to the process, was thrown into the streets, which it obstructed and injured. An ordinance of the committee of public welfare put a stop to this abuse, and the earthy ore was thenceforth replaced in the cellars. Brine also was deficient; the committee ordained that all the herbs that were not used either in the feeding of animals or for domestic and agricultural purposes, should be forthwith burnt, to serve for the extraction of saltpetre, or to be converted into brine.

The government had the art to instigate another mania equally advantageous. It was found more easy to levy men and manufacture arms than to obtain horses; the artillery and the cavalry were both defective in quadrupeds. The war had rendered them scarce; the demand and the general enhancement in value had greatly increased their price. The grand resource of a requisition was deemed indispensable; that is to say, the taking by force what an imperative necessity required. In each canton one horse out of twenty-five was confiscated, at the rate of nine hundred francs. But, however powerful force may be, good will is always more efficacious. The committee conceived the idea of having a trooper fully equipped presented to it by the Jacobin Club. The example was followed universally. Communes, clubs, and sections, vied in offering to the republic Jacobin cavaliers, as they were called, all completely accoutred and mounted.

Soldiers, then, were abundant, but not so officers. The committee met the want with its usual promptitude. "The revolution," said Barrère, "must precipitate in every instance to supply its wants. The revolution is to the human mind what the sun of Africa is to vegetation." The school of Mars was re-established; young men, selected from all the departments, repaired on foot and in military form to Paris. Encamped under tents, in the middle of the plain of Sablons, they were rapidly instructed in all branches of the art of war, and afterwards distributed amongst the armies.

Efforts equally vigorous were made to recompose the navy. In 1789, it consisted of fifty ships, and as many frigates. The disorders of the revolution, and the calamity of Toulon, had reduced it to fifty vessels in all, whereof thirty at the utmost were fit for service. But the chief deficiency was in crews and officers. The navy required experienced men, and all such had long been incompatible with the revolution. The reconstruction enforced on the staffs of the army was consequently even more inevitable with regard to the commanderies of the navy, and necessarily calculated to produce a still greater degree of disorganisation. The two ministers of the admiralty, Monge and D'Albarade, had been found unequal to grapple with the difficulties thence resulting, and been dismissed accordingly. The committee resolved on this point also to employ extraordinary measures. Jean-Bon-Saint-André and Prieur-de-la-Marne were sent to Brest, with the usual powers of commissioners of the convention. The squadron of Brest, after a tedious cruise of four months off the western coasts, to prevent communications between the Vendéans and the English, had mutinied in consequence of its prolonged hardships. Scarcely had it returned into port ere its commander, Admiral Morard de Gales, was arrested by the representatives, and held responsible for the disaffection of the fleet. The crews were broken up, and recomposed after the prompt and violent manner of the Jacobins. Peasants, who had never rowed a boat, were transported to the decks of men-of-war, to manœuvre against the veteran English sailors; simple officers were raised to the highest grades, and Captain Villaret-Joyeuse was promoted to the command of the squadron. In the space of one month, a fleet of thirty line-of-battle ships was in readiness to weigh anchor; it left the port, full of enthusiasm, and amidst the joyful acclamations of the people of Brest, not certainly with the intention of braving the formidable squadrons of England, Holland, and Spain, but of protecting a convoy of 200 sail, then bringing from America a considerable quantity of corn, and of fighting to the death, if the safety of the convoy so required. At the same time, Toulon was the scene of a creative activity not less diligent. The ships that had escaped the conflagration were repaired, and others built; the charges being defrayed by the property of those amongst the Toulonese who had aided in delivering the port into the hands of the enemy. In defect of large fleets, then only in preparation, a multitude of privateers scoured the seas, and made numerous captures. A hardy and valiant people, to whom the means of carrying on a combined system of warfare are denied, can always have recourse to a war of detail, and therein find opportunities of displaying its intelligence and courage; on land it prosecutes a partisan war, on sea a privateering war. According to a statement of Lord Stanhope, the French had, from 1793 to 1794, taken 410 vessels, whilst the English had captured from them but 316. The government, therefore, was far from renouncing the idea of re-establishing French power even on the ocean.

All these prodigious exertions were now destined to have their appropriate consequences; in 1794 was to be reaped the reward of the efforts of 1793.

The campaign first opened on the Pyrenees and the Alps. Almost stagnant on the Western Pyrenees, it shortly became singularly active on the Eastern Pyrenees, where the Spaniards had gained the line of the Tech, and occupied the famous camp of Boulou. Ricardos was dead, and that able general had been replaced by one of his lieutenants, the Count de la Union, an intrepid soldier, but a mediocre commander. Not having yet received the reinforcements he expected, La Union was content to hold fast by his position at Boulou. The French were commanded by the brave Dugommier, the conqueror of Toulon. A part of the ordnance and the troops employed in subjugating that city had been moved before Perpignan, whilst the young recruits were organising in its rear. Dugommier could muster 35,000 men in line, to profit by the defective strength of the Spaniards Dagobert, always impetuous in spite of his age, proposed a plan of invasion by Cerdagne, whereby the French, advancing beyond the Pyrenees and to the rear of the Spanish army, would oblige it to retrograde. The experiment of an attack on the camp of Boulou was preferred; and Dagobert, resting with his division in Cerdagne, had orders to await the result of that assault. The camp of Boulou, placed on the banks of the Tech, and leaning on the Pyrenees, had behind it the Bellegarde road, which forms the highway from France into Spain. Dugommier, instead of taking the enemy's positions in front, which were strongly fortified, determined to penetrate, if possible, between Boulou and the Bellegarde turnpike, with the view of compelling the evacuation of the Spanish camp. His project succeeded beyond expectation. La Union had drawn the bulk of his forces to Ceret, and left the heights of Saint-Christophe, which commanded Boulou, insufficiently guarded. Dugommier passed the Tech, threw a part of his army towards Saint-Christophe, attacked with the residue the front of the Spanish positions, and after a vigorous contest remained master of the heights. From that moment the camp was no longer tenable, and a retreat by the Bellegarde highway became expedient; but Dugommier promptly occupied it, and afforded the Spaniards only the narrow and difficult tract through the defile of Porteuil. Their retreat soon resolved itself into a rout. Charged opportunely with vivacity, they fled in disorder, leaving in the hands of the French 1500 prisoners, 140 pieces of cannon, 800 mules loaded with baggage, and camp materials for 20,000 men. This victory, gained in the middle of Floreal (beginning of May), had the effect of restoring the line of the Tech, and carrying the French beyond the Pyrenees. Dugommier immediately blockaded Collioure, Port-Vendre, and Saint-Elme, to redeem those places from the Spaniards. During this important achievement, the valiant Dagobert, attacked by a fever, closed his long and glorious career. This noble veteran, who had attained the age of seventy-six, was interred amidst the sorrow and the admiration of the whole army.

Thus the first operations of the French on the Eastern Pyrenees were crowned with brilliant success. On the side of the Western Pyrenees, they carried the valley of Bastan, and these triumphs over the Spaniards, whom they had not hitherto defeated, excited universal joy.

On the Alpine frontier, the French had still to establish their line of defence on the great chain. Towards Savoy, they had last year forced the Piedmontese back into the valleys of Piedmont, but they had not succeeded in taking the positions of the Little St Bernard and of Mount Cenis. In the direction of Nice, the army of Italy was, as before, encamped in front of Saorgio, without having been able to carry the formidable camp of Les Fourches (The Forks). General Dugommier had been succeeded by the aged Dumerbion, an intrepid commander, but almost constantly afflicted with gout. Fortunately, he permitted himself to be entirely directed by young Bonaparte, who, as we have seen, had decided the reduction of Toulon by recommending the attack on Little Gibraltar. That service had procured Bonaparte the rank of general of brigade, and given him great consideration in the army. After surveying the hostile positions, and perceiving the impossibility of forcing the camp of Les Fourches, he was struck with an idea equally happy with that which recovered Toulon to the republic. Saorgio is situated in the valley of the Roya. Parallel with this valley runs that of Oneille, through which flows the Taggia. Bonaparte conceived the plan of throwing a division of 15,000 men into the valley of Oneille, causing it to ascend to the sources of the Tanaro, then pushing it onwards even to Mount Tanarello, which borders the Upper Roya, and thus intercepting the road to Saorgio, between the camp of Les Fourches and the Col de Tende. By this manœuvre, the camp of Les Fourches, isolated from the Great Alps, would necessarily fall. The project was open to only one objection, namely, that it obliged the army to violate the territory of Genoa. But that republic could take no just offence thereat; for, the year before, 2000 Piedmontese had traversed the Genoese confines, and proceeded to embark at Oneille for Toulon; furthermore, the outrage committed by the English on the frigate La Modeste, in the very port of Genoa, was a most flagrant infringement of neutral rights. Great advantages must, moreover, accrue from extending the right of the army to Oneille; it would be thereby enabled to cover part of the Genoese coast, expel the privateers from the little port of Oneille, where they habitually rendezvoused, and thus protect the trade of Genoa with the south of France. That trade, which was carried on in coasting vessels, was greatly interrupted by the English privateers and squadrons, and its security was of considerable importance, as it contributed to supply the southern departments with corn. There could be no hesitation, consequently, in adopting the plan recommended by Bonaparte. The representatives solicited the necessary authority from the committee of public welfare, and the execution of the project was promptly ordained.

On the 17th Germinal (6th April), a division of 14,000 men, divided into five brigades, passed the Roya. General Massena advanced on Mount Tanardo, and Bonaparte, with three brigades, marched on Oneille, drove out an Austrian division, and entered the town. He seized therein twelve pieces of ordnance, and cleared the harbour of all the privateers which infested those shores. Whilst Massena was ascending from Tanardo to Tanarello, Bonaparte continued his operations, and proceeded from Oneille to Ormea in the valley of the Tanaro. He entered that place on the 15th April (26th Germinal), and found in it divers muskets, twenty pieces of cannon, and magazines stored with cloth for soldiers' clothing. So soon as the French brigades had united in the valley of the Tanaro, they moved towards the Upper Roya, to execute the prescribed movement on the left of the Piedmontese. General Dumerbion attacked the positions of the Piedmontese in front, whilst Massena was closing on their flank and rear. After several spirited actions, the Piedmontese abandoned Saorgio, and fell back on the Col de Tende, and finally gave up the Col de Tende itself to take refuge in Limone, beyond the great chain.

Whilst these events were passing in the valley of the Roya, the valleys of the Tinea and the Vesubia were swept by the left of the army of Italy; and shortly afterwards, the army of the Great Alps, incited by the spirit of emulation, carried by main force Saint-Bernard and Mount Cenis. Thus, by the middle of Floreal (beginning of May), the French were victorious along the whole chain of the Alps, and occupied it from the first eminences of the Apennines to Mont-Blanc. Their right, supported on Ormea, reached almost to the gates of Genoa, covered a large portion of the shore of the Ponant, and thus protected trade from the ravages of piracy. They had made 3000 or 4000 prisoners, captured fifty or sixty pieces of ordnance, large stores of accoutring materials, and two fortified places. Their commencement, therefore, was equally fortunate on the Alps as on the Pyrenees, since on both points they obtained a rampart for the frontier, and a portion of the enemies' resources.

The campaign had opened somewhat later on the great theatre of the war, namely, the North. There 500,000 men were arrayed for combat on a line stretching from the Vosges to the sea. The French had still their principal strength concentrated towards Lille, Guise, and Maubeuge. Pichegru had become their general. Commander of the army of the Rhine during the previous year, he had contrived to usurp the honour of raising the blockade of Landau, which belonged rightfully to young Hoche. He had won the confidence of Saint-Just; and, whilst Hoche was thrown into prison, obtained the command-in-chief of the army of the North. Jourdan, esteemed as a prudent general, was not deemed sufficiently enterprising to retain the important command of the North, and he succeeded Hoche in the army of the Moselle. Michaud replaced Pichegru in that of the Rhine. Carnot, be it remembered, always presided over the military operations, and directed them from his cabinet. Saint-Just and Lebas had been dispatched to Guise, for the purpose of invigorating the resolution of the army.

The nature of the country prescribed a plan of operations at once simple and calculated to produce prompt and vast results; which consisted in moving the main mass of the French forces on the Meuse towards Namur, and thus threatening the communications of the Austrians. Therein lay the key of the theatre of war; and it will always be so when hostilities are carried on in the Low Countries against Austrians advancing from the Rhine. Any diversion in Flanders was injudicious; for, if the wing thrown into Flanders were sufficiently strong to make head against the allies, it merely contributed to repulse them in front, without compromising their retreat; and if it were not sufficiently powerful to obtain decisive advantages, the allies had only to let it progress into West Flanders, to be afterwards enabled to hem it in and drive it into the sea. Pichegru, possessing acquirements, intelligence, and considerable firmness, but indifferently gifted with military genius, formed an erroneous estimate of his position; and Carnot, prepossessed by his plan of the preceding year, persisted in enjoining a direct attack on the centre of the enemy and distracting demonstrations on his two wings. In consequence, the principal mass was appointed to act from Guise upon the centre of the allies, whilst two strong divisions, operating, the one on the Lys and the other on the Sambre, were to make a twofold diversion. Such was the plan opposed to the aggressive project of Mack.

The Prince of Cobourg continued to hold the chief command of the allied forces. The Emperor of Germany had repaired in person to the Low Countries, with the view of encouraging his army, and more especially of terminating, by his presence, the disputes which were perpetually arising amongst the allied generals. Cobourg concentrated a mass of about one hundred thousand men in the plains of Cateau, in order to blockade Landrecies. This was the preliminary operation with which the allies were to open the campaign, whilst awaiting the consent of the Prussians to march from the Moselle on the Sambre.

The movements commenced towards the close of Germinal (April). The allied mass, after driving the scattered French divisions before it, established itself around Landrecies. The Duke of York was stationed in observation towards Cambray; Cobourg towards Guise. By the movement which the allies thus effected, the French divisions of the centre, compelled to retrograde, were separated from the divisions of Maubeuge, which formed the left wing. On the 2d Floreal (21st April), an effort was attempted to renew the communications with those divisions of Maubeuge. A sanguinary conflict ensued on the Helpe. The French columns, still too much divided, were repulsed on all points, and chased into the positions whence they had ventured.

A fresh but general attack was then resolved upon by the French commanders, on the centre and the two wings simultaneously. The division of Desjardins, which was posted towards Maubeuge, had orders to make a movement with the view of uniting with the division of Charbonnier on its way from the Ardennes. In the centre, seven columns were to act at once and concentrically on the whole hostile mass grouped around Landrecies. Finally, on the left, Souham and Moreau, starting from Lille with two divisions, forming in all 50,000 men, were appointed to advance into Flanders, and capture, under the nose of Clairfayt, the fastnesses of Menin and Courtray.

The right of the French army operated its manœuvre without obstacle, for the Prince of Kaunitz was unable, with the division he led on the Sambre, to prevent the junction of Charbonnier and Desjardins. The columns of the centre got in motion on the 7th Floreal (26th April), and marched from seven different points on the Austrian army. This system of simultaneous and unconnected attacks, which had succeeded so ill the year before, met with no better fortune on this occasion. The columns, too far asunder from one another, could afford no mutual support, and failed to obtain a decisive advantage on any individual point. One of them, indeed, that of General Chappuis, was entirely defeated. That commander, moving from Cambray, found himself opposed to the Duke of York, who, we have already stated, covered Landrecies on that side. He scattered his troops on divers points, and came before the intrenched positions of Trois-Villes with insufficient force. Overwhelmed by the English fire, charged in flank by the cavalry, he was put to flight, and his dispersed division re-entered Cambray in the utmost confusion. These checks proceeded much more from the manner of conducting the operations than from any deficiency on the part of the troops. The young French soldiers, astounded occasionally at the terrors of a fire whereof they could have formed no previous idea, were, nevertheless, easily led on and rallied to the attack, and often, indeed, displayed extraordinary ardour and enthusiasm.

Whilst this abortive struggle was going forward in the centre, the diversion essayed in Flanders against Clairfayt completely succeeded. Souham and Moreau had departed from Lille and advanced on Menin and Courtray on the 7th of Floreal (26th April). These two towns are situated, the reader is aware, one below the other, on the Lys. Moreau invested the first, Souham seized on the second. Clairfayt, deceived respecting the march of the French, went in quest of them where they were not to be found. He was speedily apprised, however, of the investment of Menin and the capture of Courtray, and he then determined to make the French retrograde by menacing their communications with Lille. On the 9th Floreal (28th April), accordingly, he moved to Mouseron with 18,000 men, and thus imprudently exposed himself to the onslaught of 50,000 French, who could easily have crushed him by recoiling. Moreau and Souham, immediately recalling a part of their troops towards the threatened communications, marched on Mouseron, and resolved upon giving battle to Clairfayt. He was intrenched on a position which could be reached only through five narrow defiles, defended by a formidable artillery. On the 10th Floreal (29th April) the attack was ordered. The young recruits, of whom the greater part witnessed an enemy's fire for the first time, gave way before it; but the generals and the officers exerted the most heroic efforts to rally them, succeeded, and the positions were carried. Clairfayt lost twelve hundred prisoners, of whom eighty-four were officers, thirty-three pieces of ordnance, four standards, and five hundred muskets. This was the first victory in the north, and it tended greatly to heighten the courage of the French army. Menin was taken immediately after. A division of emigrants, entrapped within the walls, bravely saved itself by cutting an outlet sword in hand.

The success of the left, and the discomfiture of the centre, induced Pichegru and Carnot to abandon the centre altogether, and to act exclusively on the wings. Pichegru detached General Bonnaud with 20,000 men to Sainghien, near Lille, in order to assure the communications with Moreau and Souham. He left at Guise only 20,000 men under the orders of General Ferrand, and dispatched the rest towards Maubeuge, to join the division of Desjardins and Charbonnier. These united forces increased to 56,000 men the right wing destined to act on the Sambre. Carnot, judging more correctly than Pichegru the situation of affairs, issued an order which decided the fate of the campaign. Beginning to perceive that the point on which the allies ought to be assailed was the Sambre and the Meuse, and that, if defeated on that line, they would be separated from their base, he directed Jourdan to draw 15,000 men from the army of the Rhine, to leave on the western slope of the Vosges such force as was necessary to cover that frontier, then to quit the Moselle with 45,000 men, and advance to the Sambre by forced marches. The army under Jourdan, when united with that of Maubeuge, would form a mass of 90,000 or 100,000 men, and ensure the repulse of the allies on the decisive point. This order, the most sagacious of the campaign, and to which all its results must be attributed, was transmitted on the 11th Floreal (30th April) from the cabinet of the committee of public welfare.

Meanwhile, Cobourg had taken Landrecies. Undervaluing the defeat of Clairfayt, he contented himself with detaching the Duke of York to Lamain, between Tournay and Lille.

Clairfayt had moved into West Flanders, between the advanced left of the French and the sea, whereby he was still farther removed than before from the grand army and the succours brought him by the Duke of York. The French, extending from Lille to Menin and Courtray, composed an advanced column in Flanders; Clairfayt, stationed at Thielt, rested between the sea and that column; and the Duke of York, posted at Lamain, before Tournay, was between that column and the grand allied mass. Clairfayt determined to risk an attempt on Courtray, and marched to attack it on the 21st Floreal (10th May).

Souham was at this moment to the rear of Courtray. He promptly completed his arrangements, returned into the town to the aid of Vandamme, and, whilst preparing for a sally, detached Macdonald and Malbranck on Menin, with orders to pass the Lys and turn Clairfayt. The battle was fought on the 22d Floreal (11th May). Clairfayt had made admirable dispositions on the Bruges highway and in the suburbs but the French conscripts intrepidly braved the fire from the houses and the batteries, and after a fierce encounter, compelled Clairfayt to retire. Four thousand men on both sides covered the field of battle; and if, instead of turning the enemy on the side of Menin, the French had turned him on the opposite quarter, they would unquestionably have cut off his retreat on Flanders.

This was the second defeat Clairfayt had sustained in contest with the left wing of the French. Their right wing on the Sambre was not equally fortunate. Commanded by several generals, who deliberated in councils of war with the representatives, Saint-Just and Lebas, it was not under such efficient direction as the two divisions led by Souham and Moreau. Kléber and Marceau, who had been transferred thither from La Vendée, might have conducted it to victory, but their opinions were little heeded. The movement prescribed for this right wing consisted in passing the Sambre, in order to advance on Mons. A first passage was attempted on the 20th Floreal (9th May), but the necessary dispositions not having been made on the opposite bank, the army was unable to maintain itself, and was obliged to repass the Sambre in disorder. On the 22d, Saint-Just insisted upon making a renewed effort, notwithstanding the failure of the first. It would have been more consistent with prudence to await the arrival of Jourdan, who, with his 45,000 men, promised to render the success of the right wing infallible. But Saint-Just would hear neither of hesitation nor delay, and implicit obedience to the fiats of the terrible pro-consul was imperative. The second endeavour to pass was equally abortive. The army certainly cleared the barrier of the Sambre for the second time; but, being again attacked on the other bank, before it could securely establish itself, it would have been utterly destroyed, had not the intrepidity of Marceau and the firmness of Kléber interposed to save it.

Thus, for a whole month, the hostile armies had contended on a field stretching from Maubeuge to the shores of the ocean, with incredible fury, but without any decisive success. The French had been victorious on the left, discomfited on the right; but in the interim their soldiers were becoming inured to action, and the bold and skilful movement prescribed to Jourdan was preparing the way for great results.

The plan originally formed by Mack could not be carried into execution. The Prussian general, Moellendorf, refused to march on the Sambre, alleging that he had no orders from his court. The English diplomatists had departed to exact explanations from the Prussian cabinet respecting the treaty of the Hague, and, meanwhile, Cobourg, menaced on one of his wings, had been constrained to dissolve his centre after the example of Pichegru. He had reinforced Kaunitz on the Sambre, and moved the bulk of his army towards Flanders to the environs of Tournay. A decisive engagement, therefore, was to be expected on the left, as the moment drew near when large masses must come in contact, and necessarily be embroiled.

At this time a project was propounded at the Austrian head-quarters, designated by its originators as "the plan of destruction," the ultimate aim of which was to cut off the French army from Lille, envelope it, and thus annihilate it. Such an operation was doubtless possible, for the allies could bring nearly 100,000 men to bear upon 70,000, but the dispositions they made to effect their purpose were somewhat singular. The French were still distributed in the following manner:—Souham and Moreau at Menin and Courtray, with 50,000 men; and Bonnaud in the vicinity of Lille, with 20,000. The allies were parcelled on the two flanks of this advanced line; Clairfayt's division to the left in West Flanders, the mass of the allies to the right towards Tournay. In this state of things, the allies resolved to make a concentric effort on Turcoing, which interposes between Menin and Courtray and Lille. Cairfayt was to march thither from West Flanders, passing by Werwick and Linselles. The generals, Von Busch, Otto, and the Duke of York, had orders to proceed thither from the opposite quarter, that is to say, from Tournay. Von Busch was directed specifically on Mouscron, Otto on Turcoing itself; and the Duke of York, pushing forward to Roubaix and Mouveaux, was to combine with Clairfayt. By this last junction, Souham and Moreau would be cut off from Lille. General Kinsky and the Archduke Charles were charged, with two strong columns, to drive Bonnaud into Lille. These dispositions, to succeed, required a combination in the movements practically impossible. The majority of these corps, be it observed, had to start from points far asunder, and Clairfayt had to penetrate through the French army.

It was fixed that these operations should be executed on the 28th Floreal (17th May). Pichegru had repaired at this critical moment to the right wing on the Sambre, in order to remedy the disasters that portion of the army had recently encountered. Souham and Moreau commanded the French in his absence. The first signal of the allies' designs was iven them by Clairfayt's march on Werwick. They instantly moved in that direction; but, on learning that the mass of the enemy was arriving on the opposite quarter, and threatening their communications, they took a prompt and judicious resolution, namely, to hasten on Turcoing, and secure that important position between Menin and Lille. Moreau remained with Vandamme's division in front of Clairfayt to impede his progress, and Souham marched on Turcoing with 45,000 men. The communications with Lille not being yet interrupted, orders could be transmitted to Bonnaud requiring him likewise to advance upon Turcoing, and to make a strenuous effort to preserve the communication of that position with Lille. The foresight of the French generals was justified by the event. Clairfayt could struggle onwards but slowly; retarded at Werwick, he failed to reach Linselles on the day assigned. General Von Busch had at first possessed himself of Mouscron, but he had afterwards experienced a slight check, and Otto, having weakened himself to succour him, remained in insufficient force at Turcoing. The Duke of York had advanced to Roubaix and Mouveaux without meeting Clairfayt as he expected, and without being able to effect the intended junction. Finally, Kinsky and the Archduke Charles only arrived near Lille late in the evening of the 28th (17th May). The following morning, the 29th, Souham pushed rapidly on Turcoing, overcame all opposition, and secured that important position. On his side, Bonnaud, marching from Lille on the Duke of York, whose province it was to plant himself between that city and Turcoing, found him scattered on an extended line. The English, although taken by surprise, attempted to resist, but the Gallic conscripts, charging with impetuosity, obliged them to recoil, and eventually to fly, throwing away their arms. The rout was so complete, that the Duke of York, scouring the plain at full gallop, owed his safety to the fleetness of his steed alone. From that moment general confusion ensued amongst the allies, and the Emperor of Germany had the mortification to behold, from the heights of Templeuve, his whole army in full retreat. During these events, the Archduke Charles, from defective information, and the difficulties of his position, had remained inactive below Lille, and Clairfayt, being stopped towards the Lys, had been compelled to retire. Such was the issue of this "plan of destruction." It bestowed on the French several thousands of prisoners, a vast quantity of warlike stores, and the renown of a great victory obtained with seventy thousand men over nearly one hundred thousand.

Pichegru arrived after the battle was won. All the allied divisions fell back on Tournay, and Clairfayt, regaining Flanders, took up his old position at Thielt. Pichegru turned this signal victory to wretched account. The allies had settled round Tournay, having their right supported on the Scheldt. The French general was seized with the whim of capturing certain supplies of forage ascending the Scheldt, and, in the prosecution of this puerile design, he drew the whole army into the hazard of an engagement. Moving towards the river, he pressed on the allies in their semicircular position of Tournay. In a short while all his corps found themselves successively embroiled on this semicircle. A most determined action was fought at Pont-à-Chin, along the banks of the Scheldt. For twelve hours a frightful carnage went on, without any possible result of moment. Seven or eight thousand men perished on both sides. The French army recoiled after having burnt a few boats, and with the partial forfeiture of that ascendancy secured to it by the battle of Turcoing.

However, the French could justly deem themselves victorious in Flanders, and the necessity imposed on Cobourg of detaching reinforcements to other points, afterwards rendered their superiority more decided. On the Sambre, Saint-Just had resolved to attempt a third passage, and to invest Charleroi; but Kaunitz, strongly reinforced, had raised the siege at the moment when, auspiciously enough, Jourdan appeared with the entire army of the Moselle. Thenceforth 90,000 men were to act on this the veritable line of operations, and to terminate the hesitations of fortune.

On the Rhine nothing important had occurred, save only, that General Moellendorf, profiting by the diminution of the French forces in that quarter, had carried the post of Kayserslautern, but had relapsed into inaction after that achievement.

Thus, up to the month of Prairial [end of May], over the wide expanse of the northern frontier, the French had not only resisted the coalition, but triumphed over it in several encounters; they had gained one important victory, and advanced on two wings into Flanders, and to the Sambre. The loss of Landrecies was insignificant when balanced with such advantages, and, above all, with those their present position insured them.

The war of La Vendée had not entirely ceased with the disaster of Savenay. Three chiefs had effected their escape, Larochejacquelein, Stofflet, and Marigny. Besides these three leaders, Charette, who, instead of passing the Loire, had seized upon the isle of Noirmoutiers, still remained in Lower Vendée. But the war had sunk into a mere series of skirmishes, and no longer gave disquietude to the republic. General Turreau had received the command of the west. He had divided the disposable army into moveable columns which scoured the country, concentrically advancing at the same time on one point. These columns hunted down the fugitive bands, and, when they were not to be found, they put in execution the decree of the convention, that is to say, burnt the forests and the villages, and ejected the population to be transported elsewhere. Several engagements had taken place, but without producing any important consequences. Haxo, after recapturing from Charette the isles of Noirmoutiers and Bouin, had, upon various occasions, nearly succeeded in taking him prisoner; but that daring partisan always escaped him, and quickly reappeared on the scene of strife with a determination equal to his address. The war itself was little more than a war of devastation. General Turreau was constrained to adopt a most cruel measure, namely, to publish an order warning the inhabitants of the hamlets to leave the country, under pain of being treated as enemies if they remained. This notification compelled them either to quit the soil whence they drew all their means of existence, or to suffer the horrors of military execution. Such are the peculiar evils of civil wars.

Brittany had become the theatre of a new species of war, that of the Chouans. That province had formerly evinced a disposition to imitate La Vendée, but the tendency to insurrection was not so general, and individuals merely, profiting by the nature of the country, had given way to predatory habits. The wrecks of the Vendéan column which had passed into Brittany subsequently swelled the number of these partisans. Their principal rendezvous was in the forest of Perche, and they traversed the province in troops of forty or fifty, sometimes attacking the gendarmerie, levying contributions on the petty communes, and committing other disorders in the name of the royal and catholic cause. But the veritable war was finished, and the only uneasiness that survived arose from those unfortunate districts being still afflicted with such deplorable calamities.

In the French colonies and at sea, the war raged with not less fury than on the continent of Europe. The rich settlement of St Domingo had been the scene of a more horrible catastrophe than any recorded in history. The white population had embraced with enthusiasm the cause of the revolution, which, as they imagined, would lead to their independence of the mother-country. The mulattoes had embraced it with equal ardour, but they anticipated other results than the independence of the colony, and aspired to the rights of citizenship from which they had been hitherto excluded. The Constituent Assembly had recognised the rights of the mulattoes; but the whites, who desired the revolution only for themselves, had raised the standard of revolt, and a civil war had commenced between the old race of the privileged and the freedmen. Taking advantage of this contest, the negroes had appeared on the scene in their turn, and announced their rising by fire and blood. They had massacred their masters and burnt their plantations. From that moment the colony became a prey to the most dreadful confusion; each party reproached the other with instigating the new enemies who had appeared, and with giving them arms. The negroes, without yet declaring for any cause, ravaged the country. Shortly, however, incited by the emissaries of the Spanish party, they pretended to serve the royal cause. To augment the disorder, the English had interfered. Part of the whites had invoked their aid in a moment of danger, and yielded to them the important fortress of Saint-Nicholas. The commissioner Santhonax, assisted by the mulattoes and a portion of the whites, resisted the invasion of the English, and ultimately perceived no other mode of repelling it than that of acknowledging the freedom of the negroes who should declare for the republic. The convention had confirmed this measure, and proclaimed by a decree all the negroes free. Thereupon, a portion of them, who advocated the royal cause, went over to the republicans; and the English, intrenched in the fortress of Saint-Nicholas, lost all hope of acquiring the possession of St Domingo, which, after a long course of desolation, was finally destined to fall under its own self-governance. Guadaloupe, after being captured and recaptured, had eventually remained to the French, but Martinique was definitively lost.

Such was the state of the colonies. On the sea, an important event had occurred, namely, the arrival of that convoy from America which had been so long expected in the French ports. The Brest squadron, numbering thirty sail, had left the harbour, as we have stated, with orders to cruise, but to avoid an engagement, unless the safety of the convoy imperiously demanded such a risk. Jean-Bon-Saint-André was on board the admiral's ship; and, as we have related, Villaret-Joyeuse had been promoted from the rank of captain to the command of the squadron; peasants who had never beheld the sea, had been transformed into mariners, and these officers and sailors of a day had been sent forth to contend with the veteran English navy. Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse weighed anchor on the 1st Prairial (20th May), and made sail towards the islands of Coves and Flores, there to await the convoy. He captured on the way several English commercial vessels, the captains whereof said to him, "You have taken us in detail, but Admiral Howe will take you in the aggregate." In sooth, that admiral was cruising along the coasts of Brittany and Normandy with thirty-three ships of the line and twelve frigates. On the 9th Prairial (28th May) the French squadron descried a fleet. The crews eagerly gazed on the horizon as the dark masses rose to view; and when they recognised the English, they uttered shouts of enthusiasm, and demanded the signal of battle with that patriotic ardour which has always distinguished the inhabitants of the French maritime provinces. Although the instructions given to the admiral authorised him to engage only in case the convoy was in jeopardy, Jean-Bon-Saint-André, himself impelled by the general enthusiasm, consented to offer battle, and allowed the necessary orders for that purpose to be given. Towards evening, a vessel of the rearguard, Le Revolutionnaire, which had slackened sail, fell foul of the English, made an obstinate resistance, lost its captain, and was obliged to be towed into Rochefort. The night prevented the action from becoming general.

The following day, the 29th May, the sun displayed the two squadrons drawn up in hostile array. The English admiral manœuvred against the French rearguard. The movement made by the French to protect it, brought on a general engagement. They, failing to manœuvre as well as their opponents, two of their vessels, L'Indomptable and Le Tyrannicide, were exposed to the attack of a superior force, but fought with the most determined courage. Villaret-Joyeuse gave the signal to succour these ships; but his orders being either misunderstood or badly executed, he advanced alone at the hazard of not being followed. Shortly, however, his example was imitated; the whole French squadron bore down on the enemy, and obliged him to retire. Unluckily, the advantage of the wind was lost; the French kept up a terrible cannonade on the English, but they were unable to pursue them. The two threatened vessels and the field of battle, at all events, remained to cheer them.

On the 30th and 31st May, a thick mist enveloped the two armaments. The French strove to draw the English to the north and west of the course the convoy was likely to take. On the 1st June (13th Prairial) the mist evaporated, and a brilliant sun gleamed upon the two fleets. The French had only twenty-six sail of the line, whereas their enemies had thirty-six. The crews again demanded to be led to combat; and it was judged expedient to gratify their ardour, in order to occupy the English, and to remove them from the course of the convoy, which lay directly over the battle-ground of the 29th May.

The battle, one of the most memorable in naval warfare, began at nine in the morning. Admiral Howe advanced in order to cut the French line. A false manœuvre of the ship La Montagne allowed him to pierce it, separate the left wing, and direct upon it his whole force. The French right wing and vanguard remained isolated. The admiral did his utmost to rally them around him to bear down on the English squadron, but he had lost the advantage of the wind, and for the space of five hours was unable to near the field of battle. In the interim, the vessels engaged in the conflict fought with extraordinary heroism. The English, superior in the art of manœuvring, were more on a level with their opponents when matched ship to ship; and they encountered a formidable resistance both to their fire and to their attempts at boarding. In the height of the action, the French vessel Le Vengeur, dismasted, half destroyed, and almost ready to founder, refused to haul down its colours, even at the risk of being buried in the waves. The English were the first to cease firing, and they retired with astonishment at so determined a resistance. They carried off six of the French fleet. On the following day, Villaret-Joyeuse, having collected his vanguard and right wing, desired to fall upon them and reconquer their prizes. The English, being greatly damaged, would have perhaps yielded an easy victory. Jean-Bon-Saint-André, however, opposed the renewal of the battle, notwithstanding the ardour of the crews. The English were consequently enabled quietly to regain their ports. They returned home surprised at their victory, and impressed with admiration for the bravery of their inexperienced adversaries. At the same time, the main object of this terrible contest was accomplished. Admiral Venstabel had crossed, during the engagement of the 1st of June, the battle-field of the 29th May (10th Prairial), found it strewed with wrecks, and entered the French harbours in safety.

Thus, victorious on the Pyrenees and the Alps, formidable in the Low Countries, heroic at sea, and sufficiently powerful to dispute a naval victory with the English, the French commenced the campaign of 1794 in the most brilliant and glorious manner.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

DOMESTIC STATE OF FRANCE AT THE BEGINNING OF 1794.—POLITICAL PERSECUTIONS.—ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE ROBESPIERRE AND COLLOT D'HERBOIS.—DOMINATION OF ROBESPIERRE.—FESTIVAL TO THE SUPREME BEING.—EXECUTIONS AT PARIS AND ELSEWHERE.—DROWNINGS IN THE LOIRE.—RUPTURE IN THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE, AND RETIREMENT OF ROBESPIERRE.

WHILST the republic was thus victorious externally, its domestic condition had ceased not to be one of suffering and violence. The evils that afflicted it were unchanged in character; their causes were still the assignats, the maximum, the scarcity of provisions, the law of the suspected, and the revolutionary tribunals.

The difficulties arising from the necessity of regulating all the transactions of commerce, had been constantly accumulating. It had been found indispensable to introduce frequent modifications into the law of the maximum; first, twine and rope had to be excepted from its provisions, and allowed ten per cent. above the scale of prices; then pins, cambrics, lawns, muslins, gauze, thread and silk lace, silk and silken stuffs. And whilst a variety of articles were thus imperatively excepted from the operation of the maximum, it became equally urgent to include others within its stringent purposes. Thus, the price of horses having risen to an excessive height, their value was, in obedience to the presumed exigency, fixed according to their size and breeding. From such expedients the same inconvenience always resulted: trade stagnated, the markets were unfrequented, or rather clandestine sales were effected, and authority was quite powerless against such consequences. If the government had, by means of assignats, been enabled to realise the value of the national domains, and by means of the maximum to convert assignats into a current and corresponding medium of exchange, it could have no mode of preventing the secretion of commodities, or their being withheld from purchasers. Accordingly, we find incessant complaints were raised against dealers for secluding themselves and their goods from the usual marts, or for closing their stores.

Less apprehension was felt this year, however, than during the last, as to a deficiency of food. The convoys arrived from North America, and an abundant harvest, had provided a sufficient quantity of corn for the consumption of France. The committee, wielding administration in all details with equal vigour, had ordained that an account of the harvest should be taken under charge of the committee for supplies and provisions, and that an adequate portion of the grain should be forthwith threshed to meet the demand in the markets. Fears having been entertained lest the shearers, who were accustomed to migrate into the corn provinces, might exact high wages, the committee declared that all male and female citizens known to seek employment in harvest labour, were in forced requisition, and that their wages should be settled by the local authorities. Shortly thereafter, the journeymen bakers and butchers having struck work, the committee adopted a more general measure, and placed in requisition all operatives of every description engaged in the manipulation, the transport, and the sale of articles deemed of prime necessity.

The supply of meat was a subject attended with infinitely greater difficulty and anxiety. In Paris, especially, an extraordinary scarcity had long prevailed, and, since the time when the Hébertists had attempted to profit by that dearth to excite a commotion, the evil had progressively increased. It was eventually found necessary to place the inhabitants of Paris on rations. The commission for supplies and provisions fixed the daily consumption at 75 oxen, 150 hundredweight of veal and mutton, and 200 pigs. It procured the requisite number of animals, and sent them to the hospital of L'Humanité, which was assigned as the general and only authorised slaughter-house. The butchers nominated by each section repaired thither to obtain the carcasses apportioned to them, the amount whereof was regulated according to the population they had to serve. They were directed to distribute, every fifth day, half a pound of flesh per head to each family. In this arrangement, the tickets issued by the revolutionary committees for the purchase of bread, and which contained the number of individuals composing each family, were likewise to be used. To avoid tumults and long vigils, all resort to the shambles of the butchers before six in the morning was prohibited.

The insufficiency of these regulations was soon made manifest. As we have already stated, clandestine butcher-markets had been previously established, and now they became daily more numerous. Cattle no longer arrived at the markets of Neubourg, Poissy, and Sceaux; the country dealers forestalled them on the way, and even proceeded to the grazing farms in quest of them. Relying on the apathy of the rural communes in the execution of the law, those dealers sold above the maximum, and more plentifully supplied the inhabitants of the large towns, and particularly those of Paris, who were not contented with the half pound distributed every fifth day. In this manner the country butchers entirely engrossed the trade of their city brethren, whose occupation had dwindled into an occasional division of rations. Several of the latter, indeed, demanded a law enabling them to cancel their tenancies. Hence it became necessary to promulgate additional ordinances to prevent cattle from being intercepted in their progress to market, and proprietors of pasturage-lands were subjected to declarations and formalities extremely irksome and vexatious. Still more minute provisions had to be made for wants of a different character: wood and charcoal ceasing to arrive on account of the maximum, suspicions of regrating were engendered, and an inhibition was issued against any individual having in his possession more than four loads of wood and two loads of charcoal.

The new government met all the difficulties which entangled its career with extraordinary activity. Whilst framing these multifarious regulations, it was occupied with projects for reforming agriculture, and altering the law of landlord and tenant as to distraints on land, and for introducing improved modes of mixing soils, preparing artificial meadows, and rearing cattle. It decreed the formation of botanical gardens in all the departmental capitals, in order to naturalise exotic plants, create nurseries for all kinds of trees, and institute agricultural lectureships for the behoof, and adapted to the capacity, of farmers; it enjoined the general draining of marshes, upon a vast and well-conceived plan, determining that the state should make advances for so great an undertaking, and that the proprietors whose lands were drained and fertilised, should pay a tax, or surrender their ownership for a fixed equivalent; it invited all architects to present plans for building villages out of the ruins of lordly mansions; it ordered embellishments in the garden of the Tuilleries, to render it more acceptable to the public; and, lastly, it called upon artists to submit a scheme for changing the opera-house into a covered arena, where the people might assemble in winter.

Thus, then, the government executed, or, at all events, essayed, almost every thing at once: so true it is that when much is to be performed, the greater is the capacity for effecting much. The state of the finances was not the least difficult or anxious of its cares. We have stated what methods were adopted in the month of August 1793 to restore the credit of assignats, by withdrawing them in part from circulation. The thousand millions abstracted by the forced loan, and the victories which terminated the campaign of 1793, enhanced them considerably, and, as we have already intimated, they nearly reached to par, from the effect of those terrible enactments which rendered the possession of specie so full of danger. However, that apparent prosperity was not of long continuance; the assignats had a speedy relapse, and the quantity of emissions ensured their accelerated decline. A portion of them certainly returned in the shape of purchase-money for the national domains, but to an amount quite insufficient to balance the issue. Yet these domains were sold above the valuation, which was not at all surprising, for the valuation had been calculated in money, and the payments were made in assignats; whereby it came to pass that the price was in reality far below, although in semblance much beyond, the estimate. Besides, that mode of absorbing assignats could not be otherwise than slow, whereas the emission was necessarily immense and prompt. Twelve hundred thousand men to pay and arm, parks of artillery to found, and a navy to construct, with a depreciated paper, required enormous quantities of the discredited medium, which, having become the sole available resource, and the mass of hypothecated property, moreover, being daily augmented by confiscations, was used resignedly to the full extent exigency demanded. The distinction between the ordinary and extraordinary exchequer was abrogated, the first of which had been set apart for the receipt of taxes, the latter for the creation of assignats. The two kinds of resources were confounded, and whenever the necessity arose, the revenue was eked out by fresh emissions. At the commencement of 1794 (year 2), the sum-total of issues had been doubled. Nearly four thousand millions had been added to the amount previously in existence, raising the whole to about eight thousand millions. Deducting the quantity returned and burned, and the stock not yet disbursed, there remained in actual circulation five thousand five hundred and thirty-six millions (two hundred and thirty millions sterling). In Messidor, year 2 (June 1794), the convention decreed the fabrication of an additional thousand millions (forty-two millions sterling) of assignats, in values varying from 1000 francs (£41, 13s. 4d.) to 15 sous (7½d). The finance committee, furthermore, had again recourse to a forced loan on the rich. The lists of the previous year were made use of, and on those who were therein enrolled, was levied an extraordinary war contribution to the amount of one-tenth of the former loan, that is to say, one hundred millions. That sum was imposed upon them not as an advance to be reimbursed, but as an impost to be paid by them without return.

To complete the institution of the great book, and the project of rendering the public debt uniform, it remained to capitalise the annuities and convert them into an inscription. These annuities, of every kind and form, gave rise to the most complicated jobbing; like the old obligations on the state, they had the inconvenience of resting on a royal title, and obtaining a marked preference over the republican engagements; for it was constantly repeated, that if the republic consented to pay the debts of the monarchy, the monarchy would refuse to acknowledge those of the republic. Cambon, therefore, consummated his great work, the regeneration of the debt, by proposing and carrying the law which capitalised the annuities; it provided, also, that the documents of title should be delivered up by the notaries, and afterwards burned, according to the plan adopted with regard to the old obligations. The capital originally advanced by the annuitant was converted into an inscription, and charged with a perpetual interest of five per cent. instead of a life-annuity. At the same time, out of regard for the aged and poorer recipients, who had hoped to double their incomes by purchasing annuities, moderate claims were allowed to their full extent, with reference to the age of the individuals. Thus, persons between forty and fifty years old were left to enjoy annuities ranging from 1500 to 2000 francs; those between fifty and sixty, annuities ranging from 3000 to 4000 francs; and so on to the age of one hundred, and to the amount of 10,500 francs. If the annuitant comprehended in any of these classes were entitled to draw a sum exceeding the prescribed rate, the surplus was capitalised. It was barely possible to have evinced greater consideration for old age and small fortunes than did the legislature in this instance; yet it is a fact that scarcely any law gave rise to more bitter complaints and remonstrances, and the convention encountered, for this measure, so fraught with wisdom and humanity, a higher degree of censure than for all the other measures which daily signalised its terrible dictatorship. The stock-brokers were incensed because the decree required, for the substantiation of claims, certificates of existence. The holders of emigrants' bonds could not easily procure such certificates; hence the brokers, who were affected by this condition, raised a prodigious clamour in the name of the old and the infirm, and exclaimed that neither age nor poverty was respected. They attempted to persuade the annuitants, moreover, that they would not be paid, as the operation and the formalities it enjoined must lead to interminable delays; which, however, was not the case. Cambon introduced certain modifications into the decree, and by dint of unremitting superintendence at the office of the exchequer, hurried the work to completion with the utmost promptitude. The claimants, who were not mere jobbers on the investments of others, but lived on their own legitimate incomes, were immediately satisfied; and, as Barrère stated, instead of awaiting their turn for payment in open courts, exposed to the intemperature of the weather, they attended in the warm and sheltered apartments of the exchequer.

Accompanying these beneficial reforms, the course of cruelty swept on more impetuously than ever. The law expelling ex-nobles from Paris and all fortified and maritime towns, occasioned infinite distress. Now, that nobility was a calamitous appendage, it had become equally difficult to distinguish genuine nobles as in the days when it was an esteemed privilege. Plebeian females married to nobles, and left in widowhood, purchasers of offices who had assumed aristocratic designations, claimed to be exempted from a distinction they had once eagerly coveted. Consequently, that enactment afforded boundless scope for arbitrary treatment and tyrannical vexations.

The representatives on missions exercised their authority with extreme rigour, and some amongst them gave way to extravagant and monstrous cruelties. At Paris, the prisons were daily more crowded with captives. The committee of general safety had instituted a police which carried terror into every quarter. The chief thereof was a man named Héron, who had under his direction a swarm of agents fully worthy of such a leader. They were, as their usual title intimated, order-bearers from the committees. Certain of them performed the functions of spies; others, furnished with secret orders, often even with blank orders, prowled around to make arrests both in Paris and in the departments. An allowance was granted them for each such enterprise, and they exacted money from the prisoners besides, thus aggravating cruelty by rapine. All the adventurers disbanded from the revolutionary army, and dismissed from the ministry of Bouchotte, had passed into this new occupation, and become more formidable than before. They crept in every where, into theatres, coffee-houses, and public promenades; the dread of being marked or overheard by one of these inquisitors weighed on every mind. Through their instrumentality the number of the "suspected" had swelled in Paris alone to seven or eight thousand. The prisons no longer presented the same scenes as heretofore; the spectacle was no longer witnessed of the wealthy contributing for the poor, or of men differing widely in opinions and ranks leading a comparatively agreeable life upon an expenditure in common, and mitigating the rigours of captivity by recreations in the arts. That system had been deemed too lenient for those who were stigmatised as aristocrats; malignant assertions had been propagated that luxury and abundance reigned with the suspected, whilst the people were reduced to rations, and that the rich prisoners amused themselves by wasting provisions which might have served to feed the indigent patriots; wherefore it had been determined that the prison discipline should be altered. Accordingly, general refectories and tables were established; at fixed hours, and in large rooms, a detestable and unwholesome regimen was administered to the immured, for which they were, furthermore, dearly charged. The privilege of buying food in lieu of that they were unable to eat, was entirely abrogated. Moreover, their persons were searched, and their assignats abstracted, whereby any possibility of procuring alleviations was debarred. Finally, the liberty of enjoying intercourse amongst themselves was denied, and to the afflictions of solitary confinement were added the terrors of sudden death, for the thirst of blood was hourly becoming more urgent and insatiate. The revolutionary tribunal had begun, since the trial of the Hébertists and Dantonists, to immolate victims in bands of twenty at a time. It had condemned the Malesherbes family and its kinsmen, to the number of fifteen or twenty persons. The venerable head of that house had proceeded to execution with the serenity and cheerfulness of a sage. Making a false step as he walked to the scaffold, he had exclaimed, "That false step is of bad augury; a Roman would have returned home." The Malesherbes had been followed by twenty-two members of the parliament. Almost the entire parliament of Toulouse was exterminated. Lastly, the farmers-general had been recently brought to trial on account of their old contracts with the royal treasury. Proof was adduced that these contracts contained stipulations onerous to the state, and the revolutionary tribunal sent them to the guillotine for by-past exactions on tobacco, salt, &c. Amongst the number was a man illustrious in the annals of science, the chemist Lavoisier, who in vain solicited a few days' reprieve to digest a discovery.

The impulse was given; administering, fighting, and slaughtering, proceeded in fearful combination. The committees, planted in the centre, distinguished their sway by an uniform uninterrupted vigour. The convention, still awed to silence, granted pensions to the widows and children of soldiers who had died for their country, reviewed judgments pronounced by the tribunals, explained decrees, regulated the exchange of sundry parcels of the domains, and, in short, attended to affairs of a trifling and purely accessory nature. Barrère appeared before it almost daily to recite accounts of victories. He usually styled these reports carmagnoles. At the end of each month he intimated, for the sake of form, that the powers of the committees had expired, and that they needed renewal. On such occasions he was answered, with applauding shouts, that the committees had merely to prosecute their patriotic labours. Sometimes, indeed, he omitted the formality, without his negligence affecting the authority of the committees.

It is during such periods, marked by an universal absolute submission, that exacerbated minds revolt, and that despotism has most to dread the stroke of the assassin. There was then at Paris a man employed as an attendant at the national lottery office, who had formerly been in the service of several eminent families, and who was actuated with a deadly hatred against the existing system of things. He was fifty years of age, and called Ladmiral. He had formed the design of assassinating one of the most influential members of the committee of public welfare, Robespierre or Collot-d'Herbois. For some time he had resided in the same house as Collot-d'Herbois, in the street Favart, still hesitating between Collot and Robespierre. On the 3d Prairial (22d May), having then determined to select Robespierre, he repaired to the committee of public welfare, and waited the whole day in the gallery leading to the room in which the committee sat. Failing to encounter his intended victim, he returned home, and stationed himself on the staircase, with the view of smiting Collot-d'Herbois. Towards midnight Collot entered, and, as he was ascending the stairs, Ladmiral snapped a pistol at his head. The pistol missed fire. Ladmiral presented it a second time, and the weapon again defeated his design. A third time he repeated the trial, when at length the charge went off, but merely lodged in the wall. A struggle immediately ensued. Collot-d'Herbois uttered vehement shouts of "murder!" Fortunately for him, a body of patrol was passing in the street, who hastened towards the noise. Ladmiral took to flight, mounted to his apartment, and barricaded the door. The patrol followed him, and attempted to force an entrance. He gave warning that he was armed, and would fire on any who should venture to present themselves. The menace was disregarded by the patrol. The door was broken in; a locksmith, named Geffroy, led the way into the room, and received a musket shot which almost mortally wounded him. Ladmiral was instantly arrested and conducted to prison. Being interrogated by Fouquier-Tinville, he recounted the particulars of his life, and avowed his purpose, detailing the attempts he had made to dispatch Robespierre before assailing Collot-d'Herbois. He was asked who had urged him to commit the crime. He replied with firmness that it was not a crime, but a service he had desired to render his country; that he alone had conceived the project without any foreign suggestion; and that his only regret arose from his failure in the execution.

The report of this attack circulated with rapidity; and, according to custom, it tended to strengthen the power of those against whom it was directed. Barrère hastened to the convention the following day, the 4th Prairial, to render an account of this new machination of Pitt. "The internal factions," he said, "have never ceased to correspond with that government, the trafficker in coalitions, the suborner of assassinations, which pursues liberty as its greatest enemy. Whilst we make justice and virtue the order of the day, the allied tyrants make crime and assassination the order of the day. On all sides you encounter the fatal genius of the Englishman; in our markets, in our purchases, on the seas, on the continent, in the petty courts of Europe, and in our cities. The same head directed the hands which murdered Basseville in Rome, the French sailors in the port of Genoa, the faithful Frenchmen in Corsica; the same head directed the knife against Lepelletier and Marat, the guillotine against Chalier, and the pistol against Collot d'Herbois." Barrère produced letters from London and Holland, which had been intercepted, announcing that the designs of Pitt were levelled at the committees, and particularly at Robespierre. One of these letters stated in substance, "We greatly dread the influence of Robespierre. The more the French republican government is concentrated, the greater will be its force, and the more difficult to subvert."

This manner of presenting the facts was eminently fitted to excite a lively interest in favour of the committees, and especially of Robespierre, and to identify their preservation with that of the republic. Barrère subsequently related the event in all its details, commended the "affecting zeal" shown by the constituted authorities in protecting the national representation, and extolled in hyperbolical terms the conduct of citizen Geffroy, who had received a dangerous wound in seizing the assassin. The convention greeted Barrère's report with loud acclamations; it ordered rigorous inquiries to ascertain whether Ladmiral had accomplices or not, passed a vote of thanks to citizen Geffroy, and directed, as a means of compensating him for his sufferings, that the bulletin of his health should be daily read from the tribune. Couthon afterwards delivered a furious harangue in support of a motion that Barrère's report should be translated into all languages, and disseminated in all lands. "Pitt, Cobourg, and all ye base and petty tyrants," he exclaimed, "who regard the world as your heritage, and who, in the last moments of your agony, are struggling with such desperation, whet—whet your daggers; we contemn you too much to fear you, and you know well we are too noble to imitate you!" The hall resounded with plaudits. Couthon subjoined—"But the law, whose reign terrifies you, has its sword suspended over your heads; it will smite you all! The human race has need of such an example, and the heaven whom you outrage has ordained it!"

At this instant Collot-d'Herbois entered, doubtless to enjoy the flattering notice of the assembly. He was hailed with enthusiastic transports, which almost drowned his voice when he essayed to speak. Robespierre, infinitely more astute, abstained at the moment from any public appearance, and seemed to shun the incense awaiting him.

During that same day, a young female, by name Cecile Renault, knocked at Robespierre's door with a packet under her arm. She requested to see him, and urgently insisted upon being introduced to his presence, alleging that a public functionary ought always to receive with alacrity those who demanded an interview, and even heaping reproaches on the Duplaix, in whose house Robespierre dwelt, when they declined to admit her. The girl's earnestness and strange manner created suspicions: she was seized and delivered to the police. Her parcel was opened, and found to contain raiment and two knives. The deduction was instantaneous that she had intended to assassinate Robespierre. She underwent an interrogatory, wherein she displayed equal assurance with Ladmiral. To the inquiry, what she wanted with Robespierre, she replied, her object was to see how a tyrant was made. More closely pressed, questioned as to the packet and its contents, she stated she had entertained no design of using the knives, and had provided herself with the clothes because she expected to be conveyed to prison, and from the prison to the guillotine. She added, she was a royalist, as she preferred one king to fifty thousand. Being further examined, and harassed with additional questions, she refused to answer, and demanded to be led to the scaffold.

The proofs were held sufficient to establish the conclusion that the girl Renault was one of the assassins employed against Robespierre. The belief was corroborated by another incident. At Choisy-sur-Seine, a citizen seated in a coffee-room chanced to narrate the circumstances of the attempt on Collot-d'Herbois' life, and to express his joy that it had not succeeded. A monk named Saintonax, who listened to the recital, remarked, that it was unfortunate these miscreants in the committee had escaped, but that sooner or later they would be struck, as he hoped. The man was forthwith pinioned, and removed the same night to Paris. No doubt could now exist, had there been any previous sceptics, that the plot had vast ramifications; assertions were confidently made that a band of assassins was already marshalled, intent upon their project; the members of the committee were assiduously surrounded, and entreated to be careful of themselves, to preserve lives so precious to the country. The sections assembled, and once more sent deputations and addresses to the convention. They averred, that amid all the miracles vouchsafed by Providence in favour of the republic, the recent escape of Robespierre and Collot-d'Herbois from the designs of assassins was the most signal. One of them even proposed to furnish a guard of twenty-five men to watch over the safety of the members of the committee.

On the second day afterwards occurred the usual meeting of the Jacobins. Robespierre and Collot-d'Herbois repaired to the club, and were received with a delirium of enthusiasm. When power has succeeded in enforcing universal submission, it has merely to allow abject minds to follow their innate tendencies, for such hasten of their own accord to rivet the chains of thraldom, and prostitute divine honours to the idol of the day. Robespierre and Collot-d'Herbois were viewed with eager curiosity. "Behold these precious men," exclaimed an orator; "the God of freemen has saved them; he has covered them with his shield, and preserved them to the republic! They must be made to partake the honours France has decerned to the martyrs of liberty; she will thus have the satisfaction of honouring them, without having to mourn over their funeral urn." *

Collot first rose to speak, with his accustomed impetuosity, and affirmed that the emotion he felt at the moment proved to him how sweet it was to serve his country, even at the hazard of the direst peril. "I gather this truth," he said, "that he who has incurred some danger for his country derives fresh strength from the fraternal interest he inspires. Those kindly cheers are a new bond of union amongst strong minds. The tyrants, reduced to the last gasp, and perceiving their end approach, strive in vain to employ daggers, poison, snares: the republicans are not to be intimidated. Are these tyrants not aware, that when a patriot expires beneath their blows, it is on his tomb that the patriots who survive him swear vengeance for the crime, and obtest the eternity of liberty?"

Collot concluded amidst vociferous applause. Bentabolle moved that the president give Collot and Robespierre the fraternal embrace in the name of the whole society. Legendre, with the zeal of a man who had been Danton's friend, and was obliged to efface that recollection by odious sycophancy, asserted, "that the hand of crime had been raised to smite virtue, but that the God of nature had interposed to prevent the accomplishment of the enormity." He urged the citizens to form a guard around the members of the committee, and offered himself as the first to watch over their inestimable lives. At this instant, certain sections craved admittance into the hall; an extraordinary eagerness was evinced by them, but the crowd within the precincts was so great, that the favour could not be granted, and they had to content themselves with clustering around the doorways.

Here the committee was offered the insignia of sovereign power at an admirable moment for rejecting them. Sagacious leaders will be satisfied to provoke the tender, and reap the merit of a refusal. The members of the committee present at the sitting combated the proposition of assigning them guards with well-feigned indignation. Couthon hurried to the tribune. "He was astonished," he said, "at the suggestion which had just been propounded to the Jacobin Club, and which had already been submitted to the convention. He was disposed, unquestionably, to attribute it to the purest motives; but it was only despots who surrounded themselves with guards, and the members of the committee had no wish to be assimilated with despots. They had no need of guards to defend them. Virtue, the confidence of the people, and Providence, watched over their days; they wanted no other guarantees for their safety. Moreover, they would always know how to die at their posts and for the cause of liberty."

Legendre essayed to justify his proposition. He asserted that he had not intended precisely to give an organised guard to the members of the committee, but merely to urge all good citizens to watch over their lives; that his motives were pure, but that if he had been misled, he was willing to retract. Robespierre succeeded him in the tribune, his first appearance therein since the recent occurrences. Vehement plaudits broke from the assembly, and long continued to resound: ultimately, silence was restored, and Robespierre permitted to proceed. "I am one of those," he said, "whom the events that have lately passed necessarily interest in a very remote degree, but I cannot prevent myself from making a few reflections. Let the champions of liberty be marks for the poniards of tyranny; it is to be expected! I said long ago, if we discomfit our enemies, if we foil the factions, we shall be assassinated. What I foresaw has happened; the tyrants' soldiers have bitten the dust, the traitors have perished on the scaffold, and daggers have been pointed against us. I know not what impression these events may have made on you, but I will avow what they have produced on me. I have felt that it was more easy to murder us than to subdue our principles and vanquish our armies. I have thought within myself, that the more uncertain and precarious may be the life of the people's defenders, the more zealously should they labour to consume their last days in actions beneficial to liberty. I, who believe not in the necessity of living, but simply in virtue and in Providence, find myself occupying a position in which the assassins unquestionably had no desire to place me; I feel myself more independent than ever of the iniquity of men. The crimes of tyrants and the blades of assassins have rendered me more free to act, more redoubtable against the enemies of the people; my soul is more eager than ever to grapple with traitors, and tear from them the mask they have dared to assume. Frenchmen, friends of equality, trust us to employ the short existence vouchsafed us by Providence in combating the enemies who encompass us!" Redoubled acclamations were elicited by this harangue, and from all parts of the hall effusions of rapture were lavished. After enjoying this enthusiasm for a while, Robespierre again raised his voice to controvert a member of the society who had moved that civic honours be paid to Geffroy. He classed this motion with the one submitted for giving guards to the members of the committees, and maintained that such motions were designed to excite envy and obloquy against the government, by loading it with superfluous honours. In consequence whereof he proposed, and the society ratified, a sentence of expulsion upon the individual who had advocated civic honours for Geffroy.

From the height of power it had attained, prudence warned the committee to discard all outward symbols of sovereignty. It wielded an absolute dictatorship, but the fact must not be made too palpable; all the trappings and pomp of power could only tend to endanger its stability. An ambitious soldier, raised to supremacy by his sword, and coveting a throne, hastens to invest his authority with an imposing character as early as he dare, and to add the insignia of power to power itself; but the leaders of a party, who govern that party merely by their influence, and who desire to remain masters of it, must still continue to flatter it, constantly attribute to it the sway they enjoy, and, whilst ruling it in all things, seem to obey it only.

The members of the committee of public welfare, the leaders of the Mountain, were debarred by powerful considerations from any obvious isolation as respected that faction or the convention at large, but, on the contrary, felt it incumbent to repudiate all that might appear to elevate them too highly above their colleagues. Already, dissatisfaction was brooding, and the extent of their power generating alarm even in their own party. Already they were viewed as dictators, and Robespierre, above all, from his commanding influence, began to attract odium. It had become usual to say, not "the committee so wills," but "Robespierre so wills." Fouquier-Tinville was wont to tell any individual whom he threatened with the revolutionary tribunal, "If Robespierre desires it, you will go there." The agents of the government invariably named Robespierre in their operations, and seemed to invoke him as the source whence all orders emanated. The sufferers failed not to charge all their calamities on him, and in the prisons one oppressor only was recognised—Robespierre. Even foreigners in their proclamations called the French soldiers "the soldiers of Robespierre." That expression occurred in a manifesto of the Duke of York. Deeply sensible how dangerous was this abuse of his name, Robespierre promptly repaired to the convention, and delivered a discourse for the purpose of repelling what he designated perfidious insinuations, the object of which was to ruin him in public estimation. He repeated it at the Jacobin Club, and drew all the applause wherewith his words were sure to be hailed. The Journal of the Mountain and the Moniteur having the following day copied the speech, with an observation that it was a masterpiece whereof any analysis was impossible, because "every word told with the force of a sentence, every sentence with the force of a page," he was highly incensed, and proceeded forthwith to the Jacobin Club to complain of the journals which, he alleged, insidiously extolled the members of the committee, in order to cover them with obloquy, by investing them with the attributes of omnipotence. The editors were obliged to publish a recantation, and an apology for having praised Robespierre, albeit asseverating that their motives were most pure.

Robespierre had abundant vanity, but a mind not sufficiently great to be ambitious. Fond of flattery and homage, he greedily exacted them, justifying himself at all times by assurances that he had no desire for power. He had around him a species of court composed of sundry men, but more numerously of women, who lavished on him the most delicate attentions. Always besieging his residence, these females testified an earnest and constant solicitude for his person; they never ceased to commend his virtue, his eloquence, and his genius; they styled him a divine man, above humanity. An old marchioness was the chief personage amongst these women, who tended like genuine devotees the sanguinary and arrogant pontiff. The zealotry of women is invariably the surest symptom of public infatuation. Theirs is the province, by exaggerated sedulousness and hyperbolical phrases, to provide an effectual antidote, in the guise of ridicule, as it would seem.

In addition to the creatures who adored Robespierre, there existed an absurd and fantastic sect but recently formed. At the period when religious worship was abolished, sects sprung up in all quarters, because the inherent craving for objects of faith sought to feed itself with new illusions, in lieu of the doctrines which were proscribed. An aged female, whose brain had become disordered in the vaults of the Bastille, and who was known under the name of Catherine Théot, affirmed herself to be the mother of God, and announced the speedy coming of a new Messiah. He was, she taught, to appear amidst universal ruin, and, at the moment of his advent, the elect were to enter upon an eternal life. These elect were enjoined to disseminate their creed by all expedients, and to exterminate the enemies of the true God. The Carthusian, Dom Gerle, who had figured in the Constituent Assembly, and whose weak imagination had been bewildered in mystic reveries, was one of two prophets; Robespierre was the other. His deism had probably secured him that distinction. Catherine Théot delighted to call him her beloved son; the initiated regarded him with reverence, and beheld in his person a supernatural being, appointed to mysterious and sublime destinies. In all likelihood he was acquainted with their folly, and secretly enjoyed their delusion, without committing himself as an associate. It is certain that he had protected Dom Gerle, received frequent visits from him, and given him a certificate of civism, avouched by his own signature, to shield him from the persecutions of a revolutionary committee. This sect counted numerous votaries: it had a peculiar form of worship and ceremonies, which not a little contributed to its propagation. It was accustomed to assemble at the house of Catherine Théot, in a secluded quarter of Paris, near the Pantheon. There proselytes were initiated, in the presence of the mother of God herself, Dom Gerle, and the principal elders. The sect was creeping into notoriety, and a vague rumour prevailed that Robespierre was in its belief a prophet. Thus all things conspired at once to exalt and compromise him.

It was more particularly amongst his immediate colleagues that umbrage began to be taken. Divisions had been already manifested, as was natural; for the power of the committee being established, the period for rivalries had arrived. The committee was separated into several distinct groups. The death of Herault-Séchelles had reduced to eleven the twelve members who originally composed it. Jean-Bon-Saint-André and Prieur-de-la-Marne had been constantly employed on missions. Carnot was exclusively occupied with the war department, Prieur de la Côté-d'Or with the commissariat department, and Robert Lindet with superintending supplies of food. These three were called examination men. They took no part either in political matters or in personal contentions. Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, had formed a close alliance. A certain superiority of mind and manners, the great importance they seemed to arrogate, and the contempt they appeared to entertain for their remaining colleagues, had conduced to isolate them: they were styled the men of the high hand. In their eyes, Barrère was a weak and pusillanimous being, endowed with the ready faculty of serving any cause; Collot-d'Herbois a mere club declaimer; and Billaud-Varennes a mediocre, surly, and envious personage. These three latter could not overlook their ill-concealed disdain. Barrère dared give no outward token of his feelings; but Collot-d'Herbois, and especially Billaud, who was of an impetuous character, were unable to dissemble the hatred corroding in their breasts. They sought to derive support from their colleagues, the men of examination, and to range them on their side. They might reasonably hope for aid, too, on the part of the committee of general safety, which was beginning to evince irritation under the supremacy of the committee of public welfare. Specifically limited to matters of police, and frequently superintended or controlled in its operations by the committee of public welfare, the committee of general safety endured its dependence with visible impatience. Amar, Vadier, Vouland, Jagot, and Louis of the Lower Rhine, its most obdurate members, were those most disposed to shake off the humiliating yoke. Two of their colleagues, who were called the listeners, watched them on behalf of Robespierre, and they found this system of espionnage insufferable. The malecontents of both committees might therefore coalesce and become dangerous to Robespierre, Couthon, and Saint-Just. Here we may remark, that a strife founded on rivalry in pride and power occasioned the division, and not a difference of political opinion; for Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, Vadier, Vouland, Amar, Jagot, and Louis, were not less uncompromising revolutionists than the three redoubtable adversaries they desired to supplant.

A circumstance tended still more to incense the committee of general safety against the predominant members of the committee of public welfare. Numerous complaints were made concerning the arrests, which daily became more multifarious, and which were frequently marked by injustice, being executed against individuals known as excellent patriots; especially, the exactions and intolerable tyranny of the numberless agents to whom the committee of general safety had delegated its inquisitorial powers, gave rise to piteous remonstrances. Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, not venturing to attempt the abolition or the reconstruction of that committee, conceived the plan of instituting a police department within the pale of the committee of public welfare. This scheme, without altogether abrogating the committee of general safety, was calculated to intrench upon its functions, and practically absorb them. Saint-Just was intended to have the direction of this department; but being called to the army, he could not undertake the task, and Robespierre assumed the office in his stead. The police department liberated those whom the committee of general safety caused to be arrested, and the latter retorted in a corresponding manner. This usurpation of functions provoked an open rupture. Rumours of the dissension crept abroad; and, despite the secrecy which shrouded the government, the fact that its members were at variance soon became known.

In the convention, likewise, dissatisfaction of an equally serious character prevailed. It was still silent and abject; but certain of its members, who had become alarmed for themselves, were inspirited into hardihood by their danger. These were chiefly former friends of Danton, compromised by their ties with him, and sometimes menaced as relics of the party of corruptionists and indulgents. Sundry of them had transgressed in the execution of official duties, and naturally abhorred the application of the system of virtue; others had betokened repugnance to the employment of rigour on so magnified a scale. The most compromised amongst them was Tallien. It was affirmed that he had been guilty of malversations at the commune when a member thereof, and at Bordeaux when there on a mission. It was hinted, moreover, that in the last-named town he had allowed himself to be mollified and seduced by a young and beautiful female, who had accompanied him to Paris, and been recently cast into prison. Next to Tallien stood Bourdon-de-l'Oise, committed by his contest with the party of Saumur, and expelled from the Jacobin society conjunctly with Fabre, Camille, and Philippeaux. Then came Thuriot, likewise excluded from the club of Jacobins; Legendre, who, notwithstanding his obsequious deportment, could not obtain forgiveness for his old relations with Danton; finally, Fréron, Barras, Lecointre, Rovère, Monestier, Panis, &c.—all either associates of Danton or reprobators of the system pursued by the government. These personal anxieties were communicated, and the number of the malecontents was daily augmented. Thus, in the convention were many prepared to unite with such of the members of either committee as should cultivate their alliance.

The 20th Prairial (8th June) approached: it was the day fixed for the festival to the Supreme Being. On the 16th, the election of a president occurred: the convention with one accord nominated Robespierre as the occupant of the chair, whereby the principal part in the ceremony of the 20th was secured to him. His colleagues, we perceive, still sought to flatter and conciliate him by a show of deference and honour. Vast preparations for the occasion had been made, conformably to the plan conceived by David. The festival was to be on a magnificent scale. The sun broke forth, on the morning of the 20th, in all his splendour. The multitude, ever prompt to attend the spectacles vouchsafed by authority, thronged early to the scene. Robespierre kept the assembly waiting a considerable period. At length he appeared amidst the convention. He was elaborately attired; on his head he wore a plume of feathers, and in his hand he held, like the other representatives, a bouquet of flowers, fruits, and wheaten ears. On his countenance, usually so sombre, sparkled a joy of most unwonted character. An amphitheatre had been erected in the middle of the garden of the Tuileries. The convention occupied it; on the right and the left were clustered several groups of children, youths, old men, and women. The infantine were crowned with violet, the adolescent with myrtle, the virile with oak, the veteran with vine and olive. The women held their daughters by the hand, and carried baskets of flowers. In front of the amphitheatre were displayed figures representing Atheism, Discord, and Selfishness. They were destined to be consumed by fire. The moment the convention had taken its place, a strain of music opened the ceremony. The president delivered a preliminary discourse on the object of the festival. "Republican Frenchmen," he said, "the ever fortunate day, consecrated by the French people to the Supreme Being, has at length arrived. Never did the world he created offer him a spectacle so worthy his contemplation. He has beheld tyranny, crime, and imposture, reigning on the earth: at the present moment he beholds an entire nation, contending against all the oppressors of the human race, suspend the course of its heroic labours, to elevate its voice and mind towards the Great Being who has given it the mission to undertake and the courage to execute them!"

After an harangue of sundry minutes, the president stepped from the amphitheatre, and, snatching a torch, applied its flame to the monstrous effigies of Atheism, Discord, and Selfishness. From out their ashes emerged a statue of Wisdom; but it was remarked that it had been blackened by the smoke amidst which it was revealed. Robespierre returned to his station, and pronounced a second oration on the extirpation of the vices leagued against the republic. This first ceremony concluded, the procession was formed to proceed to the Champ-de-Mars. The pride of Robespierre seemed doubly inflated, and he affected to march considerably in advance of his colleagues. But some, more froward and indignant, quickened their steps, closed upon him, and derided his arrogance with biting sarcasms. One party sneered at the new pontiff, and told him, with an allusion to the statue of Wisdom, which had come forth begrimed, that his wisdom was darkened. Others made the word "tyrant" tingle in his ears, and whispered that the race of Brutus was not extinct. Bourdon-de-l'Oise saluted him with the words, "The Tarpeian Rock stands near the Capitol."

The procession at length reached the Champ-de-Mars. On the plain stood, in lieu of the old altar of the country, a lofty mountain. On the pinnacle of this eminence a tree was planted; beneath its branches the convention reposed. The various groups of children, old men, and women, arranged themselves on each side of the mountain. A symphony played; then the groups chanted stanzas with alternate responses; eventually, at a preconcerted signal, the young men drew their swords, and swore, on the hands of the old, to defend the country; the mothers elevated their infants in their arms; all present raised their hands towards heaven, and the oaths to conquer blended exultingly with the homage rendered to the Supreme Being. The procession afterwards returned to the garden of the Tuileries, and the festival terminated with public games.

Such was the famous festival celebrated in honour of the Supreme Being. Robespierre, that day, had attained the height of grandeur; but he had climbed to the summit only to be thence precipitated. His pride had offended all beholders. Even at the moment of his triumph, raillery had mortified his spirit, and he had encountered in some of his colleagues a hardihood ominous and unprecedented. On the morrow, he repaired to the committee of public welfare, and vented his wrath against the deputies who had insulted him the preceding day. He denounced especially "those friends of Danton, those impure relics of the indulgent and corrupt faction," and demanded their punishment. Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois, who were not less irritated than the others at the deportment of Robespierre during the ceremony, heard his reproaches with infinite coolness, and manifested little inclination to avenge him. They did not defend the deputies of whom Robespierre complained, but they animadverted on the festival itself, and expressed apprehensions as to its effects. It had indisposed numerous minds, they alleged. Besides, those ideas of a Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul, such pomp and ceremony, they maintained, seemed the harbingers of a return to the superstitions of former times, and might cause the revolution to retrograde. Robespierre was incensed at these remarks: he asseverated that he had never designed to make the revolution retrograde; that, on the contrary, he had laboured incessantly to accelerate its march. In corroboration, he adduced a project of law which he had recently digested in concert with Couthon, framed with the view of rendering the revolutionary tribunal more murderous.

This project thus originated. For the last two months, the subject of introducing modifications into the organisation of the revolutionary tribunal had been canvassed. The defence made by Danton, Camille, Fabre, and Lacroix, had demonstrated the inconvenience of even such formalities as were allowed to remain. And still the annoyance was of daily repetition; witnesses and advocates had to be heard; and, however brief the process of evidence, however curtailed the arguments of counsel, a great loss of time resulted, and a certain sensation was produced. The chiefs of the government, who were anxious that all should be done promptly and silently, desired to abrogate these obnoxious formalities. Having inured themselves to the conviction that the revolution had a right to destroy its enemies, who were to be identified by mere inspection, they held that the revolutionary procedure could not be too expeditious. Robespierre, in whose province the tribunal more particularly lay, had prepared the law with Couthon alone, for Saint-Just was absent. He had not deigned to consult the other members of the committee, but contented himself with reading to them the project before presenting it to the convention. Although Barrère and Collot-d'Herbois were as strongly in favour of its sanguinary purpose as himself, they felt bound to receive it coldly, because it had been planned and drawn up without their participation. Nevertheless, it was agreed that it should be proposed the following day, under the auspices of Couthon as reporter. But no satisfaction was awarded to Robespierre for the contumely he had experienced on the preceding evening.

The committee of general safety had been left equally in ignorance touching this intended law as the committee of public welfare. It knew, certainly, that a measure was in agitation; but it received no invitation to consult or concur. It craved the privilege of nominating twenty out of fifty jurymen who were to be appointed; but Robespierre rejected its leet, and inserted his own creatures only. The proposition was submitted on the 22d Prairial, by Couthon the reporter. After the usual declamation concerning the inflexibility and promptitude which ought to characterise revolutionary justice, he read the project, which was conceived in a fearful spirit. The tribunal was to be divided into four sections, constituted by a president, three judges, and nine jurymen. Twelve judges were nominated, and fifty jurymen, who were to succeed each other in the exercise of their functions, in order that the tribunal might sit daily. The sole punishment the court could inflict was death. The tribunal, so the law spoke, was instituted to chastise the enemies of the people—a definition of the vaguest and yet most comprehensive character. In the list were enumerated dishonest contractors, and alarmists who propagated false intelligence. The power of consigning citizens to the revolutionary tribunal was vested in the two committees, the convention, the representatives on missions, and the public prosecutor, Fouquier-Tinville. If proofs existed, either physical or moral, the hearing of testimony was to be dispensed with. Finally, a clause was thus couched—"The law gives, as defenders to calumniated patriots, patriot juries; it grants none to conspirators."

A law which suppressed all guarantees, which limited criminal process to a mere arraignment, and which, investing the two committees with the power of sending citizens before the revolutionary tribunal, conferred upon them in fact the prerogative of life and death—such a law was indeed calculated to startle and terrify especially those members of the convention already uneasy about their safety. It was not expressed in the project whether the committees were to have the faculty of consigning representatives to the tribunal without obtaining a preliminary decree of impeachment; in the absence of all inhibition, the committees, therefore, might dispatch their colleagues to death, with the trouble of a nod to Fouquier-Tinville. Consequently, the remnants of the pretended faction of the indulgents combined; and, for the first time during a long interval, an opposition was arrayed on the benches of the assembly. Ruamps moved that the project be printed and the debate adjourned, saying, that if such a law were adopted without consideration, the only course left them was to dash out their brains. Lecointre of Versailles supported the motion of adjournment. Robespierre immediately rose to crush this unexpected resistance. "There are two opinions," he said, "as old as our revolution—the one tending to punish conspirators in a prompt and inevitable manner, the other tending to absolve the guilty. This last has never failed to reappear upon all occasions. It is displaying itself again to-day, and I am here to repel it. For two months the tribunal has complained of the impediments which have clogged its progress; it has complained of wanting jurymen; therefore a law is necessary. Amidst the victories of the republic, the conspirators are more active and zealous than ever; to smite them is urgent. The unexpected opposition now manifested is not natural. It is intended to divide the convention—to alarm it"—— "No, no," exclaimed several voices; "they will not divide us." "We," added Robespierre, "have always defended the convention; we are not the parties it has to fear. For the rest, we are arrived at a crisis when we may be slain probably, but we will not be prevented from saving the country."

Robespierre never failed to talk of daggers and assassins, as if he were perpetually threatened by them. Bourdon-de-l'Oise replied to him, and stated that if the tribunal needed jurymen, the proposed list ought to be forthwith adopted, as none could wish to impede the course of justice; but that the remainder of the project might be innocuously deferred. Robespierre remounted the tribune, and argued that the law was not more complicated or obscure than divers others which had been passed without discussion; and that, at a moment when the defenders of liberty were menaced with the dagger, to delay the repression of conspiracies was fraught with danger. In conclusion, he proposed to discuss the whole measure, clause by clause, and to sit until midnight, in order that it might be decreed the same day. The influence and pertinacity of Robespierre prevailed: the law was read and adopted in a few minutes.

Bourdon, Tallien, and other members who laboured under personal apprehensions, were justly alarmed at this enactment. The committees being thereby empowered to send all citizens indiscriminately before the revolutionary tribunal, without any exception in favour of the members of the national representation, they dreaded lest they might be captured in a single night, and delivered over to the mercies of Fouquier-Tinville, without any previous intimation to the convention. Accordingly, on the following day, the 23d Prairial, Bourdon appeared in the tribune. "When investing the committees of public welfare and general safety," he said, "with power to commit citizens to the revolutionary tribunal, the convention had no intention, assuredly, that the privilege should embrace its members without a preliminary decree." "No, no," was exclaimed from all sides. "I expected those responses," he cried; "they prove to me that liberty is imperishable." This remark occasioned a profound sensation. Bourdon moved a resolution that the members of the convention could not be carried before the revolutionary tribunal unless by virtue of a decree of impeachment. The committees were not present, and Bourdon's proposition was hailed with satisfaction. Merlin moved the previous question; murmurs arose against him; he explained, and amended his motion for the previous question with a declaration to the effect that the convention had never been competent to divest itself of the sole right to impeach its members. The declaration was adopted amidst general applause.

An occurrence which happened during the same evening gave additional zest to this unwonted opposition. Tallien and Bourdon chanced to be strolling in the garden of the Tuileries, when they were closely followed by certain spies of the committee of public welfare. Tallien, irritated at the insufferable nuisance, turned and confronted them, upbraiding them as vile spies of the committee, and enjoining them to hasten with a report to their employers of what they had seen and heard. This scene caused extraordinary excitement. Couthon and Robespierre were highly incensed. On the morrow they repaired to the convention, determined to remonstrate authoritatively against the resistance they encountered. Delacroix and Mallarmé offered them an opportunity. Delacroix moved that a more precise definition should be inserted of those whom the law designated as "depravers of manners." Mallarmé demanded the meaning of the words—"the law gives to calumniated patriots only the consciences of patriotic jurymen as their defenders." Couthon thereupon mounted the tribune, and inveighed against the amendments then and formerly propounded. "You have calumniated the committee of public welfare," he said, "by appearing to suppose that it coveted the privilege of sending members of the convention to the scaffold. That tyrants calumniate the committee is natural; but that the convention should seem to sanction the calumny, is an insupportable injustice, and it cannot avoid complaining of such conduct. Yesterday a chance clamour was extolled as proving that liberty was imperishable—as if, forsooth, liberty had been threatened! To make that attack, the moment was chosen when the members of the committee were absent. Such a proceeding was unfair; and I move that the amendments adopted yesterday be rescinded, and those proposed to-day rejected."

Bourdon replied, that to ask explanations on a law was not a crime; that if he had expressed satisfaction at an exclamation, it was because he felt gratified at being in harmony with the convention; and that, if equal asperity were exhibited on both sides, all discussion would be impracticable. "I am accused," he said, "of speaking like Pitt and Cobourg; if I retorted in a similar strain, what would be the consequence? I esteem Couthon, I esteem the committees, and I esteem the Mountain which has saved liberty." Bourdon's explanations were applauded, but they were in truth excuses, for the authority of the dictators was as yet too strong to be openly defied. Robespierre then presented himself, and delivered a verbose discourse, replete with arrogance and acrimony. "Mountaineers," he said, "you will always be the bulwark of public liberty, but you have nothing in common with the intriguing and the perverse, whomsoever they may be. If they attempt to rank themselves amongst you, they are not the less strangers to your principles. Do not suffer certain intriguers, more despicable than the others, because they are more hypocritical, to sway some of your number, and render themselves the leaders of a party"—— Bourdon-de-l'Oise interrupted Robespierre with a disclaimer of his having ever purposed to render himself the leader of a party. Robespierre resumed, without noticing the observation. "It would be the height of disgrace," he continued, "if calumniators, misleading our colleagues"—— Bourdon again interrupted him. "I demand," he exclaimed, "that proof be given of what is advanced; the allusion is sufficiently clear that I am viewed as a villain." "I have not named Bourdon," replied Robespierre; "wo to him who names himself! Yes, the Mountain is pure, it is sublime; intriguers are not of the Mountain!" He subsequently expatiated on the efforts making to alarm the members of the convention, and to persuade them they were in danger; he averred that the guilty alone had reason to be terrified, and that they wickedly endeavoured to communicate their own apprehensions. Eventually he referred to the encounter of the preceding evening between Tallien and the spies, whom he described as "messengers of the committee." His account of the incident led to vehement explanations on the part of Tallien, which only drew upon him, in return, virulent vituperation. At length this angry discussion was terminated by the adoption of the motions emanating from Couthon and Robespierre. The amendments of the previous day were rescinded, those of the present were negatived, and the terrible law of the 22d remained such as it had been originally presented.

Once more, therefore, the overbearing chiefs of the committee were triumphant, and their opponents struck with dismay. Tallien, Bourdon, Ruamps, Delacroix, Mallarmé, all, in short, who had offered objections to the law, gave themselves up for lost, and expected every moment to be arrested. Even though the preliminary decree of the convention were necessary to an impeachment, that assembly was so effectually intimidated, that any concession might be readily wrung from it. Against the puissant Danton it had passed the required ordinance; much more might it sanction proceedings against such of his friends as survived. A rumour prevailed that the list of proscription was actually framed; the number of victims was assigned as twelve, subsequently eighteen. They were all designated by the public voice. Nevertheless, the terror became general, and upwards of sixty members of the convention no longer slept under their own roofs.

However, an obstacle interposed to prevent their lives being so easily taken as they apprehended. The chiefs of the government were divided. We have already seen that Billaud-Varennes, Collot, and Barrère, had listened to Robespierre's first complaints against many of his colleagues with studied indifference. The members of the committee of general safety were more decidedly aroused against him, for they warmly resented the recent affront of submitting the law of the 22d Prairial without their concurrence, and it would even seem that some amongst them were menaced. Robespierre and Couthon, too, were insatiable in their exactions; their thirst of vengeance could be assuaged only by the immolation of numerous deputies; they particularised Tallien, Bourdon-de-l'Oise, Thuriot, Rovère, Lecointre, Panis, Monestier, Legendre, Fréron, and Barras; they even demanded Cambon, whose financial renown mortified them, and who had betokened disapprobation of their merciless cruelties; finally, they would have scaled the summit of the Mountain, and struck several of its most zealous members, such as Duval, Audouin, Léonard, and Bourdon.* The three members of the committee of public welfare, Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, and all those of the committee of general safety, refused their consent. The danger, spreading over so wide a surface, might eventually involve themselves.

Such were the hostile dispositions in the two committees, such the slender prospect of unanimity touching a new and miscellaneous sacrifice, when a last circumstance provoked a definitive rupture. The committee of general safety had discovered the meetings held at the house of Catherine Théot. It had learned that her extravagant sect deemed Robespierre a prophet, and that the latter had given Dom Gerle a certificate of civism. Vadier, Vouland, Jagot, and Amar, eagerly resolved to avenge themselves by representing this sect as a band of dangerous conspirators, denouncing it in that light to the convention, and thus covering Robespierre himself with some of the odium and ridicule attached to it. They employed an agent, Sénart, who, under pretext of soliciting initiation, gained admittance to one of the conclaves. In the middle of the ceremony, he crept to a window, gave the signal to the armed force, and succeeded in capturing almost the entire sect. Amongst the rest, Dom Gerle and Catherine Théot were apprehended. The certificate of civism given by Robespierre to Dom Gerle was found upon him; and in the bed of the mother of God was discovered a letter addressed by her to her well-beloved son, to the first prophet, to Robespierre, in short. When Robespierre knew it was intended to prosecute the sect, he determined to oppose the design, and commenced a discussion on the subject in the committee of public welfare. We have previously intimated that Billaud and Collot were but lukewarm in the cause of deism, and that they viewed with umbrage the political purposes to which Robespierre strove to bend that belief. They declared in favour of the prosecution. Robespierre persisting in controverting it, the discussion became extremely animated; acrimonious expressions were interchanged, Robespierre failed to carry his point, and retired from the committee foaming with rage. The dispute had been so warm, that, to avoid being heard by those who traversed the galleries, the members of the committee resolved to transfer their place of meeting to the upper floor. The report against the sect of Catherine Théot was presented to the convention. Barrère, to gratify his animosity against Robespierre, had exercised his peculiar talent, and secretly framed the report to be delivered by Vouland. The sect was held up equally to ridicule and detestation. The convention, alternately moved to abhorrence and mirth by Barrère's exposition, at once decreed impeachment against the principal leaders of the sect, and consigned them to the revolutionary tribunal.

* Consult the list furnished by Villate in his Memoirs.

Robespierre, indignant both at the resistance he had encountered and at the injurious terms used towards him, resolved to abstain from appearing in the committee, or taking part for the future in any of its deliberations. He withdrew towards the conclusion of Prairial (the middle of June). This retirement proves the nature of his ambition. The man of lofty and aspiring spirit never yields to chagrin; he is irritated by obstacles, seizes daringly on power, and uses it to crush the enemies who have maltreated him. A weak and vainglorious declaimer frets and recedes when he no longer meets with flattery and deference. Danton retired from indolence and disgust, Robespierre from wounded vanity. To each his retreat was equally fatal. Couthon henceforth remained alone against Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, who prepared to monopolise the direction of all affairs.

These divisions were not yet notorious. It was merely known that a misunderstanding existed between the two committees, and their discord occasioned infinite joy, for it seemed to warrant the hope that fresh proscriptions would be prevented. Those who felt themselves in jeopardy clung to the committee of general safety, exhorting, cajoling, imploring it. They had actually received from certain members the most cheering promises: Elie-Lacoste, Moyse-Bayle, Lavicomterie, and Dubarran, the worthiest men on the committee of general safety, had undertaken to withhold their signatures from any new list of proscription.

Meanwhile, the Jacobins were still devoted to Robespierre. They had hitherto made no distinction between the different members of the committee—between Couthon, Robespierre, and Saint-Just, on the one part, and Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, on the other. On the contrary, they saw only the revolutionary government on the one hand, and on the other sundry relics of the faction of indulgents—certain friends of Danton, who, with reference to the law of the 22d Prairial, had unexpectedly started into opposition against that salutary government. Robespierre, who had defended that government when advocating the law, was always in their eyes the first and greatest citizen in the republic; his opponents were despicable intriguers, whose destruction it behoved them to promote. Accordingly, they readily excluded Tallien from their committee of correspondence, on the ground that he had failed to answer the accusations directed against him in the sitting of the 24th. From that moment, Collot and Billaud-Varennes, perceiving the all-commanding influence of Robespierre, refrained from frequenting the Jacobin Club. It was the wisest course they could adopt. By attending, they would surely have exposed their personal quarrel, and made matter of public question whether they or Robespierre surpassed in pride and malice. It merely remained for them, therefore, to observe silence and await events. Robespierre and Couthon consequently had the field to themselves. The rumour of an impending proscription having produced an unfavourable effect, Couthon hastened to disclaim before the society the designs they were alleged to entertain against the safety of twenty-four and even sixty members of the convention. "The shades of Danton, Hébert, and Chaumette," he said, "still walk amongst us; they seek to perpetuate trouble and dissension. What passed in the sitting of the 24th is a signal confirmation of it: men strive to divide the government and to discredit its members, by representing them as Syllas and Neros; they deliberate in secret, congregate in hidden corners, form pretended lists of proscription, and alarm the citizens with the insidious view of rendering them enemies of the public authority. They spread, a few days ago, a report that the committees intended to arrest eighteen members of the convention, and even mentioned their names. Reject these perfidious insinuations: those who circulate such rumours are accomplices of Hébert and Danton; they dread the punishment of their guilty conduct; they endeavour to associate with them pure patriots, in the hope that, concealed behind them, they may more easily escape the eye of justice. But dismiss your fears; the number of the guilty is trifling; it is only four, or six, perhaps, and those will be certainly attacked, for the time has arrived to deliver the republic from the last foes conspiring against it. Confide in the energy and justice of the committees for its preservation."

It was politic thus to depress the number of victims whom Robespierre wished to smite. The Jacobins applauded, according to usage, Couthon's speech; but it failed to reassure any of the threatened members, and those who deemed themselves in peril continued to sleep apart from their households. Never had greater terror prevailed during the revolution, not alone in the convention, but in the prisons and throughout all France.

The merciless agents of Robespierre, the public accuser Fouquier-Tinville and the president Dumas, had joyfully grasped the law of the 22d Prairial, and armed themselves therewith to devastate the prisons. "Shortly," said Fouquier, "a board will be exposed above the gates, bearing the notice—A house to let." The design was to get rid of the greater part of the suspected. These were, by the inveterate prejudices of the time, considered irreconcilable enemies, whom, for the safety of the republic, it was imperative to destroy. To slay thousands of individuals guilty of no delinquency but that of thinking in a certain manner, and who frequently did not differ in opinions with their persecutors, seemed quite natural, from the force of the habit so long indulged of shedding the blood of adversaries. The indifference with which death was administered and met had become truly marvellous. On fields of battle and on scaffolds thousands of human beings daily perished, without harrowing the sensibilities, or, in fact, without exciting any peculiar observation. The first murders committed in 1793 proceeded from a real exasperation, grounded on a sense of imminent danger. At present the danger had ceased, the republic was victorious, and the system of slaughter was continued, not from high-wrought indignation, but from the horrible usage too firmly and fatally engrafted on the revolution. That formidable machinery, heretofore found indispensable effectually to resist so many varieties of enemies, began to be no longer necessary; but once put in motion, it could not be easily stayed. Every government seems destined to have its period of excess, and to perish only when it attains that period. The revolutionary government was not to finish the very day all the enemies of the republic were sufficiently intimidated; it was to go far beyond that limit, and exercise its sway until it had earned universal execration by its deplorable atrocity. Human affairs are not otherwise ruled. Why had fearful circumstances rendered it incumbent to create a government of death, which could reign and vanquish only by so desperate an engine?

The most lamentable consequence of all appears, that when the impetus is imparted, when the idea is established that lives must be sacrificed, and that by sacrificing them the state will be saved, all concur in carrying out the frightful dogma with extraordinary facility. Every one acts without remorse, without repugnance—less importuned by scruples, in sooth, than the judge when consigning criminals to execution, the anatomist with creatures writhing under his knife, or the general ordering the sacrifice of twenty thousand soldiers. A hideous language, too, is forged for the new career—even a sportive, derisive language; quaint phrases are invented to express sanguinary ideas. Impelled, maddened by the prevailing mania, none can resist its influence; and men are seen, who an instant earlier were tranquilly engaged in arts or commerce, devoting themselves with equal assiduity to the repulsive work of death and destruction.

The committee had given the signal, by the law of the 22d Prairial; Dumas and Fouquier had only too well comprehended its import. Nevertheless, pretexts were requisite for effecting so indiscriminate an immolation. What crime could be imputed to unfortunate captives, of whom the greater part were peaceable, obscure citizens, who had never harassed the state by any overt act? An evil imagination discovered that, immured in jails, they must long for their deliverance; that their numbers must inspire them with a feeling of strength, and suggest to them the resolution of using it to break from bondage. The pretended conspiracy of Dillon was the germ of this idea, which was developed in an atrocious manner. Certain wretches amongst the detained, who consented to perform the infamous part of informers, were suborned. These designated one hundred and sixty prisoners in the Luxembourg, who, they alleged, had taken part in Dillon's plot. In all the other places of detention such fabricators of lists were found; and in each, from one to two hundred individuals were denounced as accomplices in the conspiracy of the prisons. An attempt at escape made at La Force only served to accredit the iniquitous fable; and, without further delay, hundreds of unfortunates were hurried before the revolutionary tribunal. They were transferred from the different prisons to the Conciergerie, thence to proceed before the tribunal, and to the scaffold. During the night of the 18th-19th Messidor (6th June), the one hundred and sixty designated at the Luxembourg were removed. They trembled upon hearing the roll called; they knew not what crime was imputed to them, but they had a presentiment of the probable issue—the death in store for them. The ferocious Fouquier, since he was armed with the law of the 22d, had effected great alterations in the hall of the tribunal. In lieu of the seats reserved to advocates and the bench for the accused, which contained but eighteen or twenty places, he had caused an amphitheatre to be constructed, capable of holding one hundred or one hundred and fifty prisoners at a time. He called this erection "his little tiers." Carrying his ardour to a pitch of extravagance, he had reared a scaffold in the very hall of the court, and congratulated himself upon the prospect of having the one hundred and sixty captives from the Luxembourg sentenced at the same sitting.

The committee of public welfare, on learning the species of delirium that had seized upon its public prosecutor, summoned him before it, ordered him to remove the scaffold from the hall in which it was raised, and prohibited him from arraigning more than sixty individuals at once. "Wouldst thou demoralise punishment, then?" said Collot-d'Herbois to him, in a transport of anger. We must observe, however, that Fouquier has asserted the contrary to be the fact, and maintained that it was he who urged the trial of the one hundred and sixty in three detachments. It is sufficiently proved, nevertheless, that the committee was less extravagant than its minister, and that it controlled his frenzy. A second imperative injunction to Fouquier to remove the scaffold from the hall of the tribunal was necessary.

The one hundred and sixty were divided into three bands, and tried and executed in three days. The process had become as expeditious and horrible as that employed at the wicket of the Abbaye during the nights of the 2d and 3d September. The carts, put in daily requisition, waited from dawn in the court of the Palace of Justice, and the accused could perceive them as they ascended to the tribunal. The president Dumas, with the demeanour of one infuriated, had a brace of pistols on the table before him. He interrogated the prisoners simply as to their names, and occasionally added some general question. In the examination of the one hundred and sixty, the president, addressing one of them called Dorival, said, "Are you acquainted with the conspiracy?" "No." "I expected you would give such an answer but it will not succeed. Pass to another!" To an individual named Champigny, he said—"Are you not an ex-noble?' "Yes." "To another!" To Guedreville —"Are you a priest?" "Yes, but I have taken the oath." "Hold your tongue. Another!" To Menil —"Were you not a servant of the ex-constituent Menou?" "Yes." "Another!" To Vely—"Were you not architect to Madame?"* "Yes, but I was disgraced in 1788." "Another!" To Goudrecourt —"Have you not your father-in-law at the Luxembourg?" "Yes." "Another!" To Durfort—"Were you not a body-guardsman?" "Yes; but I was disbanded in 1789." "Another!"

It was thus that the trial of these unfortunate men proceeded. The law bore that the hearing of witnesses should be dispensed with only when there subsisted physical or moral proofs; none were ever called, however, it being always pretended that proofs of that description existed. The jurymen did not even trouble themselves to retire into the consulting-room. They declared their opinions in open court, and the sentence was immediately pronounced. The accused had scarcely time to rise and enunciate their names. One day an individual happened to be brought up whose name was not on the list of the accused; and he said to the tribunal, "I am not accused; my name is not in your list." "Eh! what signifies?" cried Fouquier; "give it immediately." He gave his name, and was sent to death with the rest. The greatest negligence signalised this barbarous species of administration. It frequently occurred, as the result of the outrageous precipitancy, that the articles of accusation were not intimated; and in such cases they were conveyed to the accused when at the bar. The strangest errors, too, were committed. A respectable old man, Loizerolles, heard his surname called out, coupled with the Christian names of his son; he abstained from reclaiming, and was sent to the scaffold. Some time after, the son was placed before the tribunal in his turn, when it was discovered that he ought to be no longer in existence, as an individual bearing all his names had been executed: the substitute was his father. He perished notwithstanding. On sundry occasions, prisoners were called who had been already executed a long while previously. Hundreds of indictments were kept in readiness, to which merely the designations of prisoners required to be added. The like method was pursued with regard to the sentences. A printing-office adjoined the hall of the tribunal; the types were already up, the offences and the judgment were in composition; the names only had to be inserted, and they were handed to the compositor through a grated window. Thousands of copies were forthwith struck off and distributed, spreading grief amongst families, and consternation amongst captives. Urchin-hawkers vended the bulletin of the tribunal under the windows of the prisons, crying out, "Here's a list of those who have won in the lottery of the holy guillotine!" The accused were executed upon leaving the court, or at the latest on the morrow, if the day were too far advanced.

Since the law of the 22d Prairial, heads fell at the rate of fifty and sixty each day. "All right!" said Fouquier; "heads fall like hailstones." He added—"It must go still better next decade; I must have four hundred and fifty at least."† For that fell purpose, "bespeaks," as the phrase went, were made to the "lambs," meaning thereby the spies on the detained. Those miscreants had become the terror of the prisons. Immured amongst the rest as suspected persons, it was not exactly known who had undertaken to designate victims; but they were generally betrayed by their insolent demeanour, the favours they obtained from the jailers, and the orgies they held in the guardrooms with the agents of the police. Frequently they allowed their importance to transpire, with the view of turning it to pecuniary account. They were caressed and entreated with abject sedulousness by their trembling fellow-captives; sums of money were given them to withhold names from their list. They made their selections at hazard: they said of one that he had held aristocratic language, of another that he had drank one day when a defeat of the armies was announced; and their mere denunciation was equivalent to a judgment of death. The names furnished by them were introduced into the analogous number of indictments; and officers appeared in the evening to serve those indictments on the prisoners, and conduct them to the Conciergerie. This proceeding was styled, in the phraseology of the jailers, "the evening journal." When the miserable captives heard the rumbling of the carts brought to remove them, they were thrown into an anxiety as dreadful as death itself; they hurried to the wickets, pressed against the bars to hear the list, and shook with tremor lest their names might fall from the lips of the messengers. When they had been nominated, they embraced their companions in misfortune, and took their farewells as dying men. The most afflicting separations were often witnessed—a father tearing himself from his children, a husband from his wife. Those who remained were equally unhappy with those conveyed to the caverns of Fouquier-Tinville; they returned to their cells with the gloomy anticipation of speedily following their comrades. After the fatal roll was finished, the survivors breathed more freely, perhaps, but only until the morrow. Then their agony recommenced, and the horrible rumbling of the carts again struck all with dismal dread.

Public commiseration was beginning, however, to be manifested in a manner somewhat disquieting to the exterminators. The tradesmen in the street Saint-Honoré, through which the carts daily passed, closed their shops. To prevent the victims witnessing these evidences of sympathy, the scaffold was transported to the Barrier du Trône; and in that quarter of operatives, not less pity was evinced than in the most richly inhabited thoroughfares of Paris. The people, in a moment of delirium, may unmercifully exult over victims immolated by themselves; but when the spectacle is daily presented to them of fifty or sixty fellow-beings expiring on a scaffold, against whom they are aroused by no extraordinary fury, they are speedily melted into compassion. In the present instance, however, such emotion was as yet silent and timorous. All the more distinguished inmates of the prisons had fallen; the wretched sister of Louis XVI. had been decapitated in her turn; and now, from the elevated ranks of society, the destroyer was descending to the lowest. On the lists of the revolutionary tribunal at this period we perceive tailors, shoemakers, barbers, butchers, husbandmen, lemonade-venders, and even working men, condemned for sentiments and expressions reputed counter-revolutionary. The multitudinous executions at this epoch may be demonstrated by the simple statement, that from the month of March 1793, when the tribunal entered on its functions, to the month of June 1794 (22d Prairial, year 2), it had condemned 577 persons; whilst, from the 10th June (22d Prairial) to the 27th July (9th Thermidor), it condemned 1285; whereby it appears that the total number of victims, up to the 9th Thermidor, was 1862.

The shedders of all this blood, meanwhile, enjoyed little tranquillity. Dumas was troubled in conscience, and Fouquier dared not venture out after dusk—he saw the relatives of his victims always ready to smite him. Crossing the courts of the Louvre one day with Sénart, he took alarm at a slight noise: it was merely a man passing very near him. "If I had been alone," he exclaimed, "something might have happened to me."

† For all these details, consult the long trial of Fouquier-Tinville.

In the principal towns of France, terror prevailed equally as in Paris. Carrier had been sent to Nantes, commissioned to chastise La Vendée. Carrier, still young in years, was one of those mediocre and violent beings, who, in the excitement of civil broils, become monsters of cruelty and extravagance. He commenced his career, on arriving at Nantes, by declaring his opinion that an indiscriminate slaughter must be made; and that, notwithstanding the promise of pardon held out to such Vendéans as laid down their arms, mercy should be extended to none. The constituted authorities having ventured to speak of holding faith with the rebels—"You are ——," said Carrier to them; "you don't know your trade: I will have you all guillotined;" and he proceeded to fulfil his mission, by causing the unfortunate men who had surrendered to be mowed down by ball and grape-shot, in bands of one and two hundred. He appeared before the popular society with a drawn sword in his hand, scattering abusive epithets, and threatening all with the guillotine. The society speedily displeased him, and he forthwith dissolved it. He intimidated the authorities to such an extent, that they durst no longer assemble in his presence. One day some of the members presumed to mention the subject of provisions to him: he replied to the municipal officers "that the affair was none of his; that the first —— who spoke to him about provisions should have his head struck off; and that he had no time to attend to their nonsense." The madman thought his only mission was to slay.

He resolved upon punishing not only the rebellious Vendéans, but also the federalist Nantese, who had attempted a movement in favour of the Girondists after the siege of their city. Fugitives, who had escaped the massacres of Mans and Savenay, daily arrived in crowds, chased by the armies which encompassed them on all sides. Carrier caused them to be immured in the prisons of Nantes, and thus accumulated of those unhappy creatures nearly ten thousand. He afterwards formed a company of assassins, who spread themselves over the adjoining country, arrested the Nantese families, and plundered at will in addition to their other enormities. Carrier had originally instituted a revolutionary commission, to pass the Vendéans and Nantese through a form of trial. Under his direction the Vendéans were shot, and the Nantese accused of federalism or royalism were guillotined. In a little while, however, he found the formality too tedious, and the mode of execution by grape-shot attended with inconveniences. The destruction was somewhat lingering, and it was troublesome to inter the bodies. They frequently remained on the field of slaughter, and so infected the air, that an epidemic prevailed in the town. The Loire, which traverses Nantes, suggested a horrible idea to Carrier—namely, to get rid of his prisoners by throwing them into the river. He made a preliminary experiment, by loading a barge with ninety priests, under pretence of transporting them elsewhere, and causing it to be scuttled at a distance from the city. The expedient being found to answer, he decided upon adopting it more extensively. He no longer employed the derisory formality of arraigning the victims before a commission; he had them taken from the prisons during the night, in bands of one and two hundred, and conducted into lighters. From these lighters they were transferred into small vessels prepared for the execrable purpose. The doomed were stowed into the hold of the craft, the port-holes nailed up, and the apertures of the deck covered with planks; then the executioners retired into the barges, whilst carpenters stationed in boats stove in the sides of the vessel with hatchets, and sent it to the bottom. Such was the process whereby four or five thousand individuals perished. Carrier congratulated himself on having discovered this more expeditious and salubrious method of delivering the republic from its enemies. Not only men, but a great number of women and children likewise, were drowned in this fashion. Upon the dispersion of the Vendéan families after the catastrophe of Savenay, several inhabitants of Nantes had received children into their houses with the view of rearing them. "They are wolves' whelps," said Carrier; and he ordered they should be surrendered to the republic. These orphan children were nearly all drowned.

The Loire was choked with corpses; ships, in casting anchor, sometimes raised vessels filled with dead. Birds of prey hovered on the shores of the river, and devoured the human relics.* The fish were tainted with a diet which rendered their use dangerous, and the municipality issued a prohibition against drawing them. These horrors were aggravated by a contagious malady and a famine. Amidst all the calamity, Carrier, always frantic and wrathful, denounced the slightest expression of pity; seized by the collar and threatened with his sword any who ventured to address him; and caused a notice to be affixed, that whoever should pester him with solicitations for a prisoner, would be himself thrown into prison. Fortunately, the committee of public welfare superseded him; for, however much it approved of extermination, it was called upon to discourage extravagance. The number of victims sacrificed by Carrier is estimated at four or five thousand. The greater part were Vendéans.

Bordeaux, Marseilles, and Toulon, had also dearly to expiate their federalism. At Toulon, the representatives Fréron and Barras had dispatched 200 inhabitants with grape-shot, visiting upon them a crime whose veritable authors had escaped on board the foreign squadrons. Maignet exercised in the department of Vaucluse a dictatorship equally formidable with the other envoys of the convention. He had reduced the small town of Bedouin to ashes, on the ground of rebellion; and, at his instance, the committee of public welfare had established at Orange a revolutionary tribunal, with a jurisdiction comprehending all the southern departments. This tribunal was organised according to the precedent of that at Paris, differing from its model only in the absence of juries; five judges condemned, upon what they called moral proofs, the unhappy beings whom Maignet collected in his circuits. At Lyons, the barbarous executions ordered by Collot-d'Herbois had ceased. The revolutionary commission had recently rendered an account of its labours, and furnished an enumeration of the acquitted and the condemned. One thousand six hundred and eighty-four individuals had been put to death by the guillotine, or by discharges of musketry and grape-shot. One thousand six hundred and eighty-two had been set at liberty, "by the justice of the commission."

The north likewise had its proconsul impersonated in Joseph Lebon. This individual had been a priest, and often avowed that in his youth religious fanaticism would have impelled him to slay his father and mother, if the sacrifice had been enjoined him. He was a veritable maniac, less ferocious perhaps than Carrier, but even more outrageous in his insanity. His words and his conduct clearly proved that his brain was deranged. He fixed his principal residence at Arras. He instituted a tribunal with the sanction of the committee of public welfare, and traversed the departments of the north followed by his judges and a guillotine. He visited Saint-Pol, Saint-Omer, Bethune, Bapaume, Aire, &c., and every where left bloody traces behind him. The Austrians having approached Cambray, and Saint-Just deeming he detected a secret intercourse between the aristocrats of that town and the enemy, he called Lebon thither, who in a few days sent to the scaffold a multitude of pretended criminals, and boasted he had saved Cam-bray by his firmness. When Lebon had finished his circuits, he always returned to Arras. There he abandoned himself to the most disgusting orgies with his judges and certain members of the clubs. The executioner was admitted to his table, and treated with the greatest consideration. Lebon himself attended all the executions, seated on a balcony; thence he harangued the people, and ordered the Ca ira to be played whilst the guillotine was at work. One day, intelligence of a victory arrived at the critical moment; he hastened to his balcony and caused the execution to be suspended, in order that the wretched creatures awaiting death might learn the success of the republic.

Lebon had displayed such evident lunacy in his conduct, that even before the committee of public welfare he was assailable. Certain inhabitants of Arras had fled to Paris, where they used every exertion to gain an audience of Robespierre, their fellow-citizen, in order to lay their grievances before him. Some of them had known and even obliged him in his youth; but they were unsuccessful in their endeavours to see him. The deputy Guffroy, who was a native of Arras, and endowed with a manly courage, devoted himself with infinite ardour to prevail on the committees to review the proceedings of Lebon. He had even the noble hardihood to make an express denunciation before the convention. The committee of public welfare felt it incumbent to take cognisance of this open exposition, and summon Lebon to Paris. However, as the committee was determined not to disavow its agents, or seem to allow that too much severity was possible against aristocrats, it remanded Lebon to Arras, and employed in its instructions to him the following expressions:—"Continue to effect good, and do it with such discretion and dignity as may defy the calumnies of aristocracy."

The complaints submitted to the convention by Guffroy against Lebon, called forth a special report from the committee. Barrère was charged with its composition. "All remonstrances against representatives," he said, "ought to be judged by the committee, in order to avoid debates which may trouble the government and the convention. Thus have we acted in this instance touching Lebon; we have investigated the motives of his conduct. Are these motives pure? Is the result beneficial to the revolution? Does it profit liberty? Are not the complaints mere recriminatory aspersions, or are they not in truth the vindictive outcries of aristocracy? So the committee has concluded in this business. Forms somewhat sharp have been employed; but these forms have destroyed the snares of aristocracy. The committee, doubtless, may have disapproved of them; but Lebon has completely crushed the aristocrats, and saved Cambray. Besides, what is not permitted to the hatred of a republican against aristocracy! How many are the generous sentiments felt by a patriot, leading him to overlook what may be severe in the pursuit of the enemies of the people! The revolution ought to be spoken of only with reverence, revolutionary measures with circumspection. Liberty is a virgin whose veil it is criminal to lift."

The meaning of these ambiguous phrases was, that Lebon had been continued in his authority, and that Guffroy was ranked amongst the obnoxious censurers of the government, and exposed to all their perils. It was obvious that the entire committee upheld the reign of terror. Robespierre, Couthon, Billaud, Collot-d'Herbois, Vadier, Vouland, Amar, might be divided amongst themselves as to their individual preponderance, or as to the number and selection of their colleagues doomed for sacrifice; but they were in perfect harmony with regard to the system of exterminating all who stood in the way of the revolution. They had no wish, indeed, that this system should be applied with the extravagance of such men as Lebon and Carrier; but they verily intended that, after the example of the operations at Paris, the persons whom they deemed conspirators against the republic should be disposed of in a prompt, sure, and, as far as possible, noiseless manner. Even when blaming, therefore, certain outrageous and revolting cruelties, they had all the jealous pride of power, which never disavows its agents; they condemned the proceedings at Nantes and Arras, but in outward semblance they approved them, scorning to acknowledge a fault in their administration. Thus irretrievably committed to this ruthless career, they advanced blindly and recklessly, knowing no longer into what catastrophe it was to gather. Such is the sad condition of men engaged in evil, that they cannot halt in their course. When doubts begin to arise in their minds touching the nature of their actions, when they are brought to discern that they have erred, instead of retrograding, they rush more madly forward, as if to whirl their senses into dizziness, and stifle the voice which upbraids them. Calm reflection and rigid self-examination, so difficult amid the turmoil of passion, may make men pause and retrace their steps; but they must thereby pass a judgment on themselves almost too stern for human frailty.

In the present posture of affairs, only a general outbreak could restrain the authors of this horrible system. Into such a demonstration might enter sundry members of the committees, jealous of the predominant influence, the threatened Mountaineers, the convention, indignant under its yoke, and all, in fine, who abhorred the unmerciful effusion of blood. But before this alliance of jealousy, fear, and indignation, could be formed, it was requisite that the jealousy should be aggravated in the committees, the fear become extreme in the Mountain, and the indignation inspire courage in the convention and the community. An occasion was needed to force all these feelings into simultaneous explosion; it was necessary that the oppressors should aim the first blow, to stimulate the spirit of retribution.

Opinion thus disposed, the moment was approaching when a movement in the name of humanity against revolutionary violence was possible. The republic being victorious and its enemies prostrated, apprehension and fury were subsiding, and confidence and lenity arising in their stead. For the first time during the revolution such a reaction might become general. When the Girondists, when the Dantonists perished, the time had not arrived for invoking humanity. The revolutionary government had not yet lost either its utility or its credit.

Meanwhile, until events produced the crisis, a lull of mutual observance prevailed, and resentments were left to accumulate and canker in the heart. Robespierre had entirely ceased to attend the committee of public welfare. He hoped to disparage the administration of his colleagues by withholding his countenance and participation. He appeared only in the Jacobin Club, into which Billaud and Collot no longer ventured, and where he was every day more adored. He now began to make allusions before the Jacobins to the intestine divisions in the committees. "Formerly," he said, addressing them on the 13th Messidor, "the furtive faction, composed of the relics of Camille-Desmoulins and Danton, attacked the committees in the aggregate; at present it prefers to attack certain members in particular, to promote its constant design of rupturing unity. Formerly, it dared not attack the national justice; at present it deems itself sufficiently strong to calumniate the revolutionary tribunal, and the decree amending its organisation; it attributes what concerns the whole government to a single individual; it presumes to assert that the revolutionary tribunal has been instituted to slaughter the national convention, and unfortunately it has obtained only too much credence. Its calumnies have been believed, and assiduously propagated; a dictator has been spoken of, ay, named; it is I who have been designated, and you would shudder if I told you in what place! Truth is my only refuge against guilt. Such calumnies will undoubtedly not discourage me, but they leave me undecided as to the conduct I ought to pursue. Until I can divulge more, I invoke for the safety of the republic the virtues of the convention, the virtues of the committees, the virtues of all good citizens—yours, in fine, which have been so often beneficial to the country."

We see by what perfidious insinuations Robespierre sought to excite odium against the committees, and to attach the Jacobins exclusively to himself. They repaid him these marks of confidence with a boundless adulation. The revolutionary system being attributed to him alone, it was natural that all the revolutionary institutions should be favourably disposed towards him, and embrace his cause with zeal. Hence, to the Jacobins were necessarily joined the commune, always united in principles and conduct with their club, and all the judges and jurymen of the revolutionary tribunal. This coalition could deploy considerable strength, and, with greater resolution and energy, Robespierre might have become extremely formidable. In the Jacobins, he possessed a turbulent mass, which had hitherto represented and controlled opinion; in the commune, he commanded the local authority, which had taken the initiative in every preceding insurrection; and, above all, the armed force of Paris. The mayor Pache, and the commandant Henriot, who had been saved by him when threatened to be involved in the fate of Chaumette, were entirely devoted to him. Billaud and Collot had, it is true, profited by his absence from the committee to imprison Pache; but the new mayor Fleuriot, and the national agent Payan, were equally prepared to become his instruments. Add to these individuals the president of the tribunal Dumas, the vice-president Coffinhal, and the other judges and jurymen, and an idea may be formed of the means wielded by Robespierre within the city of Paris. Should the committees and the convention discard his influence, he had only to complain and excite a movement at the Jacobin Club, impart that movement to the commune, procure a declaration by the municipal body that the people resumed their sovereign powers, draw out the sections, and send Henriot to demand from the convention fifty or sixty deputies. Dumas and Coffinhal, with the entire tribunal, were afterwards ready to dispatch the deputies whom Henriot had obtained by violence. All the means, in short, of another 31st of May, more prompt and sure than the former, were in his hands. Accordingly, his partisans and sycophants collected around him, and earnestly besought him to assume the offensive. Henriot offered the services of his columns, and promised to be more energetic than on the 2d of June. Robespierre, who preferred to use oratory as his most effective agent, and still deemed that favourite resource equal to the exigency, resolved to wait. He relied upon discrediting the committees by his retirement and by his speeches at the Jacobin Club, and proposed eventually to seize a fitting moment for openly attacking them in the convention. He continued, notwithstanding his species of abdication, to direct the tribunal, and to exercise an active police system by means of the peculiar department he had instituted. He thereby subjected his opponents to a vigilant scrutiny, and gained intimation of all their proceedings. He allowed himself at the present juncture somewhat more relaxation than had ever been usual with him. He visited an agreeable country residence, situated at Maisons-Alfort, three leagues from Paris, which was occupied by a family attached to his fortunes. Thither many of his partisans accompanied him—Dumas, Coffinhal, Payan, and Fleuriot. Henriot, likewise, often repaired to the villa with all his aides-de-camps, scouring the roads five abreast and at full gallop, prostrating any wayfarers who chanced to encounter them, and spreading terror through the district by their presence. The hosts and friends of Robespierre caused him, by their indiscretion, to be suspected of more dangerous projects than he meditated, or had indeed the courage to form. When in Paris, he was always surrounded by the same individuals, and moreover followed at intervals by sundry Jacobins, or jurymen of the tribunal, his zealous adherents, who carried clubs and concealed arms, and were ready to fly to his aid on the first signal of danger. They were called his body-guards.

On their side, Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, monopolised the administration of affairs, and, in the absence of their rival, secured the co-operation of Carnot, Robert Lindet, and Prieur-de-la-Côte-d'Or. A common interest attracted to them the committee of general safety; but, at the same time, they deemed it expedient to proceed with profound reserve. Their endeavours were directed to gradually diminish the power of their adversary by reducing the armed force of Paris. There existed forty-eight companies of artillerymen, belonging to the forty-eight sections, perfectly organised, and having at all periods evinced the most revolutionary spirit. They had always declared for the cause of insurrection, from the 10th of August to the 31st May. A decree ordained that, provided one-half at least of this force were left in Paris, the remainder might be moved elsewhere. Billaud and Collot enjoined the president of the commission for army movements to march the permitted number successively towards the frontiers. In all their operations they veiled as much as possible from Couthon, who, not having retired like Robespierre, observed them sedulously, and greatly incommoded them. In this posture of affairs, Billaud, ever morose and melancholy, seldom quitted Paris; but the gay and voluptuous Barrère resorted to Passy with the principal members of the committee of general safety, the elder Vadier, Vouland, and Amar. They met under the roof of Dupin, an old farmer-general, celebrated under the royalty for his table, and in the revolution for the report which consigned the farmers-general to death. There they abandoned themselves to pleasure and indulgence with beautiful females, and Barrère exercised his wit against the "pontiff of the Supreme Being, the first prophet, the beloved son of the mother of God." After thus revelling in enjoyment, they left the arms of their courtezans to return to Paris, swimming with blood and torn with intestine rivalries.

On their part, the veteran members of the Mountain, who felt themselves in jeopardy, kept up a secret intercourse with each other, and endeavoured to arrange a general confederacy. The generous woman who had attached herself to Tallien at Bordeaux, and had wrested from him numberless victims, urged him from the recesses of her prison to smite the tyrant. With Tallien, Lecointre, Bourdon-de-l'Oise, Thuriot, Panis, Barras, Freron, and Monestier, had united Guffroy, the denouncer of Lebon, Dubois-Crancé, compromised at the siege of Lyons and detested by Couthon, and Fouché of Nantes, who had quarrelled with Robespierre, and drawn upon himself the reproach of not having acted in a sufficiently patriotic manner at Lyons. Tallien and Lecointre were the boldest and most impatient. Fouché was especially dreaded for his skill in weaving and managing an intrigue, and against him the wrath of the triumvirs was most violently excited.

On occasion of an address from the Jacobins of Lyons to those of Paris, in which they grievously complained of their existing condition, the recent history of that unfortunate city was reviewed. Couthon denounced Dubois-Crancé, as he had done some months previously, accused him of having allowed Précy to escape, and caused him to be erased from the list of Jacobins. Robespierre assailed Fouché, and imputed to him the devices which had induced the patriot Gaillard to commit suicide. He procured a resolution that Fouché should be summoned before the society to justify his conduct. It was less the intrigues of Fouché at Lyons than at Paris that Robespierre feared and wished to punish. Fouché, sensible of his peril, addressed an evasive letter to the Jacobins, and entreated them to suspend their judgment, until the committee, to which he had submitted his conduct and all vindicatory documents, had delivered its sentence. "It is astonishing," exclaimed Robespierre, "that Fouché now invokes the aid of the convention against the Jacobins. Does he dread the eyes and ears of the people? Is he apprehensive lest his discomfited countenance proclaims his guilt? Or is he fearful lest the scrutinising glances of six thousand patriots, fixed on him, detect his soul in his eyes, and in spite of nature, which has shrouded them, therein read his thoughts? The conduct of Fouché is that of a conscious criminal; you cannot longer retain him in your society; he ought to be excluded." Fouché was forthwith expelled, as had happened to Dubois-Crancé. Thus the storm was gathering more loweringly over the menaced Mountaineers, and on all sides the horizon was darkened with clouds.

Amidst this portentous gloom, the members of the committees, who feared Robespierre, would willingly have preferred a mutual explanation and compromise, rather than incur the hazard of a dangerous conflict. Robespierre had summoned his young colleague Saint-Just, who had immediately returned from the army. After his arrival, a meeting was proposed with the view of effecting a reconciliation. Robespierre took much entreaty ere he consented to an interview: at length he yielded, and the two committees assembled. Reciprocal complaints were urged with infinite rancour. Robespierre spoke of himself with his accustomed arrogance, inveighed against secret conclaves, descanted on the condign punishment merited by conspiring deputies, censured all the operations of the government, and found every department delinquent—civil administration, war, and finance. Saint-Just supported Robespierre, pronounced on him a magniloquent eulogium, and concluded by declaring that the last hope of the foreigner rested on dividing the government. In corroboration of this averment, he cited the testimony of an officer taken prisoner before Maubeuge. According to this officer, the enemy was waiting until a more moderate party overthrew the revolutionary government and gave predominance to other principles. Saint-Just relied upon this fact to demonstrate more incontestibly the necessity of mutual forbearance, and of proceeding henceforth in concord. The adversaries of Robespierre willingly acquiesced in the soundness of this doctrine, but would consent to act upon it only so far as consisted with their own pre-eminence in the government; whilst, to attain the object in view, all the demands of Robespierre must be conceded, and such preliminaries were utterly incompatible with their views. The members of the committee of general safety complained bitterly that their functions had been wrested from them; Elie-Lacoste was hardy enough to affirm that Couthon, Saint-Just, and Robespierre, formed a committee within the committees, and even ventured to mention the word "triumvirate." Nevertheless, certain concessions were yielded on both sides. Robespierre agreed to confine his department of general police to a superintendence over the agents of the committee of public welfare; and, in return, his opponents consented to intrust Saint-Just with the preparation of a report to the convention upon the interview that had taken place. In this report, as may be surmised, any avowal of the divisions that had existed in the committees was to be avoided: its topics were to be the commotion into which public opinion had been thrown in recent times, and the course the government proposed to follow for the future. Billaud and Collot maliciously intimated that any undue amplification concerning the Supreme Being would be objectionable, as Robespierre's pontificate was for ever recurring to their recollection. At the same time, Billaud, with his gloomy and misgiving demeanour, assured Robespierre that he had never been his enemy; and the committees separated, appearing somewhat less divided than formerly, but far from establishing a sincere union. Such a reconciliation, in truth, could have nothing real in its elements, for the same ambition remained to actuate either party; it was one of those efforts at negotiation made by all parties before coming to a final rupture. It recalled the famous Lamourette kiss, and the various reconciliations attempted between the Constitutionalists and the Girondists, between the Girondists and the Jacobins, between Danton and Robespierre.

If, however, it failed to restore harmony amongst the members of the committees, it greatly alarmed the Mountaineers. They feared their destruction would be the pledge of peace, and strove anxiously to ascertain the actual conditions of the treaty. Elie-Lacoste, Dubarran, and Moyse-Bayle, the most estimable members of the committee of general safety, hastened to remove their apprehensions, tranquillising them with the assurance that no sacrifice had been arranged. The fact was true, and formed one of the reasons which prevented the possibility of a perfect adjustment of differences. Nevertheless, Barrère, who laboured to inculcate the belief that concord prevailed, asserted in his daily reports that the members of the government were cordially united, that they had been unjustly accused of not being so, and that they were directing their common efforts to render the republic universally victorious. He pretended to assume the reproaches levelled at the triumvirs as aimed against all, and he repelled such imputations as criminal slanders equally injurious to both committees. "Amidst the shouts of victory," he said, "dull murmurs are heard, dark calumnies are propagated, subtle poisons are infused into the journals, disastrous plots are devised, factitious discontents are fanned, and the government is perpetually harassed, fettered in its operations, perplexed in its movements, calumniated in its motives, and menaced in its component members. What, notwithstanding, has it accomplished?" And Barrère proceeded to repeat the usual enumeration of the labours and services of the government.

CHAPTER XXXV

OPERATIONS OF THE ARMY OF THE NORTH TOWARDS THE MIDDLE OF 1794.—CAPTURE OF YPRES.—BATTLE OF FLEURUS.—OCCUPATION OF BRUSSELS.—LAST DAYS OF THE REIGN OF TERROR.—8TH AND 9TH THERMIDOR; ARREST AND EXECUTION OF ROBESPIERRE AND HIS CONFEDERATES.—PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION FROM 1789 TO THE 9TH THERMIDOR.

Whilst Barrère was thus diligently employed in throwing a veil over the dissension in the committees, Saint-Just, despite the report he had been charged to frame, returned to the army, where important events were passing. The movements commenced on both wings had been arduously prosecuted. Pichegru had continued his operations on the Lys and the Scheldt, and Jourdan had opened his on the Sambre. Profiting by the defensive attitude which Cobourg had assumed at Tournay, since the engagements of Turcoing and Pont-à-Chin, Pichegru projected an attack on Clairfayt separately. But not venturing to advance so far as Thielt, he resolved to commence the siege of Ypres, in the double hope of drawing Clairfayt upon him and of taking that fortress, which would consolidate the establishment of the French in West Flanders. Clairfayt was awaiting reinforcements, and made no movement in advance. Pichegru accordingly pushed the siege with such vigour, that Cobourg and Clairfayt felt it incumbent to quit their respective positions, with the view of relieving the besieged place. To prevent Cobourg from pursuing this intention, Pichegru directed a sortie of troops from Lille, and so threatening a demonstration to be made on Orchies, that Cobourg was detained at Tournay. In the interim, he himself moved forward and bore rapidly on Clairfayt, who was advancing towards Rousselaer and Hooglede. His prompt and well-conceived movements again provided him with an opportunity of defeating Clairfayt apart from his allies. By an unlucky chance, a division mistook the route, and Clairfayt had time to retrograde to his camp at Thielt, after suffering a trifling loss. But three days subsequently, on the 25th Prairial (13th June), having received the reinforcement he expected, he suddenly deployed in front of the French columns with 30,000 men. The French soldiers ran eagerly to arms, but the right division, being attacked with great impetuosity, disbanded, leaving the left division uncovered on the plateau of Hooglede. Macdonald commanded this left division. He contrived to uphold it against the repeated attacks in front and flank to which it was long exposed, and by this courageous resistance he afforded time to the brigade of Devinthier to rejoin him, and then obliged Clairfayt to retire with considerable loss. This was the fifth occasion on which Clairfayt, badly supported, had sustained a defeat from the army of the North. The action, so honourable to Macdonald's division, decided the fate of the besieged fortress. Four days afterwards, 29th Prairial (17th June), Ypres opened its gates, and a garrison of 7000 men laid down its arms. Cobourg was on the point of proceeding to the aid of Ypres and Clairfayt, when he learnt it was too late. The events occurring on the Sambre then constrained him to diverge towards the opposite extremity of the theatre of war. He left the Duke of York on the Scheldt, Clairfayt at Thielt, and marched with all the Austrian troops on Charleroi. This was a complete separation between the principal powers, England and Austria, who stood upon indifferent terms, and whose very distinct interests were now illustrated in a most striking manner. The English remained in Flanders, towards the maritime provinces, and the Austrians hastened towards their threatened communications. Their separation tended to augment their misunderstanding. The Emperor of Germany had retired to Vienna, disgusted with so unsuccessful a war; and Mack, perceiving his plans subverted, once more quitted the imperial staff.

We narrated the arrival of Jourdan from the Moselle at Charleroi, precisely as the French, repulsed for the third time, were repassing the Sambre in disorder. After allowing a few days' respite to the troops, of whom one portion was dejected at its discomfitures and the other wearied by its rapid march, an alteration was made in their organisation. The divisions of Desjardins and Charbonnier were incorporated with those arrived from the Moselle into a single army, called the army of the Sambre and Meuse, which amounted to about 66,000 men, and was placed under the orders of Jourdan. A division of 15,000 men, commanded by Schérer, was left to guard the Sambre, from Thuin to Maubeuge.

Jourdan resolved immediately to cross the Sambre and invest Charleroi. The division of Hatry was appointed to attack the place, whilst the bulk of the army should encompass it to protect the siege. Charleroi is situated on the Sambre. Beyond its circuit sweeps a range of positions in the form of a semicircle, the extremities whereof rest on the Sambre. These positions are by no means advantageous, because the semicircle they describe is ten leagues in extent, and because, moreover, they are unconnected with one another, and have a stream in the rear. Kléber, with the left, stretched from the Sambre to Orchies and Traségnies, and guarded the rivulet of the Piéton, which traversed the debatable ground, and flowed into the Sambre. In the centre, Morlot occupied Gosselies; Championnet pushed forward between Hépignies and Wagné; Lefebvre held Wagné, Fleurus, and Lambusart. Lastly, on the right, Marceau extended in front of the wood of Campinaire, and carried the line to the Sambre. Jourdan, sensible of the disadvantages attending these positions, determined to vacate them; and in order to accomplish that object, proposed to take the initiative in an attack on the morning of the 28th Prairial (16th June). Cobourg had not yet moved on this point; he was still at Tournay, contemplating the defeat of Clairfayt and the capture of Ypres. The Prince of Orange, detached towards Charleroi, commanded the army of the allies. He resolved on his part to anticipate the attack wherewith he was menaced; and, at dawn on the 28th, his troops, distributed in order of battle, compelled the French to sustain the conflict on the ground they occupied. Four columns, arrayed against the right and centre, had already penetrated into the wood of Campinaire, where Marceau was stationed, wrested Fleurus from Lefebvre and Hépignies from Championnet, and were proceeding to drive Morlot from Pont-à-Migneloup on Gosselies, when Jourdan, hastening opportunely with a reserve of cavalry, stopped the fourth column by a fortunate charge, rallied Morlot's troops into their positions, and restored the battle in the centre. On the left, Wartensleben had made similar progress towards Traségnies. But Kléber, by the most skilful and prompt dispositions, retook Traségnies, and then, seizing the critical moment, turned Wartensleben, repulsed him beyond the Piéton, and prepared to pursue him on his two columns. So far the battle was maintained with advantage, and even victory was about to declare for the French, when the Prince of Orange, concentrating his two first columns towards Lambusart, on the point connecting the extreme right of the French with the Sambre, threatened their communications. Thereupon the right and the centre were constrained to retrograde. Kléber, abandoning his victorious march, protected the retreat with his division. It was effected in good order. Such was the affair of the 28th (16th June). This was the fourth time the French had been obliged to repass the Sambre; but on this occasion it happened in a manner more honourable to their arms. Jourdan gave way to no dejection. He again cleared the Sambre a few days subsequently, resumed his positions of the 28th, re-invested Charleroi, and caused it to be bombarded with extreme vigour.

Cobourg, apprised of these new operations on the part of Jourdan, at length approached the Sambre. It behoved the French to take Charleroi before the reinforcements expected by the imperialists came up. The engineer Marescot pushed on the works so briskly, that in eight days the fire from the town was silenced, and all prepared for an assault. On the 7th Messidor (26th June), the commandant dispatched an officer with a letter proposing a parley. Saint-Just, who still exercised supremacy in the French camp, refused to open the letter, and dismissed the messenger with these words—"It is not a rag of paper, but the town we want!" The garrison marched out of the place the same evening, at the very moment Cobourg arrived in sight of the French lines. The surrender of Charleroi remained unknown to the enemy. The possession of the fastness materially strengthened the French position, and rendered the battle about to be fought, with a river in the rear, infinitely less dangerous. The division of Hatry, now left at liberty, was moved to Ransart, to reinforce the centre; and all was made ready for a decisive action the following day, the 8th Messidor (27th June).

The French positions were the same as on the 28th Prairial (16th June). Kléber commanded on the left, ranging from the Sambre to Traségnies. Morlot, Championnet, Lefebvre, and Marceau, formed the centre and the right, and extended from Gosselies to the Sambre. Intrenchments had been thrown up at Hépignies, to protect the centre. Cobourg directed his attack on the whole of this semicircle, instead of making a concentric effort on one of the extrémities, on the right for example, and seizing the passages of the Sambre.

The battle began on the morning of the 8th Messidor. The Prince of Orange and General Latour, who confronted Kléber on the left, repulsed the French columns, and drove them through the wood of Monceaux, even to the banks of the Sambre, to Marchienne-au-Pont. Kléber, who had been fortunately stationed on the left to direct all the divisions in that wing, immediately hastened to the threatened point, planted batteries on the heights, enveloped the Austrians in the wood of Monceaux, and caused them to be assailed on all sides. They having ascertained, on approaching the Sambre, that Charleroi was in possession of the French, began to evince hesitation; Kléber quickly profited thereby, charged them vigorously, and expelled them from the vicinity of Marchienne-au-Pont. Whilst Kléber thus extricated one of the wings, Jourdan acted as efficiently for the safety of the centre and right. Morlot, who was in advance of Gosselies, had maintained a lengthened contest with General Kwasdanovich, and attempted several times to turn him, but had been ultimately out-manœuvred and turned himself. He fell back on Gosselies, after efforts highly honourable to his courage and capacity. Championnet resisted with equal pertinacity, supported by the redoubt of Hépignies; but the corps of Kaunitz having advanced to turn the redoubt, at the moment a false report announced the retreat of Lefebvre on the right, Championnet, deceived by the intelligence, retrograded, and had already evacuated the redoubt, when Jourdan, spying the danger, detached a part of Hatry's division placed in reserve, enabled Hépignies to be recovered, and ordered his cavalry to charge into the plain upon the Austrian troops. Whilst on either side repeated onslaughts were making with unusual fury in this quarter, a still more violent conflict raged near the Sambre, at Wagné and Lambusart. Beaulieu, ascending simultaneously the two banks of the Sambre to assail the French extreme right, had repulsed Marceau's division. This division fled in all haste through the woods which skirt the Sambre, and even crossed the river in disorder. Thereupon Marceau gathered certain battalions around him, and, without heeding the remainder of his fugitive division, threw himself into Lambusart, determined to die rather than abandon that post, contiguous to the Sambre, and indispensable as a base to the extreme right. Lefebvre, who was stationed at Wagné, Hépignies, and Lambusart, recalled his advanced posts from Fleurus to Wagné, and detached some troops on Lambusart to support Marceau. That place then became the decisive point of the battle. Beaulieu perceived its critical importance, and directed thither a third column. Jourdan, attentive to the danger, also dispatched to the scene the remainder of his reserve. The opposing forces contended around the village of Lambusart with extraordinary fierceness. The fire was so continuous that the volleys were no longer distinguishable. The forage and casks in the camp ignited, and the battle proceeded amidst the blaze of a conflagration. Eventually the republicans remained masters of Lambusart.

At this moment, the French, repulsed in the early part of the day, had succeeded in restoring the combat on all points: Kléber had covered the Sambre on the left; Morlot, driven back to Gosselies, had there stood his ground; Championnet had retaken Hépignies, and a furious encounter at Lambusart had ended in securing that position. The close of day drew nigh. Beaulieu had learned on the Sambre the fact already known to the Prince of Orange—the occupation of Charleroi by the French. Thereupon Cobourg, not venturing to persist, ordered a general retreat.

Such was this decisive battle, one of the most vigorously contested in the campaign, and fought on a semicircular range of ten leagues, between two armies of about eighty thousand men each. It was called the battle of Fleurus, although that village had borne a very secondary part in the affray, because the Duke of Luxumbourg had already illustrated the name under Louis XIV. Although its results in immediate acquisition were inconsiderable, and the victory itself only amounted to a defeated attack, it determined the retreat of the Austrians, and thereby led to vast consequences.* The Austrians were incapacitated from hazarding another engagement. They must at all events have effected a preliminary junction with the Duke of York or with Clairfayt, and both those generals were occupied in the north by Pichegru. Moreover, threatened on the Meuse, it became essential for them to retrograde, to avoid compromising their communications. From that instant the retreat of the allies was general, and they resolved to concentrate their strength on Brussels, in order to cover that city.

The campaign was manifestly decided; but a delusion of the committee of public welfare prevented such prompt and considerable advantages being derived as might have been reasonably hoped. Pichegru had formed a plan, unquestionably the best of all his military conceptions. The Duke of York was on the Scheldt parallel with Tournay, and Clairfayt, far removed, at Thielt in Flanders. Pichegru, intent on his design of destroying Clairfayt separately, proposed to pass the Scheldt at Oudenarde, thus isolate Clairfayt from the Duke of York, and once more engage him apart from his allies. Afterwards he purposed, whilst the Duke of York, finding himself alone, should be pondering on a junction with Cobourg, to overwhelm him in his turn, and eventually take Cobourg in the rear, or unite with Jourdan. This plan, which, besides the advantage of exposing the Duke of York and Clairfayt to isolated attacks, possessed the merit of attracting all the French forces towards the Meuse, was counteracted by a remarkably stupid conceit of the committee of public welfare. Carnot had been persuaded to send Admiral Venstabel with troops for disembarkation in the isle of Walcheren, with the view of exciting insurrectionary movements in Holland. In order to favour this scheme, Carnot enjoined Pichegru to meander with his army along the shore of the ocean, and seize upon all the ports in West Flanders; he moreover directed Jourdan to detach 16,000 men from his army for the purpose of assisting in this maritime demonstration. This last order was especially irrational and dangerous. The generals demonstrated its absurdity to Saint-Just, and it was not executed; but Pichegru found himself under the necessity of moving towards the sea, under a mandate to capture Bruges and Ostend, whilst Moreau should take possession of Nieuport.

The operations were prosecuted on both wings simultaneously. Pichegru left Moreau, with a portion of the army, to besiege Nieuport and Sluys, and with the residue forcibly occupied Bruges, Ostend and Ghent. He subsequently advanced towards Brussels, whither Jourdan was progressing on his side. The only resistance offered to the French consisted in conflicts with the allies' rearguards; and at length, on the 22d Messidor (10th July), their vanguard entered the capital of the Low Countries. A few days afterwards, the two armies of the North and the Sambre and Meuse accomplished their junction. The event was one of paramount importance: one hundred and fifty thousand French troops concentrated in the capital of the Low Countries, might from that point fall with terrific effect on the discomfited armies of Europe, which, repulsed on all sides, were flying to regain the sea or the Rhine, as their homes pointed. The fastnesses of Condé, Landrecies, Valenciennes, and Le Quesnoy, which the allies had previously taken, were forthwith invested; and the convention, pretending that the deliverance of the territory superseded all laws, decreed that if the garrisons did not immediately surrender, they should be put to the edge of the sword. It had already passed a decree, enacting that no more English prisoners should be made, in order thereby to avenge all the wrongs of Pitt towards France. The French soldiers abstained from executing the decree. A sergeant having taken some English soldiers, conducted them to an officer. "Why hast thou taken them?" said the officer to him. "Because they make so many shots the less to receive," replied the sergeant. "True," responded the officer; "but the representatives will compel you to shoot them." "It will not be we who will shoot them," retorted the sergeant; "send them to the representatives, and, if they are barbarians, let them kill and eat them too if they please."

* It is an error to attribute the great effect produced on public opinion in France by the battle of Fleurus to the interest of a faction. The Robespierrian faction had, on the contrary, excellent reasons for disparaging at the moment the effect of victories, as will be shortly made apparent. The battle of Fleurus opened Belgium and Brussels to the French, and this it was which caused its reputation.

Thus the French armies, at the beginning, had directed their efforts against the enemy's centre, and, finding it too strong, subsequently divided into two wings, and diverged, the one upon the Lys and the other upon the Sambre. Pichegru had first defeated Clairfayt at Moucroën and Courtray, then Cobourg and the Duke of York at Turcoing, and finally Clairfayt again at Hooglede. After several abortive passages over the Sambre, Jourdan had marched to that locality, in pursuance of a brilliant conception of Carnot, and decided the success of the right wing at Fleurus. From that moment, overpowered on the two wings, the allies had abandoned the Low Countries to the French. Such was the campaign. Its astonishing success was the theme of universal congratulation. The victory of Fleurus, the occupation of Charleroi, Ypres, Tournay, Oudenarde, Ostend, Bruges, Ghent, and Brussels, and the junction of the armies in that capital, were extolled as veritable prodigies. Such achievements, however, were by no means grateful to Robespierre, who saw, with secret mortification, the reputation of the committee increase, and especially that of Carnot, who, it must be allowed, was too inordinately lauded for the results of the campaign. All the good effected, all the glory reaped by the committees in Robespierre's absence, arose upbraidingly against him, and redounded to his discredit. A defeat, on the contrary, would have rekindled revolutionary fury, permitted him to accuse the committees of inertness or treachery, justified his retirement during the last four decades, conveyed a high idea of his foresight, and carried his power to the extreme verge. He had therefore placed himself in the most mournful of positions, that in which his country's reverses were desirable; and there can be no doubt he did anxiously desire them. It was not fitting he should either proclaim or allow to be detected this his disposition; but, despite himself, it was perceptible in his speeches. He laboured, when haranguing the Jacobins, to damp the enthusiasm which the successes of the republic inspired; he insinuated that the allies retreated now, as they had formerly done before Dumouriez, only to return the sooner and the stronger; and he held that, in momentarily removing from the frontiers, their design was merely to leave the nation a prey to the passions evolved by prosperity. He added, at the same time, "that victory over foreign armies was not such as should be most craved. The true victory," as he inferred, "was that which the friends of liberty gain over factions; such is the victory which recalls amongst nations peace, justice, and happiness. A nation is not rendered illustrious because it prostrates tyrants or enchains populations. This was the manner of the Romans and sundry other nations. Our destiny, incomparably more sublime, is to found on earth the empire of wisdom, justice, and virtue."*

Robespierre had absented himself from the committee since the latter days of Prairial. The first of Thermidor were now entered upon. For nearly forty days he had stood aloof from his colleagues; the time was come for taking a decided part. His confidants openly affirmed that another 31st of May was necessary; Dumas, Henriot, Payan, and their associates, urged him unceasingly to give the signal. But he neither partook their predilection for violent methods, nor shared their brutal impatience. Accustomed to effect his purposes by oratory, and shrinking from a violation of legality, he preferred the experiment of a discourse, wherein he should denounce the committees and demand their reconstruction. If by this peaceful course he succeeded, he became absolute master, without danger or commotion. If he failed, his trial of the gentle mode did not preclude recourse to violent expedients, nay, on the contrary, it would stimulate their adoption. The 31st of May had been preceded by multitudinous harangues and respectful addresses, and it was only after solicitation proved fruitless that coercion had been applied. He resolved, therefore, to follow the precedent of that celebrated occasion: in the first place to instigate the presentation of a petition by the Jacobins, then to pronounce a studied oration, and lastly, to introduce Saint-Just with a report. If this demonstration were insufficient, he had all his resources intact—the Jacobins, the commune, and the armed force of Paris. But he really hoped to avoid the necessity of renewing the scene of the 2d of June. He lacked the requisite audacity, and still entertained too much respect for the convention to desire so desperate a proceeding.

For some time he had been assiduously preparing a voluminous harangue, in which he taxed his ingenuity to unfold the abuses of the government, and to fasten upon his colleagues all the calamities attributed to it. He wrote to Saint-Just, urging his return from the army; he detained his brother, who ought to have departed for the Italian frontier; he appeared every day at the Jacobins', and made every disposition for the attack. As always happens in critical conjunctures, various incidents tended to augment the general excitement. A man, by name Magenthies, presented an absurd petition, craving the penalty of death against all who should indulge in imprecations which profaned the name of God. Moreover, a revolutionary committee imprisoned as suspected persons certain operatives who had contrived to get intoxicated. These two circumstances occasioned various rumours to the prejudice of Robespierre. Amongst other things, it was sneeringly observed that his Supreme Being promised to become more oppressive than the religion of Christ, and that the inquisition would be shortly seen revived for behoof of deism. Alive to the danger of such accusations, he hastened to denounce Magenthies before the Jacobins as an aristocrat suborned by the foreigner to disparage the creed promulgated by the convention; he even procured his consignment to the revolutionary tribunal. Furthermore, availing himself of his board of police, he caused all the members of the offending revolutionary committee to be lodged in prison.

The approach of the catastrophe was felt, and it would seem that the members of the committee of public welfare, Barrère in particular, desired to make peace with their redoubtable colleague; but he had become so exorbitant, that any compromise was absolutely impossible. Barrère, returning home one evening with a friend, said to him, as he threw himself on a sofa, "This Robespierre is insatiable! Let him demand Tallien, Bourdon-de-l'Oise, Thuriot, Guffroy, Rovère, Lecointre, Panis, Barras, Fréron, Legendre, Monestier, Dubois-Crancé, Fouché, Cam-bon, and all the Danton squad—so be it; but Duval, Audouin, Léonard-Bourdon, Vadier, Vouland—it is impossible to consent!" We see, then, that Robespierre required the sacrifice of sundry members of the committee of general safety, whereby all prospect of accommodation was precluded; to break and run the chances of the struggle was henceforth unavoidable. However, not one of Robespierre's adversaries had sufficient daring to take the initiative. The members of the committees waited to be denounced, and the proscribed Mountaineers until their heads were actually demanded; all, in short, resolved to let the attack be made on them before taking measures of defence; and they acted reasonably. It was politic to allow Robespierre to commence the engagement, and compromise himself in the opinion of the convention by a demand for additional proscriptions. Then they would be in the position of men defending not only their own lives but those of others; for if another sacrifice were to be offered up, no limit could be assigned to the execrable system.

All was arranged, and the first movements began on the 3d Thermidor at the Jacobin Club. Amongst the confidants of Robespierre was a person named Sijas, an adjunct to the commission for army movements. This commission was obnoxious for having ordered the successive departure of several companies of artillerymen, and thus reduced the armed force of Paris. A direct accusation for so doing was not yet to be ventured upon; but Sijas assailed the president of the commission, Pyle, for the secrecy in which he enveloped his proceedings, and discharged upon him the vituperation he dared not utter against Carnot or the committee of public welfare. Sijas maintained that only one resource was available, namely, to address the convention, and submit a formal charge against Pyle. Another Jacobin denounced an agent of the committee of general safety. Thereupon Couthon ascended the tribune, and said it was necessary to strike higher, and present an address to the National Convention on all the machinations which were once more threatening liberty. "I invite you," he proceeded, "to submit your reflections to it. It is pure; it will not allow itself to be subjugated by four or five miscreants. As to myself, I affirm they will never subjugate me." Couthon's proposition was forthwith adopted. The petition was framed, approved on the 5th, and presented to the convention on the 7th Thermidor.

The style of this petition was, as usual, respectful in form but imperious in substance. It stated that the Jacobins "came to repose in the bosom of the convention the solicitudes of the people." It repeated the customary declamations against the foreigner and his accomplices, against the system of indulgence, against the alarms disseminated for the purpose of dividing the national representation, against the efforts made to render the worship of God ridiculous, &c. It contained no specific conclusions, but ended in general terms —"You will make traitors, knaves, and intriguers, tremble; you will reassure the honest; you will maintain that union which constitutes your strength; you will preserve in all its purity that sublime creed whereof every citizen is a minister, whose only practice is virtue; and the people, confiding in you, will place their duty and glory in respecting and defending their representatives to the death." This was intimating sufficiently explicitly—"You will do what Robespierre shall dictate, or you will be neither respected nor defended." The perusal of this petition was heard in sullen silence. No reply was given. Immediately after its presentation, Dubois-Crancé appeared in the tribune, and, without alluding to the petition or to the Jacobins, complained of the rancour with which he had been assailed during the last six months, and of the injustice rendered to his services, concluding with a motion that the committee of public welfare should be charged to draw up a report on his conduct, although in that committee, as he said, were two of his accusers. He further moved that such report be presented within three days. His demands were acceded to, without eliciting a single remark, amidst a continued silence. Barrère succeeded him in the tribune. He brought up a grand report on the comparative state of France in July 1793 and July 1794. It is certain a prodigious difference existed; and that if the France, convulsed at once by royalists, federalists, and foreigners, were compared with the France victorious on all the frontiers and mistress of the Low Countries, a tribute of approbation to the government which had effected such a change in one year could scarcely be withheld The only manner in which Barrère ventured indirectly to attack Robespierre, was by extolling the committee; he even expressly commended him in his report. Referring to the insidious agitation notoriously prevailing, and to the reprehensible clamour of certain perturbators who upheld the necessity of a second 31st of May, he said, "That a representative who enjoyed a well-merited reputation for patriotism, founded on a service of five years, and on steadfast principles of independence and liberty, had controverted with energy those counter-revolutionary doctrines." The convention, after hearing this report, separated under the foreboding impression of some imminent catastrophe. The members observed each other in silent distrustfulness, daring neither to offer nor to seek explanations.

On the following day, the 8th Thermidor, Robespierre determined to pronounce his famous discourse. All his agents were apprized and on the alert, and Saint-Just arrived in the course of the day. The convention, on beholding Robespierre appear in that tribune he so rarely mounted, prepared for a decisive scene. He was received in gloomy stillness. "Citizens," he said, "let others sketch flattering pictures for you; I come to tell you useful truths. I am not come to realise the absurd alarms circulated by perfidy; but I wish to extinguish, if possible, the flames of discord by the mere force of truth. I am about to defend before you your own outraged authority and violated liberty. I am about to defend myself: you will not be surprised thereat. You bear no similitude to the tyrants whom you combat. The cries of oppressed innocence importune not your ears; and this cause, you are aware, is not foreign to yourselves." Robespierre subsequently alluded to the agitation that had existed for some time, to the fears sedulously propagated, and to the projects attributed to the committee and himself against the convention. "We," he exclaimed, "attack the convention! And what are we without it? Who has vindicated it at the peril of his life? Who has devoted himself to rescue it from the thraldom of factions?" Robespierre answered that it was he who had done these things; in corroboration whereof he adduced his defence of the convention against sundry factions, and his tearing from its pale Brissot, Vergniaud, Gensonné, Pétion, Barbaroux, Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, &c. After the proofs of zealous devotion he had given, he was amazed at sinister reports having crept into circulation. "Is it then true," he said, "that detestable lists have been hawked about, wherein several members of the convention were marked for victims, and that the work was asserted to be the committee's, and ultimately mine? Is it true that sittings of the committee, rigorous ordinances which never existed, and arrests not less chimerical, have been audaciously invented? Is it true that attempts have been made to persuade irreproachable representatives that their destruction was resolved upon?—to persuade all those, in short, who, acted upon by any terror, had yielded an involuntary tribute to human frailty, that they were to undergo the fate of conspirators? Is it true that the imposture has been maintained with such art and effrontery, that a number of

He proceeded to complain that accusations, first directed against the committees in the aggregate, had eventually settled on him alone. He averred that his name was connected with whatever of evil was perpetrated in the government. If patriots were imprisoned instead of aristocrats, it was said—"It is Robespierre who so resolves:" if any patriots had fallen victims, it was said—"It is Robespierre who has so ordained:" if the numerous agents of the committee of general safety extended the sphere of their vexations and rapine, it was stated—"It is Robespierre who sends them:" if a new law harassed annuitants, it was said—"It is Robespierre who ruins them." He affirmed that he had been represented as the author of all calamities, with the view of injuring him in public estimation; that he had been called a tyrant; and that, on the day of the festival to the Supreme Being—"that day whereon the convention smote at one blow atheism and priestly despotism, and attached to the revolution all generous hearts—that day, in short, of felicity and holy rapture"—the president of the National Convention, speaking to the assembled population, had been insulted by guilty men; and that those men were deputies. He had been called a tyrant!—and wherefore? Because he had acquired some influence by holding the language of truth. "And what do you seek," he exclaimed, "you who desire that truth should be without force in the mouths of the representatives of the French people? Truth, doubtless, has its power, its wrath, its despotism; it has its touching and terrible accents, which vibrate in hearts pure and spotless, as in consciences the most guilty, and falsehood can no more imitate it than Salmoneus the thunders of Heaven. But do you accuse the people, the nation therefore, who feels and loves it? Who am I that am thus accused? A slave of liberty—a living martyr of the republic—the victim as well as the enemy of crime? All knaves rail at me; the most indifferent and legitimate actions on the part of others, are crimes in me. A man is reviled the moment he forms an acquaintance with me: the delinquencies of others are pardoned; my zeal is converted into guilt. Take away my conscience, I am the most unfortunate of men; I do not even enjoy the rights of a citizen; nay, I am not permitted to fulfil the duties of a representative of the people!"

It was by such vague and artful declamations that Robespierre sought to defend himself, and, for the first time, he found the convention sullen, silent, and, as it were, impatient under the infliction of his verbosity. He came at length to the more stirring part of his theme—accusation. Assailing all parts of the government, he first censured the financial system with diabolical perfidy. Himself the author of the law of the 22d Prairial, he descanted in a strain of deep commiseration on the law of annuities; indeed, against every measure, even to the maximum, he seemed to declare, by his assertion, that intriguers had entrapped the convention into violent expedients. "In whose hands," he asked, "are your finances? In the hands of Feuillants, of known rogues—Cambon, Mallarmé, Ramel." He subsequently adverted to the war department, and spoke with disdain of those victories "which had been described with academic levity, as if they had cost neither blood nor toil." "Be vigilant on victory," he exclaimed; "keep an eye on Belgium. Your enemies retire, and leave you to your intestine dissensions: beware the end of the campaign. Divisions have been sown amongst the generals; military aristocracy is protected; faithful generals are persecuted; the military administration surrounds itself with a suspicious authority. These truths countervail many epigrams." He said no more against Carnot and Barrère, leaving to Saint-Just the task of vituperating Carnot's plans. The crafty misanthrope, as we see, tinged every topic with the envious malignity rankling within him. He next proceeded to reprobate the committee of general safety, expatiating on the multitude of its agents, on their cruelties and on their exactions; he denounced Amar and Jagot for having monopolised the police, and for doing their utmost to discredit the revolutionary government. He complained of the sarcasms uttered in the tribune with respect to Catherine Théot, and affirmed that pretended conspiracies were imagined, in order to conceal real ones. He represented the two committees as abandoned to intrigues, and, to a certain extent, engaged in the schemes of the anti-national faction. In the entire existing state of things, he found nothing praiseworthy but the revolutionary government, and of that only the principle, not the execution. The principle was his; he it was who had instituted that government, whereas it was his adversaries who had corrupted it.

Such the purport and essence of Robespierre's voluminous harangue. He concluded with the following words in the nature of a summary:—"Let us acknowledge that a conspiracy exists against public liberty; that it owes its strength to a criminal coalition intriguing in the very heart of the convention; that this coalition has accomplices within the committee of general safety, and in the offices of that committee which they control; that the enemies of the republic have opposed this committee to the committee of public welfare, and thus constituted two governments; that certain members of the committee of public welfare participate in this plot; that the coalition thus formed seeks to ruin patriots and the country. What is the remedy for these evils? To punish the traitors, remodel the offices of the committee of general safety, purify that committee itself, and render it subordinate to the committee of public welfare; to purify the committee of public welfare as well, establish the government under the supreme authority of the National Convention, which is the centre and the judge, and thus crush all the factions by the weight of the national authority, in order to rear upon their ruins the sway of justice and liberty. Such are the essential principles. If it be impossible to uphold them without being esteemed ambitious, I will conclude that principles are proscribed, and that tyranny reigns amongst us, but not that I ought to conceal the fact; for what can be objected to a man who adheres to truth, and who knows how to die for his country? I was made to combat crime, not to govern it. The time is not yet arrived when honest men can serve the country with impunity!"

Robespierre had commenced his speech amid silence, and so concluded it. From every part of the hall all eyes were fixed on him, but not a sound escaped. Those deputies, formerly so eager and animated in their homage, had become suddenly congealed; they withheld all expression of their feelings, having seemingly found courage at least to remain cold and quiescent, since the tyrants, divided amongst themselves, had taken them as arbiters. An impenetrable reserve sat on every countenance. An indistinct murmur gradually arose in the assembly, but no member ventured for a while to address it. Lecointre of Versailles, one of the most energetic of Robespierre's antagonists, was the first to present himself, but merely in order to move the printing of the discourse, so egregiously did the boldest hesitate to enter upon the conflict. Bourdon-de-l'Oise presumed to oppose the motion, on the ground that the speech involved questions of too much gravity; and he moved its reference to the two committees. Barrère, always prudential, supported the original motion, maintaining that in a free country every thing ought to be printed. Couthon sprang to the tribune, indignant at the idea of a debate instead of an outburst of enthusiasm, and demanded not only the printing but the transmission to all the communes and all the armies. "He required to ease his afflicted heart," he said; "for during past days the deputies most faithful to the cause of the people had been steeped in odium; they were accused of shedding blood, of wishing to shed more; and yet, if he thought he had contributed to the destruction of one innocent person, he would sacrifice himself for grief." The vehemence of Couthon resuscitated the spirit of submission in the assembly; it voted the printing of the speech and its transmission to all the municipalities.

The adversaries of Robespierre seemed on the point of sustaining a signal discomfiture; but Vadier, Cambon, Billaud-Varennes, Panis, and Amar, hastily demanded leave to answer his invectives. The danger reanimated their drooping courage, and the decisive contest began. The greatest eagerness was evinced by them to occupy the tribune; insomuch, that it was found necessary to determine the order of their precedence. Vadier was first admitted to the privilege of explanation. He vindicated the committee of general safety, and upheld that the report on Catherine Théot had been framed for the purpose of unfolding a deep and veritable conspiracy, subjoining, in a significant tone, that he possessed documents sufficient to prove its importance and danger. Cambon, speaking with his natural impetuosity, warmly defended his financial measures, and likewise his probity, which was universally known and admired in a situation open to so many and great temptations. He showed that stock-jobbers alone could have been injured by his financial laws; and ultimately breaking through the reserve hitherto maintained—"It is time," he exclaimed, "to tell the whole truth. Is it I who ought to be accused of having rendered myself master in any thing? The man who has rendered himself master in all things, the man who paralyses your will, is he who has but recently spoken—Robespierre!" This energetic frankness disconcerted Robespierre: as if he had been charged with playing the tyrant in matters of finance, he remarked that he had never interfered in financial questions, and could not, therefore, have constrained the convention on such points; he moreover averred that, although assailing Cambon's plans, he had no intention to impeach his motives. He had, however, designated him a rogue. Billaud-Varennes, an equally formidable antagonist, maintained that the time was come for placing all truths on record; expatiated on Robespierre's retirement from the committees and on the removal of the companies of artillerymen, whereof but fifteen had been draughted from Paris, whilst the law sanctioned the displacement of twenty-four; and added that he would shortly tear away all masks, much preferring that his corpse should serve as a footstool to an ambitious character, rather than by his silence seem to authorise his projects. He moved the repeal of the decree which directed Robespierre's speech to be printed. Panis complained of the continual calumnies accredited by Robespierre, who, he alleged, had laboured to represent him as the author of the days of September; and he called upon Robespierre and Couthon to explain themselves as to the five or six deputies whose sacrifice they had for the last month been so incessantly demanding at the Jacobin Club. Instantly the same cry was repeated from all parts of the hall. Robespierre replied with hesitation, that he had come to unmask abuses, but had never undertaken to justify or accuse any particular individual. "Name, name the persons!" exclaimed the deputies. Robespierre again attempted to equivocate, and stated that "Whenever he had presumed to impress upon the convention counsels which he deemed advantageous, he gave no heed"—— He was interrupted. Charlier shouted to him, "You who pretend to have the courage of virtue, show you have that of truth. Name, name the individuals!" Great confusion ensued. Eventually the question of the printing was reconsidered. Amar insisted upon a remit of the speech to the committees. Barrère, perceiving the advantage of supporting those who advocated the reference to the committees, rose to excuse himself in some degree for having previously repudiated that proposition. At length the convention revoked its decision, and ordained that Robespierre's discourse, instead of being printed, should be referred to the examination of the two committees.

This sitting of the convention was at once a memorable and extraordinary event. The deputies had shaken off their habitual submission and resumed their pristine courage. Robespierre, who had always been devoid of true hardihood, and gifted only with an arrogant effrontery, was amazed, chagrined, and prostrated. He felt the necessity of encouragement, and hastened amongst his faithful Jacobins in quest of friends and to borrow assurance from their sympathy. They were already apprised of the result, and impatiently awaited his arrival. His appearance was the signal for vociferous plaudits. Couthon followed him, and received similar acclamations. The recitation of the speech was enthusiastically demanded. Robespierre gratified them by repeating it, an occupation in which he again consumed two mortal hours. At every paragraph he was interrupted by frantic exclamations and cheers. When he had concluded, he added a few words expressive of emotion and dejection. "This discourse you have just heard," he said to the Jacobins, "is my dying testament. I have ascertained it to-day; the league of the wicked is so strong that I cannot hope to escape it. I succumb without regret; I bequeath you my memory; it will be dear to you, and you will defend it." At these words they exclaimed there was no cause for fear or despair; that on the contrary they would avenge the father of the country on all the iniquitous united. Henriot, Dumas, Coffinhal, and Payan, surrounded him and declared themselves ready to act. Henriot stated that he still knew the road to the convention. "Separate the wicked from the weak," responded Robespierre; "deliver the convention from the miscreants who oppress it; render it the service it expects from you, as on the 31st May and 2d June. March—again save liberty! If, notwithstanding all such efforts, we must yield, so be it: my friends, you will see me drink the hemlock with composure." "Robespierre," shouted a deputy, "I will drink it with thee!" Couthon proposed to the society a new purifying scrutiny, and maintained that the deputies who had voted against Robespierre should be expelled on the instant: he had with him a list of their names, which he immediately submitted. His proposition was adopted amidst a deafening tumult. Collot-d'Herbois attempted to offer certain observations; he was overborne with outcries: he adverted to his services, his dangers, the two shots of Ladmiral; he was jeered, hooted, and driven from the tribune. All the deputies present and designated by Couthon were forced out, some by the agency of blows. Collot saved himself amid an array of daggers suspended over him. The club was that day swelled by all the men of action, who, in periods of commotion, gained admittance with spurious tickets or without having any. These united violence with clamour, and were even ready to add assassination. The national agent Payan, who was a man of execution, proposed a bold scheme. He urged that all the conspirators should be forthwith seized, which might have been accomplished, for those he so stigmatised were at that very moment gathered together in the committees of which they were members. The struggle would have been thus terminated without a conflict, by a sudden movement. Robespierre opposed the project; he was hostile to such prompt proceedings; he thought that all the precedents of the 31st May ought to be followed. A solemn petition had already been presented; he himself had delivered an oration; Saint-Just, who had but now arrived from the army, would make a report the following morning; he, Robespierre, would again speak, and, if all were unsuccessful, the magistrates of the people, assembled in the interim at the commune, and supported by the armed force of the sections, should proclaim that the people resumed their sovereignty, and advance to deliver the convention from the wretches who misled it. The plan was thus traced by precedents, as he demonstrated. The Jacobins separated with mutual pledges that, on the morrow, Robespierre should be in the convention, the Jacobins in their hall, the municipal magistrates at the commune, and Henriot at the head of the sections. They relied, moreover, on the youths in the school of Mars, whose commandant, Labretèche, was devoted to the cause of the commune.

Such was the day of the 8th Thermidor, the last of the sanguinary tyranny which had brooded so heavily on France. Still, on that day even, the horrible revolutionary system was in full activity. The tribunal sat, and victims were conducted to the scaffold. Among the number were two celebrated poets, Roucher, author of Les Mois, and young André Chenier, who left many admirable though unfinished pieces, and whom France has cause to regret, in association with all those young men of genius—orators, writers, and generals—prematurely cut off by the guillotine or the sword. Those two votaries of the Muses consoled each other in the fatal cart by repeating verses from Racine. Young André, on mounting the scaffold, uttered the complaint of genius arrested in its course: "To die so young!" he exclaimed, striking his forehead; "there was something here!" *

During the night which ensued, every quarter of Paris was the scene of agitation, and each party strove to collect its strength. The two committees were assembled, in deliberation on the events of the day, and on the prospects of the morrow. From what had occurred at the Jacobin Club, it was manifest that the mayor and Henriot would support the triumvirs, and that all the forces of the commune would have to be encountered in the hour of peril. The most prudent course in the option of the committees was to have ordered the arrest of those two leaders; but they still hesitated; they were swayed to and fro in pitiable vacillation; in sooth, they felt a species of regret at having commenced the contest. They reflected that, if the convention were sufficiently powerful to vanquish Robespierre, it would resume all its authority; and that, though they might be rescued from the fangs of their rival, they would be denuded of the dictatorship. It had been better, doubtless, to have negotiated a compact; but the opportunity was gone. Robespierre took especial care not to intrust himself amongst his colleagues after the meeting of the Jacobins. Saint-Just, however, who had arrived from the army a few hours ago, sat observing them in gloomy silence. He was asked for the report, the preparation whereof had been confided to him at the last interview, and a desire was expressed to hear it read; he answered that he could not communicate it, having previously given it to one of his colleagues to peruse. He was solicited to impart the substance, at least, but he declined. At this moment, Collot entered, furious at the outrage he had just experienced at the Jacobin Club. "What is passing at the Jacobins?" inquired Saint-Just. "Thou askest!" replied Collot, wrathfully; "art thou not the accomplice of Robespierre? Have you not together arranged all your schemes? I see it: you have formed an infamous triumvirate, and you purpose to assassinate us; but if we fall, you will not long enjoy the fruit of your crimes!" Then stepping up to Saint-Just with enraged vehemence—"Thou designest to denounce us to-morrow morning," he said; "thou hast thy pockets full of notes against us: show them!" Saint-Just emptied his pockets, and pledged his word he had no such documents. Collot-d'Herbois was pacified. The committees exacted from Saint-Just an engagement to attend at eleven in the morning, to communicate his report before reading it to the convention. Ere they finally separated, they agreed to demand from the convention the dismissal of Henriot, and the summons to the bar of the mayor and the national agent.

Saint-Just hurried away to compose his report, which was not yet drawn up; and therein arraigned, with more brevity and force than had distinguished Robespierre's effort, the conduct of the committees towards their colleagues, the assumption of all affairs, the superciliousness of Billaud-Varennes, and the false manœuvres of Carnot, who had transferred Pichegru's army to the coasts of Flanders, and endeavoured to wrest 16,000 men from Jourdan. This report betrayed a spirit equally perfidious as the speech of Robespierre; but in other respects it was characterised by great ability. Saint-Just resolved to read it to the convention without any previous intimation of its contents to the committees.

Whilst the conspirators were occcupied in concerting their measures, the Mountaineers, who had hitherto confined themselves to intercommunications of their apprehensions, and had formed no specific design, hastened from house to house, and exchanged pledges to attack Robespierre in a more formal manner on the following day, and to obtain his impeachment if possible. To achieve this latter object, the concurrence of the deputies of the Plain was requisite, whom they, the Mountaineers, had frequently menaced, and Robespierre, affecting the part of moderator, had formerly defended. They had, consequently, but indifferent claims to their support. They proceeded, however, to visit Boissy-d'Anglas, Durand-Maillane, and Palasme-Champeaux, all three ex-constituents, whose example was likely to influence the others. They warned them they would be responsible for all the blood hereafter shed by Robespierre, unless they consented to vote against him. Repulsed at first, three times they returned to the charge, and ultimately procured the desired promise. They continued their cir-

* [André Chenier was born at Constantinople, where his father was consul general for France. The mother of André was a Greek lady, celebrated for her beauty and wit. Returning to his native country about the year 1753, the consul Chenier placed his son at the college of Navarre, where he remained until of age to enter the army. But a garrison life did not accord with his tastes, and we find him pursuing a literary career in Paris at the commencement of the revolutionary struggle. A partisan, at first, of the popular cause, Chenier published a number of poems full of ardent notions respecting liberty, and calculated to encourage his countrymen in their tumultuary efforts. The excesses into which they ran, however, shocked his ingenuous spirit, and he exerted himself so much in defence of the king, as to compromise his own safety. After a short imprisonment, during which he produced some affecting and appropriate poetical compositions, he ended his career on the scaffold, at the age of thirty-three. The following fragmentary verses are said to have been composed and repeated by him, while waiting his turn to be called to the guillotine.—

"As the summer day pours its parting ray,
Or the breeze its farewell sigh,
At the scaffold's foot do I wake the lute,
As I wait my time to die.

Perchance ere this hour, in its circling tour,
O'er the dial-front hath run,
And his sixtieth pace hath told that the race
By his wakeful steps is won;

The sleep of the tomb o'er my lids in gloom
Shall fall, ere the verse I pen
Be made complete in cadence meet;
And the walls of this scared den

Shall haply ring with the tones that bring
The decree of fate to me—
Borne on the breath of the herald of death,
Who recruits for the shades" * * *

The lines were left incomplete. In alluding to this subject, D'Israeli mentions only two (four-line) stanzas as having been composed by Chenier; but M. Tissot, from whose collection of French literature we translate the piece, gives the additional lines here presented in an English form.

cuits during the whole morning of the 9th. Tallien undertook to lead the attack, and requested only from others the boldness to uphold him.

Every one early flew to his post. The mayor Fleuriot and the national agent Payan were at the commune. Henriot was on horseback with his aides-de-camp, traversing the streets of Paris. The Jacobins had commenced a permanent sitting. The deputies, on the alert since dawn, had repaired to the convention before the accustomed hour. They congregated tumultuously in the corridors, and the Mountaineers besieged them with assiduity to incline them in their favour. It was within half an hour of noon. Tallien was talking at one of the doors of the hall to some of his colleagues, when he saw Saint-Just enter and take possession of the tribune. "Now is the moment," he exclaimed; "let us enter." They followed him, the benches gradually filled, and all awaited in silence the opening of that scene, destined to be one of the most striking in the stormy annals of the republic.

Saint-Just, who had broken faith with his colleagues regarding the report, which he had promised to preliminarily submit to them, was in the tribune. The two Robespierres, Lebas, and Couthon, were seated side by side. Collot-d'Herbois occupied the chair. Saint-Just stated that he had been charged by the committees to present a report, and he accordingly obtained liberty to speak. He commenced by asseverating that he was of no faction, but belonged solely to truth; and averred that the tribune might be, to him as to many others, the Tarpeian Rock, but that he would not the less utter his unreserved opinion on the divisions which had arisen. Tallien scarcely allowed him to finish these first passages, ere he arose and claimed to speak on a point of order. Leave was accorded him. "The republic," said he, "is in the most melancholy state, and no good citizen can avoid shedding tears over its calamities. Yesterday a member of the government isolated himself and denounced his colleagues; another comes to do the same to-day. It is sufficient to aggravate our misfortunes: I demand that the veil be at length entirely torn away." No sooner were these words pronounced than plaudits broke forth, which were caught up and long sustained, again commenced, and even for a third time resounded in deafening echoes. It was the precursor signal of the fall of the triumvirs. Billaud-Varennes, who had struggled into the tribune after Tallien, announced that the Jacobins had held a seditious meeting the previous evening, in which suborned assassins were present, who had avowed the design of slaughtering the convention. General abhorrence was manifested. "I see in the galleries," added Billaud-Varennes, "one of the men who yesterday threatened the faithful deputies. Let him be seized!" The man was immediately pinioned, and delivered over to the gendarmes. Billaud subsequently maintained that Saint-Just had no right to speak in the name of the committees, inasmuch as he had not communicated to them his report; and he further insisted that the moment was one in which the assembly ought to repudiate indulgence, for it would perish if it were weak. "No, no!" shouted the deputies, waving their hats in the air; "it will not be weak, and it will not perish!" Lebas claimed the tribune, which Billaud had not yet vacated. He gesticulated violently, and otherwise created great disturbance in his eagerness to obtain it. At the instance of the entire assembly, he was called to order. Unmindful of the rebuke, he still persisted. "To the Abbey with the malignant!" growled sundry voices from the Mountain.

Billaud resumed, and, casting aside all further reserve, boldly affirmed that Robespierre had always sought to domineer in the committees; that he had withdrawn when resistance was offered to his law of the 22d Prairial, and to the purposes which he intended to make it subserve; that he had insisted upon retaining the noble, Lavalette, a conspirator in the national guard at Lille; that he had prevented the arrest of Henriot, the accomplice of Hébert, in order to mould him as his creature; that he had, moreover, opposed the apprehension of a secretary of the committee, who had misappropriated 114,000 francs; that he had caused to be incarcerated, by means of his board of police, the best revolutionary committee in Paris; that he had invariably followed his own will in all things, and assiduously aimed at absolute supremacy. Billaud subjoined, that he could cite a multitude of additional facts, but it sufficed to state that yesterday Robespierre's agents, the Dumas' and Coffinhals, had pledged themselves at the Jacobin Club to decimate the National Convention. Whilst Billaud enumerated these enormities, the assembly expressed at intervals unequivocal symptoms of indignation. Robespierre, livid with rage, had quitted his seat and mounted the steps of the tribune. Standing behind Billaud, he demanded from the president liberty to speak, with extreme vehemence. He seized the moment when Billaud paused, to claim it with redoubled violence. "Down with the tyrant! down with the tyrant!" reverberated from all parts of the hall. Twice this accusing cry arose, and announced that the deputies at length ventured to give him the name he merited. While passionately insisting on his right, Tallien, who had again rushed to the tribune, likewise craved the ear of the president, and obtained attention in preference. "But a few minutes ago," he said, "I demanded that the veil should be wholly rent; I perceive it has now been so. The conspirators are unmasked. I knew that my life was menaced, and hitherto I had kept silence; but yesterday I was present at the meeting of the Jacobins, I saw the army of the new Cromwell formed, I trembled for the country, and I armed myself with a poniard to pierce his heart, if the convention should lack the courage to decree him under impeachment." As he uttered these words, Tallien displayed his dagger, and the assembly covered him with applause. He then moved the arrest of the leader of the conspirators, Henriot. Billaud proposed to add the names of the president Dumas and of one Boulanger, who had distinguished himself on the eve as one of the most furious agitators amongst the Jacobins. The convention forthwith decreed the arrest of those three criminals.

At this moment Barrère entered, to submit to the assembly the propositions which the committees had agreed upon during the night before separating. Robespierre, who had not quitted the tribune, availed himself of the occasion again to urge his claim to be heard. His adversaries were determined to reject his appeals, lest his voice might awaken a remnant of the dastardly and servile spirit so recently predominating. All planted on the summit of the Mountain, they vociferated with renewed energy; and whilst Robespierre turned alternately to the president and to the assembly, "Down! down with the tyrant!" they exclaimed in stentorian accents. Barrère likewise was adjudged to take precedence of Robespierre. It is affirmed that this man, whom vanity had incited to play a prominent part, and whom weakness now filled with dread at his own success, had two reports in his pocket, one in behalf of Robespierre, the other in behalf of the committees. He proceeded to develop the project resulting from the night's deliberation; it included the abolition of the grade of commander-in-chief, the re-establishment of the old law passed by the Legislative Assembly, whereby each legionary leader commanded the armed force of Paris in rotation; and the summons to the bar of the mayor and national agent, to answer for the tranquillity of the capital. The articles were adopted and decreed on the instant; and an usher departed to communicate them to the commune, amidst great personal hazard.

When the decree proposed by Barrère had been passed, the enumeration of Robespierre's delinquencies was resumed: the deputies were emulous to charge him with crimes. Vadier, who professed to have discovered an important conspiracy on the seizure of Catherine Théot, imparted, what he had not specified the previous day, that Dom Gerle possessed a certificate of civism signed by Robespierre; and that, in a mattress belonging to Catherine Théot, a letter had been found, wherein she styled Robespierre her beloved son. He subsequently expatiated on the spy-system maintained by the committees, with the diffuseness of old age, and a deliberation altogether unsuitable to the excitation of the moment. Tallien impatiently remounted the tribune, and once more addressed the assembly, stating, that the true point of the question had been departed from and must be restored. It was true that Henriot, Dumas, and Boulanger, had been impeached, and Robespierre called a tyrant; but no decisive resolution had been taken. He observed that it was not merely certain details in the life of the man, stigmatised as a tyrant, which were to be reprobated, but that his entire career ought to be dragged into light. He thereupon commenced a ruthless survey of the conduct pursued from early times by that cowardly, supercilious, and sanguinary demagogue. Robespierre, half suffocated with rage, interrupted him with howls of fury. Louchet exclaimed, "It is time to finish: the arrest of Robespierre!" Loseau added, "Impeachment against the denouncer!" "Impeachment! Impeachment!" shouted numerous deputies. Louchet arose; and, looking around him, asked if he would be supported. "Yes! yes!" responded a hundred voices. Robespierre the younger said from his place—"I partake the crimes of my brother; join me with him!" This expression of devotedness was scarcely heeded. "The arrest! the arrest!" again echoed wildly. At this moment, Robespierre, who had been continually moving to and fro between his seat and the table, once more approached the president, and demanded to be heard. But Thuriot, who had succeeded Collot-d'Herbois in the chair, answered him only by ringing his bell. Then Robespierre turned his eyes upon the Mountain, but met the gaze simply of cold friends or infuriated enemies. He averted them towards the Plain. "It is to you," he said, "pure and virtuous men—it is to you I address myself, and not to brigands!" Some moved aside, others used menacing gestures. Hopeless, he retreated to the president, and thus invoked him:—"For the last time, president of assassins, I demand leave to speak!" These words he uttered in stifled and almost inarticulate accents. "The blood of Danton chokes you!" cried Garnier-de-l'Aube. Duval, irritated at the hesitation, rose and exclaimed—"President, is this man to be still the master of the convention?" "Ah! how hard it is to beat down a tyrant!" added Fréron. "To the vote! to the vote!" vociferated Loseau. The arrest so often urged was at length put to the vote, and decreed amidst an extraordinary ferment. Scarcely was the decree passed ere the whole assemblage rose throughout the spacious hall, and with one impulse proclaimed—"Long live liberty! Long live the republic! The tyrants are no more!"

When the excitement had subsided, various members sprang up, and asserted that they had understood the vote of arrest included the accomplices of Robespierre, Couthon and Saint-Just. Their names were forthwith appended to the decree. Lebas asked to be inserted therein; his request was granted, as likewise Robespierre the younger's. These men still inspired such dread, that the ushers of the assembly had not ventured to approach in order to lead them to the bar. Perceiving that they remained on their seats, several deputies inquired why they did not descend to the place assigned for those under accusation; the president replied that the ushers had been unable to execute the command. The shout—"To the bar! to the bar!" then became general. The five accused proceeded thither, Robespierre bewildered with wrath, Saint-Just calm and scornful, the others in deep dejection at their novel and unexpected humiliation. At last they too stood in that dock whither they had sent Vergniaud, Brissot, Pétion, Camille-Desmoulins, Danton, and so many others of their colleagues, illustrious for their virtue, their genius, or their courage.

It was five afternoon. The assembly had declared the sitting permanent; but at this period, overcome with fatigue, it took the hazardous resolution of suspending the sitting until seven, to allow an interval of repose. The deputies thereupon separated, and thus left to the commune, if it possessed any hardihood, the opportunity of closing the place of their meetings, and seizing upon all dominion in Paris. The five under impeachment were conducted to the committee of general safety, and subjected to an interrogatory before their colleagues, preparatory to their incarceration.

Whilst these important events were passing in the convention, the commune had remained in observance. The usher, Courvol, had appeared before it, to intimate the decree placing Henriot under arrest, and summoning the mayor and national agent to the bar. The reception accorded him had been by no means gracious. Having requested an acknowledgment of the execution of his mission, the mayor had replied to him—"On a day like this, we give no acknowledgments. Go to the convention, inform it we shall know how to keep the day; and tell Robespierre he may be under no apprehension, for we are here." The mayor had subsequently expressed himself in a vague and mysterious manner to the council-general regarding the objects of the meeting; he adverted merely to the decree ordaining the commune to watch over the tranquillity of Paris, and to the epochs when that same commune had displayed heroic courage, alluding with sufficient explicitness to the 31st of May. The national agent, Payan, speaking after the mayor, had proposed to send two members of the council to harangue the people, congregated in a vast multitude on the square in front of the town-hall, and invite them "to unite with their magistrates to save the country." Eventually an address had been framed, wherein it was alleged that miscreants were oppressing Robespierre, "that virtuous citizen, who caused to be proclaimed the consolatory dogmas of the Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul; Saint-Just, that apostle of virtue, who uprooted the treason on the Rhine and in the north; Couthon, that virtuous citizen, who has but the trunk and head of mortals, but possesses them glowing with patriotism."* Thereafter, a resolution had been passed, that the sections should be convoked, and their presidents and the commanders of the armed force called before the commune to receive its directions. A deputation had been sent to the Jacobins, soliciting them to come and fraternise with the commune, and to detach to the council-general their most energetic members, and an adequate supply of "male and female citizens for the galleries." Without yet proclaiming an insurrection, the commune took all the measures requisite to maintain one, and obviously progressed towards that conclusion. The arrest of the five deputies was unknown to it, which accounts for any species of reserve being still manifested by the turbulent body.

Meanwhile, Henriot was scouring the streets of Paris with a troop of horse. In his progress, he learnt that the five deputies had been put under arrest; whereupon he attempted to excite the populace, exclaiming that miscreants were oppressing the faithful deputies, and that they had already arrested Couthon, Saint-Just, and Robespierre. The wretch was half-intoxicated; he rose upon his saddle, and brandished his sword like one demented. He repaired, in the first place, to the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, with the intention of arousing the operatives, who scarcely comprehended what he laboured to impress upon them, and who, moreover, began to be touched with pity at the daily spectacle of victims passing to death. By a hazard fatal to his projects, Henriot encountered the carts proceeding to the scaffold. On hearing of Robespierre's arrest, the people had surrounded them, imagining that, as Robespierre was understood to be the author of all the murders, his downfall implied a cessation of the executions. They consequently desired to turn back the gloomy cavalcade. Henriot, rushing up at the moment, opposed their design, and caused that last immolation to be consummated. He then returned, still at full speed, to the Luxembourg, and ordered the gendarmes to muster on the square of the town-hall. He took a detachment with him, and started off along the quays towards the Place du Carrousel, in order to rescue the prisoners under detention with the committee of general safety. As he galloped down the quays with his aides-de-camp, he overthrew sundry individuals. One man thus treated, who had his wife on his arm, appealed to the gendarmes, crying out—"Gendarmes, apprehend that brigand; he is no longer your general!" An aide-de-camp silenced him by a cut of his sabre. Henriot continued his route, and plunged into the Street St Honoré. Arrived on the Place du Palais-Egalité (Palais-Royal), he descried Merlin de Thionville, and charged upon him, shouting, "Arrest this knave! he is one of those who persecute the faithful representatives!" Merlin was immediately grasped, brutally ill used, and conveyed to the nearest guard-house. In the courts of the National Palace, Henriot caused his followers to dismount, and attempted to enter the palace. The grenadiers refused him admittance, and presented their bayonets. At this moment, an usher advanced, and said, "Gendarmes, arrest that rebel; a decree of the convention commands you!" Henriot was forthwith surrounded, himself and several of his aides-de-camp disarmed, pinioned, and conducted into the room of the committee of general safety, beside the Robespierres, Couthon, Saint-Just, and Lebas.

Hitherto all had gone favourably for the convention. Its decrees, boldly passed, were happily executed. But the commune and the Jacobins, who had not yet openly proclaimed an insurrection, were now about to enter upon a more determined course of action, and realise, if they could, their project of another 2d of June. Fortunately, whilst the convention imprudently suspended its sitting, the commune had done the same, and the decisive opportunity was lost to both.

The commune did not again assemble until six o'clock. Upon this resumption of the sitting, the arrest of the five deputies and of Henriot was known. The council no longer restrained its fury, but at once declared that it rebelled against the oppressors of the people, who were intent on destroying their defenders. It ordered the tocsin to be sounded at the town-hall and in all the sections. It detached one of its members into each of the sections, to incite those bodies into insurrection, and induce them to send their battalions to the commune. It dispatched gendarmes to close the barriers, and enjoined all the keepers of the prisons to refuse any captives who might be brought to their gates. Lastly, it nominated an executive committee of twelve members, in which Payan and Coffinhal were included, to direct the insurrection, and wield all the sovereign powers of the people. By this time, a few sectional battalions, several companies of artillery, and a large proportion of the gendarmerie, were already gathered on the square of the commune. The municipality began to administer an oath to the commandants of the battalions actually under arms. Subsequently, it directed Coffinhal to proceed with a few hundred men to the convention, and deliver the prisoners.

Robespierre had been already dismissed to the Luxembourg, his brother to the House of Lazarus, Couthon to Port-Libre, Saint-Just to the Ecossais, and Lebas to the court-house of the department. The order given to the jailers was obeyed, and they refused to receive the prisoners. The administrators of police then seized upon their persons, and conducted them in carriages to the municipality. When Robespierre appeared, he was embraced, loaded with testimonies of affection, and stunned with oaths to die in his defence, and in that of all the faithful deputies. Meanwhile, Henriot had alone remained at the committee of general safety. Coffinhal, vice-president of the Jacobins, appeared there sword in hand, with some companies of the sections, forced his way into the saloon of the committee, drove out the members, and delivered Henriot and his aides-de-camp. Henriot, thus rescued, flew to the Place du Carrousel, regained his horse, vaulted into the saddle, and, with great presence of mind, assured the companies and artillerymen around him that the committee had just pronounced him innocent, and reinstated him in the command. Thereupon they encompassed him, forming a sufficiently formidable array; and he commenced to issue orders against the convention, and to make preparations for besieging its hall.

It was now seven in the evening, the hour to which the convention stood adjourned. In the interval, the commune had acquired important advantages. It had, as we have narrated, proclaimed an insurrection, deputed commissioners to the sections, already gathered around it several companies of artillery and gendarmes, and rescued the prisoners. It was in a position, if possessing the requisite hardihood, to march promptly on the convention, and compel it to revoke its decrees. It had cause to rely, moreover, on the School of Mars, the commandant whereof, Labretèche, was its devoted instrument.

The deputies congregated in tumult, and imparted to each other the disastrous tidings of the evening with countenances of dismay. The members of the committees, in deep alarm and incertitude, were assembled in a small chamber contiguous to the bench of the president. They there deliberated, unconscious of the course it behoved them to pursue under the emergency. In the interim, several deputies successively mounted the tribune, and recounted the events that had passed in Paris. They bore testimony that the prisoners were liberated, that the commune had coalesced with the Jacobins, that it already disposed of a considerable force, and that the convention was speedily to be environed. Bourdon proposed to issue forth in a body, and reclaim the people by so affecting a spectacle. Legendre strove to encourage the assembly with assurances that it would every where encounter none but pure and faithful Mountaineers ready to defend it, and evinced at this moment a fortitude he had never manifested before Robespierre. Billaud now appeared in the tribune, and announced that Henriot was on the Place du Carrousel, and that, having debauched the artillerymen, he had caused the cannons to be turned against the hall of the convention, and was on the point of beginning the attack. Collot-d'Herbois seated himself in the chair, which, from the disposition of the hall, must receive the first ball that was fired, and said, as he assumed that post of danger, "Representatives, this is the moment to die at our posts. Miscreants have invaded the National Palace." At these words, all the deputies, some of whom were standing, others pacing the floor, took their places, and awaited the issue in majestic silence. All the occupants of the galleries fled in a tumultuous uproar, and left nothing behind them but a cloud of dust. The convention remained in solitude, and with the conviction of its impending massacre, but resolved to perish rather than endure a Cromwell. Here let us admire the wondrous influence of a crisis on courage. Those same men, so long abashed before the mere declaimer, now brave his bristling cannon with sublime heroism!

Certain members of the assembly were appointed to bring intelligence of occurrences on the Carrousel. They reported that Henriot was still giving orders. "Outlawry! outlawry against the brigand!" resounded through the hall. The decree declaring him without the pale of the law was instantly passed, and several deputies quitted their seats to publish it in front of the National Palace. At that moment, Henriot, having succeeded in deluding the artillerymen and inducing them to plant their pieces against the hall, was urging them to fire. The deputies exclaimed, "Artillerymen, will you dishonour yourselves? That brigand is without the law!" Those sturdy republicans responded to the appeal, and refused to obey Henriot. Abandoned by his adherents, his only resource was to turn and flee to the commune.

This first danger averted, the convention put the deputies who had evaded its decrees, and all the members of the commune participating in the revolt, under the ban of outlawry. But this measure, however bold, was in itself inoperative. If Henriot had disappeared from the Place du Carrousel, the insurgents were still in great force at the commune, and able even to attempt a sudden onslaught. Against this latter hazard especially it was incumbent to take precaution. But much time was wasted in fruitless deliberation. Eventually, in the small chamber behind the president's chair, where the members of the committees and several representatives were assembled, it was proposed to appoint a commander of the armed force, selected from the convention itself. "Who?" inquired divers of the interlocutors. "Barras," replied a voice, "and he will have the courage to accept!" On the instant, Vouland hastened to the tribune, and moved the nomination of the representative Barras as director of the armed force. The convention acquiesced in the suggestion, nominated Barras general-in-chief, and added seven other deputies to command under him, to wit, Fréron, Ferrand, Rovère, Delmas, Bolleti, Leonard-Bourdon, and Bourdon-de-l'Oise. Moreover, at the instance of a member of the assembly, a proposition not less important than the preceding was adopted, namely, the delegation of chosen representatives to the sections, for the purpose of enlightening them as to the true character of the contest, and soliciting from them the aid of their battalions. This resolution, in fact, was one of paramount necessity, as to decide the wavering and reclaim the deceived sections had become of extreme urgency.

Barras proceeded, immediately after his appointment, to the battalions already under arms, to intimate his authority and distribute them around the convention. The deputies commissioned to the sections repaired to their several destinations with the utmost promptitude. Even yet the majority of those bodies were undecided; at the same time, very few inclined towards the commune and Robespierre. Abhorrence at the atrocious system imputed to Robespierre, and aspirations for some event to deliver France therefrom, were almost universal. But terror still paralysed the citizens, insomuch that they dared not venture to declare themselves. The commune, which the sections were accustomed to obey, had summoned them, and several, shrinking from an open resistance, had sent delegates, not to coincide in the project of insurrection, but to take note of circumstances. Thus was Paris in a state of uncertainty and anxiety. The relatives and friends of prisoners, all who suffered from the existing state of things, issued from their domiciles, crept from street to street towards the places where noise prevailed, and eagerly sought to gather tidings. The unfortunate captives themselves, perceiving from their grated apertures an unusual commotion, and hearing the varied din, concluded some crisis was at hand, although they dreaded the result might but aggravate their calamitous lot. However, the growing uneasiness of the jailers, their whispers in the ears of the fabricators of lists, and the visible consternation following such revelations, were deemed of good omen, and partially dissipated their doubts. Ultimately they became aware, from divers involuntary expressions, that Robespierre was in danger; kinsmen came and planted themselves underneath the windows of the prisons, indicating by signs what was passing; then the captives, hurrying together, gave way to all the delirium of unbounded joy. The infamous delators, now trembling in their turn, took some of the suspected apart, and strove to justify themselves, by specious arguments, that they were not the authors of the lists of proscription. Others, avowing their guilt, sought to extenuate it by assurances that they had suppressed many names; one had furnished but forty out of two hundred demanded from him, another had erased entire catalogues. In their terror, these wretches commenced to recriminate, and to throw the burden of opprobrium from one to the other.

The deputies who visited the sections experienced little difficulty in prevailing against the obscure missionaries of the commune. Those of the sections which had detached their battalions to the town-hall remanded them, the remainder directed theirs towards the National Palace. That edifice was already surrounded by a sufficient force. Barras appeared before the convention to certify the fact, and then hastened to the plain of Les Sablons, in order to replace Labretèche, who was superseded, and bring the School of Mars to the succour of the convention.

The national representation now found itself secure against attack. In fact, the reverse contingency had arisen, and to march upon the commune, to assume the offensive it shrunk from adventuring, was feasible. A resolution to advance upon the town-hall was accordingly taken. Leonard-Bourdon, being at the head of numerous battalions, prepared to lead them onward. Appearing to announce his design of moving upon the rebels—"Go," said Tallien, who occupied the chair, "and may the sun on rising alight not on living conspirators!" Bourdon debouched by the quays, and thus reached the square in front of the town-hall.* An imposing array of gendarmes, artillery, and armed citizens from the sections, still occupied its spacious area. An agent of the committee of public welfare, named Dulac, had the courage to penetrate the hostile ranks and read the decree of the convention declaring the commune without the pale of the law. The habitual respect entertained for that assembly, in whose name the government had been conducted for two years, the reverence which the words law and republic inspired, operated magically. The battalions separated, some returning whence they came, others uniting with Leonard-Bourdon. The square of the commune remained vacant; those who guarded it and they who had just arrived to assault it, drew up in the surrounding streets so as to occupy all the avenues.

So impressive an idea of the determination of the conspirators prevailed, and so greatly did their apparent stillness in the town-hall amaze their assailants, that they hesitated to approach. Leonard-Bourdon apprehended they had planted a mine beneath the building. It was not so, however; they were deliberating in extreme confusion, proposing to write to the armies and the provinces, ignorant in whose name they ought to write, and completely intimidated from adopting any decisive part. If Robespierre had ventured, like a man of nerve and action, to show himself and march upon the convention, it had perchance been placed in jeopardy. But he was a mere rhetorician, and he felt, moreover, and all his partisans participated in the feeling, that public opinion had forsaken him. The end of the reign of terror had in truth arrived; the convention was universally obeyed, and the proclamations of outlawry produced a miraculous effect. Had he been really endowed with greater energy, he must have been discouraged under such circumstances, so predominant above all individual force. When from the square in front the decree of outlawry reached the town-hall, all within it were struck as if by sudden stupor. Payan, who first obtained it, read it in a loud voice, and, with great presence of mind, added to the list of those placed without the pale of the law the people of the galleries, an addendum certainly not in the decree. Contrary to his expectation, however, the populace in the galleries stole terrified away, not caring to partake the anathema launched by the convention. Terrible presentiments then came across the conspirators. Henriot descended to harangue the artillerymen, but he looked in vain for a single defender. He exclaimed with an oath, "How! those wretches of gunners, who saved me a few hours ago, now abandon me!" Furious, he rescaled the flight of steps and apprised the council of this crowning disaster. The conspirators were plunged in despair; they saw themselves forsaken by their troops and encompassed on all sides by those of the convention. Mutual accusations began: each reproached the other with the common calamity. Coffinhal, an energetic man, and who had been badly seconded, assailed Henriot, saying to him—"Villain, it is thy cowardice that has ruined us!" With these words he rushed upon him, and, seizing him round the waist, hurled him out of a window. The miserable Henriot alighted on a heap of refuse, which, softening the fall, prevented its being mortal. Lebas fired a pistol at himself; Robespierre the younger threw himself out of a window; Saint-Just stood calm and motionless, a weapon in his hand, but without seeking to kill himself; Robespierre, too, eventually determined to close his career, and found in this extremity courage to attempt his own life. He drew a pistol upon himself, but the ball, striking beneath the lip, only pierced the cheek, and inflicted a severe though not dangerous wound.

At this moment, certain intrepid men—the agent Dulac, the gendarme Méda, and some others—leaving Bourdon with his battalions on the square, mounted the staircase, armed with swords and pistols, and entered the hall of the council precisely as the report of two shots came echoing from within. The municipal officers were preparing to throw aside their scarfs; but Dulac threatened to cut down the first who should attempt so to divest himself. None ventured to stir: the municipal officers, Payan, Fleuriot, Dumas, Coffinhal, &c., were seized, the wounded placed on shutters, and all carried in triumph to the convention. It was three in the morning. Shouts of victory rent the air, sending the gladdening sounds to reverberate even beneath the arches of the hall. The deputies instantly arose and vociferated, "Live liberty! Live the convention! Down with tyrants!" The president addressed them in these words: "Representatives, Robespierre and his accomplices are at the door of your hall: is it your pleasure that they be brought before you?" "No, no!" they responded from all sides; "to execution with the conspirators!"

Robespierre was transported, together with his companions, into the room of the committee of public welfare. He was stretched on a table, and a bundle of paper was placed under his head. He preserved his presence of mind, and betokened no emotion. He wore a blue coat, the same that he appeared in at the festival to the Supreme Being, nankeen trousers, and white stockings, which amidst the tumult he had allowed to fall over his shoes. The blood spouted from his wound, and he staunched it with the holster of a [illegible]l. Those around presented him from time to [illegible] with pieces of paper, which he used to dry his [illegible] He thus remained several hours, exposed to the curiosity and the insults of a multitude of people. When the surgeon arrived to dress his wound, he rose of himself, descended from the table, and moved into a chair. He underwent the painful operation of dressing without uttering the least complaint. He evinced the insensibility and sullenness of pride humiliated. He replied to no inquiries. He was subsequently removed, with Saint-Just, Couthon, and the others, to the Conciergerie. His brother and Henriot had been taken up half dead in the streets adjoining the town-hall.

The previous declaration of outlawry obviated the necessity of a trial: it was sufficient to prove identity. The following morning, 10th Thermidor (28th July), the criminals appeared, to the number of twenty-one, before that tribunal to which they had consigned so many victims. Fouquier-Tinville produced evidence of identity, and at four in the afternoon obtained their condemnation to immediate death. The populace, who had long abstained from attending executions, thronged to the spectacle on this occasion with the utmost eagerness. The scaffold had been erected on the Place de la Revolution. An immense crowd filled the Street Saint Honoré, the Tuileries, and the large square itself. Numerous relatives of former victims followed the carts, vomiting imprecations: several approached, demanding to see Robespierre; the gendarmes pointed him out to them with the points of their swords. When the cavalcade had reached the scaffold, the executioners showed Robespierre to all the people; they tore away the bandage which bound his cheek, and drew from him the first exclamation he had yet uttered. He died with the impassibility he had manifested for the preceding hours. Saint-Just met death with the courage whereof he had always given proof. Couthon appeared in extreme trepidation. Henriot and Robespierre the younger were almost dead from the consequences of their fall. At every stroke of the fatal axe, loud cheers broke forth, and the crowd betokened extravagant joy. The rapture was general, indeed, throughout Paris. In the prisons hymns of thanksgiving were chanted; the captives embraced with a species of delirium, and paid even thirty francs for the newspapers containing a report of the late events. Although the convention had made no declaration of its purpose to abolish the system of terror, although the conquerors themselves were either the authors or the upholders of that very system, still it was universally deemed to be finished with Robespierre, so peculiarly had he drawn upon himself all its fearful odium.

Such was the fortunate catastrophe which checked the onward march of the revolution, and made it begin to retrograde. The revolution had, on the 14th July 1789, prostrated the old feudal constitution; on the 5th and 6th October, it had wrested the king from the court, in order to make sure of his person; subsequently, it had framed for itself a constitution, and intrusted its guardianship to the monarch, as upon trial. Soon regretting that confidence, and despairing to reconcile the court with liberty, it had invaded the Tuileries on the 10th August, and consigned Louis XVI. to a prison. Austria and Prussia advancing to destroy it, it threw—to use its own terrible language—it threw down, as the gage of combat, the heads of a king and six thousand captives: thus irrevocably committed in the contest, it engaged and repulsed the allies by a first effort. Its wrath doubled its enemies; the increase of foes and danger redoubled its wrath and lashed it into fury. It tore by violence, from the temple of the laws, men who were sincere republicans, but who, not comprehending its inexorable necessities, wished to moderate it. Then it had to contend with one-half of France, La Vendée, and Europe. As the consequence of this continual struggle between it and obstacles, with all the vicissitudes thereof acting and reacting, as well upon its opponents as upon its own wild rage, it reached the extreme point of danger and passion; it reared scaffolds in every city, and sent a million of men to the frontiers. Then, at once sublime and atrocious, it administered affairs with a miraculous promptitude and a profound sagacity, whilst it destroyed with a blind fury. Converted, by the exigency of a concentrated action, from a turbulent democracy into an absolute dictatorship, it became regular, silent, and formidable. During the latter months of 1793 and the commencement of 1794, it proceeded with unanimity, the result of imminent peril. But victory having crowned its efforts at the close of 1793, occasion of discord arose, for then generous and manly hearts, calmed by success, raised and responded to the cry of "Mercy to the vanquished!" But all hearts were not yet mollified; the safety of the revolution was not manifest to all minds; the commiseration of some stimulated the fury of others, and an extravagant party appeared, which would have resolved all government into a tribunal of death. The dictatorship smote the two new parties which embarrassed its course. Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, perished with Danton and Camille-Desmoulins. The revolution thus continued its career, achieved a glorious renown in the beginning of 1794, defeated combined Europe, and struck it with dismay. This was the moment when pity ought finally to have superseded wrath. But it happened according to all precedent: on the incident of a day it was determined to graft a system of endurance. The chiefs of the government had systematised violence and cruelty; and even when the dangers were past and passions had subsided, they insisted still upon continued slaughter; but general abhorrence was unequivocally expressed. Opposition they prepared to stifle by the habitual mode—death! Then a cry of indignation sprung simultaneously from their rivals in power and from their threatened colleagues, and that cry was the signal for an universal outbreak. It took an interval to shake off the deadening influence of fear; but finally courage was inspired, and the reign of terror was subverted.

It may be asked, what would have resulted had Robespierre been victorious? The state of abandonment in which he found himself proves that it was impossible. But, supposing him successful, he must have either yielded to the general feeling or succumbed somewhat later. Like all usurpers, he would have been impelled to substitute a mild and tranquil government for the horrors of incessant strife. But, in truth, the part of an usurper was for him impracticable. The French revolution was on too vast a scale to permit the same man, a deputy in the Constituent Assembly of 1789, to be proclaimed emperor or protector in the cathedral of Notre Dame in 1804. In a country less advanced and of smaller confines, such as England was, where the same individual might be both delegate and general, and actually unite those two characters, a Cromwell was able to enact the parts of a factionist at the commencement, and of an usurping soldier at the end. But in a revolution extending over so wide a surface as the French, where war was so terrible and predominant, and where the same individual could not occupy both the tribune and the camp, the factionists first destroyed each other; and after them came soldiers, one of whom remained the ultimate master.

It was not reserved for Robespierre, therefore, to act the usurper in France. Still, how came it to pass that he survived all those famous revolutionists, who were so superior in genius and might to himself—Danton, for example? Robespierre possessed undeniable integrity; and to captivate the masses, an unsullied reputation is essential. He was devoid of pity—a quality which, in revolutions, ruins those who hearken to its impulses. He had, moreover, in a supreme degree, that stubborn and indomitable self-sufficiency and assumption which weighs so influentially with mankind. These qualifications were sufficient to ensure his survival beyond all his contemporary rivals. But he was of the worst order of men. A zealot without passions, lacking the vices, doubtless, to which they expose, but equally so the courage, the magnanimity, and the sensibility which usually accompany them, exclusively wrapped up in his pride and dogma, hiding in the hour of danger, and reappearing to gather homage after the victory was secured by others, he presents himself to our contemplation as one of the most odious beings who have ever domineered over men, and we should say also one of the most vile, did we not acknowledge his strong conviction and his undeviating rectitude.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE 9TH THERMIDOR.—MODIFICATIONS OF THE REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.—SUSPENSION OF THE REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL AND LIBERATION OF THE SUSPECTED.—THE CONVENTION DIVIDED INTO TWO PARTIES—THE MOUNTAINEERS AND THE THERMIDORIANS.—STATE OF THE FINANCES, OF TRADE, AND OF AGRICULTURE, AFTER THE REIGN OF TERROR.—NUMEROUS DECREES REGULATING THE ADMINISTRATION.—THE REMAINS OF MARAT TRANSPORTED TO THE PANTHEON AND DEPOSITED IN THE PLACE OCCUPIED BY MIRABEAU'S.

THE events of the 9th and 10th Thermidor produced a paroxysm of joy, which several days were insufficient to moderate. Not only in Paris, but throughout all France, the gladness was supreme. A number of persons, who had quitted the provinces to seek concealment in the metropolis, threw themselves into the public conveyances, to regain their abodes and carry tidings of the common deliverance. On the way they were stopped at every interval by eager crowds clamorous to learn the details. Every where, as the happy intelligence transpired, citizens, who had for many months forsaken their domiciles, re-entered them in confidence, and others, long secluded in subterranean darkness, ventured into the light of day. The captives who peopled the countless prisons of France, began to indulge hopes of liberty, or at least to dismiss fears of death.

The precise nature of the revolution just effected was not investigated; how far the surviving members of the committee of public welfare were disposed to persist in the revolutionary system, or to what extent the convention might participate in their views, were considerations not heeded! the one great event, the death of Robespierre, was alone beheld and comprehended. It was he who had been the head of the government; to him were imputed the incarcerations, the executions, all the enormities, in short, of the late tyranny. Robespierre dead, it seemed as if all must change and assume a new aspect.

At all times, public expectation, consequent upon the occurrence of some great event, becomes an irresistible influence, to which rulers must more or less defer. Thus, after two days devoted to receiving congratulations, hearing addresses, all echoing the same cry, "Catiline is no more—the republic is saved!" recompensing individual acts of courage, and voting memorials to render the day of the 9th for ever famous, the convention directed attention to the measures its new situation demanded.

The popular commissions instituted to select individuals for detention, the revolutionary tribunal compounded by Robespierre, and the public accuser Fouquier-Tinville, still remained in authority, and needed but a signal of encouragement to continue their ruthless proceedings. In the sitting even of the 11th Thermidor (29th July), a motion was made and passed for subjecting the popular commissions to a process of purgation. Elie-Lacoste solicited attention to the revolutionary tribunal, and proposed its suspension until it were reorganised upon different principles and composed of other individuals. The proposal of Elie-Lacoste was adopted; and, at the same time, in order to avoid delay in trying Robespierre's accomplices, it was agreed to nominate a provisional commission to supersede the revolutionary tribunal. In the evening sitting, Barrère, in his habitual character of reporter, appeared to announce a further achievement—the entry of the French into Liege; and afterwards digressed to the existing condition of the committees, which had been reduced at various times, by executions and missions, in the number of members. Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, had expired on the scaffold the previous day. Herault-Séchelles had died with Danton. Jean-Bon-Saint-André and Prieur [de-la-Marne] were on missions. The acting members on the committee of public welfare consisted only of Carnot, who attended exclusively to the war department; Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or], charged with the care of arsenals and magazines; Robert Lindet, with the superintendence of supplies and of trade; Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois, with the management of correspondence with the administrative bodies; and, lastly, Barrère, with the preparation of reports. Out of twelve, therefore, but six remained. The committee of general safety was more complete, and pronounced fully adequate to its duties. Barrère proposed to replace the three members recently executed by three new members, for the interval occurring until the general renewal of the committees, which was fixed for the 20th of each month—a form that had ceased to be observed since the ascendancy of the dictatorship. Hereby important considerations were suggested:—Ought all the men who had formed part of the late government to be cashiered? Ought not only the men but the principles and constitution of the committees to be changed, precautions taken against their undue influence, their powers curtailed; in a word, a complete revolution effected in the administration of the government?

Such were the questions started by Barrère's proposition. First, exception was taken to the form of proceeding, whereby the convention was suddenly and dictatorially asked to nominate members for the committee the same day they were proposed. It was thereupon moved that the list of names submitted be printed, and the appointment adjourned. Dubois-Crancé went further, and complained of the prolonged absence of members of the committees. "If Herault-Séchelles," he said, "had been replaced, if Prieur-de-la-Marne and Jean-Bon-Saint-André had not been left constantly on missions, a majority would have been more certain, and less hesitation manifested in attacking the triumvirs." He subsequently maintained that men grew indolent in power, and otherwise contracted dangerous habits. In consequence, he recommended a decree, providing that, for the future, no member of the committees should be competent to accept missions; and that a fourth part of each committee should be renewed every month. Cambon, urging the discussion still further, alleged that the entire government required a fresh organisation. The committee of public welfare, he represented, had monopolised all affairs, whence it resulted that the members, albeit toiling day and night, were unequal to the burden imposed upon them, whilst the committees of finance, legislation, and general safety, were reduced to complete nullity. A new distribution of functions, therefore, was essential, in order to prevent the committee of public welfare being overwhelmed with business and the other committees practically annihilated.

The discussion being thus provoked, an assault was threatened on all portions of the revolutionary government. But Bourdon-de-l'Oise, whose opposition to Robespierre's system was well known, inasmuch as he had been marked for one of his first victims, checked this premature movement. He said that France had long possessed an able and vigorous government, to which the safety of the country and many signal victories were owing; that great peril might ensue from imprudently interfering with its organisation; that all the hopes of the aristocrats would be thereby resuscitated; and that, whilst guarding against a new tyranny, still infinite caution should be observed in modifying an institution productive of so many great results. However, Tallien, the hero of the 9th, argued that at least certain questions might be now entertained, and that their immediate decision could be attended with no danger. Why, for example, not decree on the instant that a fourth of the members of the committees should go out in rotation every month? This proposition of Dubois-Crancé, thus reproduced by Tallien, was hailed with enthusiasm, and adopted amid cries of "Long live the republic!" To this measure the deputy Delmas advocated an addition. Addressing the assembly, he said, "You have now stifled ambition at its source; to complete your decree, I move you to decide that no member shall be eligible to re-enter a committee within a month after leaving it." This resolution, greeted like the preceding, was instantly passed. These principles being thus sanctioned, it was eventually agreed that to a commission should be delegated the task of presenting a new project for the organisation of the governing committees.

On the following day, six members were chosen, to replace those dead or absent, on the committee of public welfare. On this occasion, the nominations submitted by Barrère were not confirmed. The choice of the convention fell on Tallien, in remembrance of his courage; on Bréard, Thuriot, and Treilhard, members of the first committee of public welfare; and on the two deputies Laloi and Eschasseriaux the elder, the latter of whom was conversant in matters of finance and political economy. The committee of general safety was likewise remodelled. Three of its members were objects of general odium—David, obnoxious as a reputed adherent of Robespierre, and Jagot and Lavicomterie, accused of having exercised their inquisitorial powers in a revolting manner. Numerous voices demanded their displacement, and it was decreed. The assembly appointed, to succeed them and complete the committee of general safety, several of the champions who had distinguished themselves on the 9th Thermidor—Legendre, Merlin de Thionville, Goupilleau de Fontenay, André Dumont, Jean Debry, and Bernard de Saintes. It subsequently rescinded the law of the 22d Prairial by an unanimous vote. Complaints were then vehemently urged against the decree which permitted the incarceration of a deputy without a preliminary hearing before the convention—that fatal decree, which had consigned to death many eminent victims yet cherished in recollection, Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, Herault-Séchelles, &c. The decree was abrogated. All these measures, however, only affected the substance of things, and there were men against whom the public resentment was fierce and inexorable. "All Paris," exclaimed Legendre, "invokes you for the justly merited punishment of Fouquier-Tinville!" The suggestion was immediately acted upon, and Fouquier decreed under impeachment. "We can no longer sit by the side of Lebon!" cried another voice; and all eyes were turned on the proconsul who had deluged the town of Arras with blood, and whose excesses had provoked remonstrance even in the time of Robespierre. Lebon was forthwith declared in a state of arrest. The storm next fell on David, who had been at first merely excluded from the committee of general safety, and he was placed under arrest. The like proceeding was adopted against Héron, the principal agent of the police instituted by Robespierre; against General Rossignol, heretofore well known; and against Hermann, president of the revolutionary tribunal previous to Dumas, afterwards appointed, through the influence of Robespierre, head of the commission of police and courts of justice.

Thus the revolutionary tribunal was suspended, the law of the 22d Prairial repealed, the committees of public welfare and general safety partially recomposed, and the principal agents of the late dictatorship arrested and criminated. The character of the last revolution was fixed, and the impulse given to hopes and appeals of every kind. The detained who filled the prisons, and their families, now congratulated themselves on the prospect of enjoying the fruits of the 9th Thermidor. Anterior to this happy moment, the relatives of the suspected dared not reclaim, even to substantiate the most legitimate reasons, under the apprehension either of awakening the attention of Fouquier-Tinville or of being themselves immured for soliciting in favour of aristocrats. The dreary interval of terror had, however, at length elapsed. The sections, which had been long abandoned to the sans-culottes, who received forty sous a-day, began again to be frequented, and were speedily filled with individuals now emerging from the deepest seclusion, relatives of prisoners, and fathers, brothers, or sons of victims immolated by the revolutionary tribunal. The desire of delivering their kinsmen animated several, the thirst of vengeance incited others. In all the sections the liberation of the detained was advocated, and deputations were sent to the convention craving a decree in conformity. These petitions were referred to the committee of general safety, whose duty it was to superintend the application of the law of the suspected. Although it still contained the greater number of those who had signed the warrants of arrest, the bias of circumstances and the infusion of new members necessarily inclined it to lenity. It commenced, in fact, to issue orders of discharge in great profusion. Certain of its members—Legendre, Merlin, and others—visited the prisons to gather complaints, and inspired infinite gladness by their words and presence; their colleagues, sitting day and night, entertained the pleas of relatives, who attended in crowds to obtain adjudications of release. The committee was instructed to examine whether the alleged suspected had been incarcerated on grounds set forth in the law of the 17th September, and whether such grounds were specified in the warrants of arrest. This was merely reverting to the law of the 17th September in its more strict interpretation and execution; but it in truth sufficed to empty the prisons almost entirely. The precipitation of the revolutionary agents had been so great, that they were accustomed to apprehend without particularising the assigned motives, or giving the prisoners intimation thereof. Accordingly, liberations proceeded as multitudinously as the previous detentions. The joy, if less boisterous, became then more heartfelt; it communicated to families who recovered a father, a son, or a brother, of whom they had been long deprived, and whom they had given up as doomed to the scaffold. Men now poured forth from the prisons whom their reserve or their connexions had rendered obnoxious to a suspicious authority, and many, also, in whom even an accredited patriotism had not availed to pardon opposition. That young general, who, concentrating the two armies of the Moselle and the Rhine on a single flank of the Vosges, had raised the blockade of Landau by a movement worthy of the greatest captains, Hoche, immured for his resistance to the committee of public welfare, was released, and restored to his family and the armies which he was again to lead on to victory. Kilmaine, too, who saved the army of the North by evacuating Cæsar's Camp in August 1793, and imprisoned for that admirable retreat, likewise recovered his liberty. That young and beautiful female, who had gained so beneficial a sway over Tallien, and had never ceased to stimulate his courage from the recesses of her prison, was delivered by him and made his wife. The liberations, in fact, increased after a geometrical ratio, although the solicitations with which the committee was besieged seemed still numerous as ever. "Victory," said Barrère, "has produced an epoch in which the country may be indulgent without danger, and deem incivic errors effaced by an interval of confinement. The committees labour continuously to decide on claims of freedom, and to repair individual mistakes or injustice. Shortly the trace of personal vengeance will disappear from the soil of the republic; but the concourse of suitors of both sexes at the doors of the committee of general safety only tend to retard exertions so advantageous to the public. We grant the impatience of families to be natural under the circumstances; but why delay, by solicitations irksome to legislators, and by assemblages inconveniently tumultuous, the rapid course that national justice ought to take at this period?"

The committee of general safety was in truth assailed by importunities of every kind. Females especially exerted their influence to procure acts of clemency, even in behalf of known enemies of the revolution. More than one deception was practised on the committee: the Dukes d'Aumont and De Valentinois were released under supposititious names, and a great number of others obtained enlargement by similar devices. But little positive danger could thence accrue; for, as Barrère had truly stated, victory had introduced an epoch in which the republic might securely become lenient and benign. At the same time, the report that many undoubted aristocrats were being liberated, was calculated to revive revolutionary distrust, and rupture the unanimity wherewith the measures of mildness and concord were at present greeted.

The sections, meanwhile, had become scenes of agitation and tumult. The relatives of prisoners or of victims, the suspected recently liberated, and all, indeed, to whom freedom of speech was restored, as might have been anticipated, clamoured not only for reparation of past injuries, but also for vengeance on the wrong-doers. An inveterate feeling more particularly prevailed against the revolutionary committees, and they were bitterly assailed. It was proposed to remodel, even to abolish them; and these angry discussions provoked sundry disturbances in Paris. The section of Montreuil appeared before the convention to denounce the arbitrary acts of its revolutionary committee; that of the French Pantheon declared its committee had forfeited its confidence; and that of the Social Contract likewise adopted severe resolutions touching the conduct of its revolutionary committee, and appointed a commission to investigate its records.

These movements were indicative of a natural reaction on the part of the moderate class, long awed into silence and fear by the inquisitors of the revolutionary committees, and could scarcely fail to attract the attention of the Mountain.

That redoubtable Mountain had not perished with Robespierre, but yet survived to play a part. Certain of its members were steadfastly convinced of the integrity and loyalty of Robespierre's intentions, and refused to believe he contemplated usurpation. They regarded him as the victim of Danton's friends and of the corrupt party, the remains whereof he had been unable to destroy; but a very trifling minority held that opinion. The majority of the Mountaineers, sincere and enthusiastic republicans, viewing with abhorrence every project of exclusive dominion, had aided in accomplishing the 9th Thermidor, less to subvert a sanguinary government than to smite a rising Cromwell. Doubtless, revolutionary justice, such as it had become under the auspices of Robespierre, Saint-Just, Couthon, Fouquier-Tinville, and Dumas, was revolting to their feelings; but they intended in no degree to relax the energy of the government or to spare what was called aristocracy. The greater part were upright and rigid men, strangers to the dictatorship and to its acts, and by no means interested in vindicating it; but they were likewise jealous revolutionists, averse to the 9th Thermidor resulting in a reaction and turning to the advantage of a party. Amongst the members of the convention who had coalesced to overthrow the dictatorship, they beheld with secret aversion men who passed for knaves and extortioners, friends of Chabot and Fabre-d'Eglantine, members, in short, of the so-much-decried venal, jobbing, and debauched party. They had seconded them against Robespierre, but they were prepared to oppose them if they perceived any tendency towards checking revolutionary energy, or converting the late events into a means of exalting any faction whatsoever. Danton had been accused of corruption, federalism, Orleanism, royalism; therefore it is not surprising that suspicions of a like nature arose against his now triumphant friends. At the same time, no attack was yet made; but the numerous liberations and the general demonstration against the revolutionary system began to awaken solicitude.

The veritable authors of the 9th Thermidor, numbering fifteen or twenty, of whom the principal were Legendre, Fréron, Tallien, Merlin-de-Thionville, Barras, Thuriot, Bourdon [de-l'Oise], Dubois-Crancé, and Lecointre of Versailles, were not more disposed than their colleagues towards royalism and a counter-revolution; but, excited by the danger they had incurred and the arduous struggle so recently maintained, they pronounced more decidedly against the revolutionary laws. Moreover, they partook in a much greater degree that feeling of commiseration which had ruined their friends Danton and Desmoulins. Encompassed, extolled, importuned, they became more committed than their colleagues of the Mountain to the system of clemency. It is possible, indeed, that some amongst them were drawn into involuntary beneficence by their new position. To render services to disconsolate families, to receive testimonies of overflowing gratitude, to soothe the bitterness of past affliction, had charms to tempt more obdurate men than they. Be that as it may, already those who distrusted their complaisant mood, and likewise those who placed future hopes in the dawning change, gave them a peculiar appellation—they called them Thermidorians.

Contentions frequently occurred on the subject of liberations. Thus, for example, on the recommendation of a deputy in behalf of an individual from his department, the committee ordered his release; shortly a deputy of the same department appeared to complain of this order, affirming that the committee had enlarged a pure aristocrat. Such disputes often recurring, and the confluence of numerous undoubted enemies of the revolution, who came forth beaming with joyful anticipations, led to a measure which was adopted without much importance being attached to it at the moment. This was a resolution that the list of all the individuals discharged by orders from the committee of general safety should be printed, and that opposite the name of each such person should be specified the names of those who had pleaded for him and who had answered for his principles.

This measure produced a most painful impression. Still mindful of the tyranny they had so recently endured, many citizens were alarmed to perceive their names commemorated on a list which might hereafter serve as a foundation for fresh severities, if the system of terror were ever re-established. Several of those who had solicited and obtained liberations deeply regretted their interference, whilst others shrunk from advocating any further claims. In the sections, numerous speakers inveighed against a measure so calculated to throw gloom over the public joy and confidence, and strenuously insisted it ought to be revoked.

On the 26th Thermidor (13th August), an incidental discussion arose in the convention, touching the agitation prevailing in the sections of Paris. The section of Montreuil had attended to denounce its revolutionary committee, and received for answer that it should address its complaints to the committee of general safety. Duhem, deputy for Lille, a personage unconnected with the acts of the late dictatorship, but a friend of Billaud-Varennes, partaking all his opinions, and firmly convinced that the revolutionary authority ought not to be relaxed in rigour, rose and expressed himself with peculiar vehemence against aristocracy and moderatism, which, he averred, "were already rearing their audacious heads, and concluding that the 9th Thermidor had been effected for their benefit." Baudot and Taillefer, who had manifested a courageous resistance under the supremacy of Robespierre, but were equally uncompromising Mountaineers as Duhem, together with Vadier, famous as a member of the old committee of general safety, likewise maintained that aristocracy was in activity, and that, whilst the government showed itself just, it ought also to remain inflexible. Granet of Marseilles, who sat upon the Mountain, submitted a motion which tended to augment the excitement of the assembly. He moved that the prisoners already liberated, whose sureties failed to furnish their names within a given period, should be again incarcerated. This proposition caused a general commotion. Bourdon, Lecointre, and Merlin de Thionville, opposed it with their utmost strength. The discussion, as generally happens on such occasions, travelled from the immediate subject to the political position, and much acrimony was displayed in assailing the views respectively attributed on the hostile sides. "It is time," exclaimed Merlin de Thionville, "that all the factions be debarred from using the steps of Robespierre's throne. Nothing ought to be done by halves, and yet it must be granted, the convention, in the day of the 9th Thermidor, did many things incompletely. But if it left tyrants here, they ought at least to keep silence." Much applause greeted Merlin's words, which were addressed chiefly to Vadier, one of those who had most strongly inveighed against the movements in the sections. Legendre occupied the tribune after Merlin. "The committee is well aware," he said, "that it has been trepanned into the release of certain aristocrats; but the number is not great, and they will soon be reimprisoned. Why perpetually accuse each other? Why regard one another as enemies, when our intentions link us together? Let us moderate our passions, if we would assure and accelerate the success of the revolution. Citizens, I move you to repeal the law of the 23d, which commands the publication of the lists of released citizens. That law has dissipated public joy and frozen all hearts."

Tallien succeeded Legendre. He was heard with profound attention as the principal of the Thermidorians. "For several days," he said, "all good citizens have perceived with grief that endeavours are making to divide you, and to rekindle those animosities which were thought to be buried in the tomb of Robespierre. On entering here, a note was handed me, intimating that several members were to be attacked in this sitting. Doubtless they are enemies of the republic who give currency to such reports: let us beware how we promote their designs by our dissensions." Plaudits interrupted Tallien: he resumed. "Imitators of Robespierre," he exclaimed, "expect no success! The convention is determined to perish rather than suffer a new tyranny. The convention desires an inflexible but also a just government. It is possible that some patriots have been deceived regarding certain prisoners; we do not hold the infallibility of men. But let the individuals improperly liberated be denounced, and they will be recommitted. For myself, I here declare, in all sincerity, that I prefer seeing twenty aristocrats at large to-day, who can be retaken to-morrow, rather than endure the consciousness that one patriot remained in durance. What! the republic with its twelve hundred thousand armed citizens, afraid of a few aristocrats! No—it is too great; it can at all times discover and put its enemies to confusion."

The cheers which had often interrupted Tallien in his speech resounded still more vociferously on its conclusion. After much general recrimination, the discussion reverted to the law of the 23d, and to the additional clause which Granet proposed for insertion therein. The advocates of the law maintained, that none could fear publicity in the performance of a patriotic act, such as appealing in behalf of a citizen unjustly confined. Its opponents replied, that nothing was more dangerous than such lists; that those of the twenty thousand and of the eight thousand had been the occasion of continual uneasiness; that all whose names were thereon inscribed had lived in terror; and that, were no other tyranny to be apprehended, the individuals recorded in the new lists would never enjoy tranquillity. Eventually a compromise was offered. Bourdon submitted a motion to the effect that the names of the enfranchised prisoners should be printed, without the addition of those who had solicited the liberations. This suggestion was accepted, and a resolution passed that the names of the discharged alone should be published. Tallien, who was not satisfied with this surrender, immediately presented himself in the tribune. "Since you have determined," he said, "to publish the list of the citizens restored to liberty, you cannot consistently withhold that of the citizens who caused their incarceration. It is equally fitting that we know those who denounced and immured good patriots." The assembly, somewhat taken by surprise, found the proposition just, and forthwith adopted it. Scarcely had the vote been taken, however, ere several members protested. "This is a list," said they, "which will stand in opposition to the former: it involves civil war!" The phrase was repeated in the hall, and numerous voices exclaimed, "It involves civil war!" "Yes," resumed Tallien, who again mounted the tribune—"yes, it is civil war! I think with you. Your two decrees will set in distinct array two classes of men who can never forgive each other. But I wished, in proposing the second decree, to make you sensible of the inconvenience of the first. Now, I move you to rescind both." From all quarters the exclamation arose, "Yes, yes! the repeal of both decrees!" Amar himself coincided, and the two decrees were recalled. All publication of lists was thus averted, the result of Tallien's bold and adroit surprise on the assembly.

This sitting restored confidence to many in whom alarm was again becoming predominant; but it at the same time proved that all animosities were not reconciled nor all struggles terminated. Every party had now been struck in its turn, and shorn of its most eminent members: the royalists at several eras; the Girondists on the 31st May; the Dantonists in Germinal; the ultra-Mountaineers on the 9th Thermidor. But if the more distinguished leaders had perished, the parties themselves survived; for such confederacies are rarely crushed by a single mischance, but even in their crippled state continue a more cautious agitation. These parties, then, were henceforth to contend for the direction of the revolution, and to recommence an arduous and merciless career. It seems, in sooth, that when the minds of men have been urged by the stimulus of danger to the acmé of excitement, it is only by slow degrees they can subside into pristine calmness; whilst, in the interim, power is grasped alternately by the struggling factions, and one remorseless combat of passions, systems, and ambition, waged.

After devoting its earliest attention to the mitigation of unnecessary severity, the convention turned to the organisation of the committees and of the provisional government, intended, as has been often mentioned, to rule France until the era of a general peace. A preliminary discussion had occurred, as we remember, respecting the committee of public welfare; and the whole question had been referred to a commission, with special instructions to digest and present a new project. The subject was one of imperative urgency, and the assembly entered upon it with the commencement of Thermidor. The difficulty of the position lay in steering between two opposite systems and dangers—between the fear, on the one hand, of weakening the authority intrusted with the safety of the revolution, and the dread, on the other, of restoring the tyranny. The tendency of men is to feel undue alarm at perils that are past, and to adopt precautions against what cannot recur. The tyranny of the late committee of public welfare had sprung from the necessity of fulfilling an extraordinary task amidst obstacles the most harassing and various. Certain men had taken upon themselves to perform what a large assembly could or dared not attempt with any hope of success; and, engrossed by unprecedented labours for a period of fifteen months, it had been impossible for them either to assign the grounds of their proceedings, or to render an account of them to the convention, save in a general manner: they had not had time even to deliberate amongst themselves, and each governed in the department committed to him as absolute master. They had thus become so many involuntary dictators, whom circumstances rather than ambition invested with uncontrolled power. Now that the task was almost accomplished, and the season of extreme peril past, no occasion remained to warrant or render feasible any similar authority. It partook of the puerile to guard so anxiously against a danger practically impossible; nay, this very wariness might be productive of serious evil, by relaxing authority and depriving it of energy. Twelve hundred thousand men had been raised, provisioned, armed, and conducted to the frontiers; but their further maintenance and direction were essential as heretofore, and required continued vigilance, joined to great capacity and extensive powers.

The principle of partially renewing the committees every month had been already adopted; and, at the same time, a resolution had been passed, that the retiring members should be ineligible for re-election during a month. These two conditions, framed to prevent a new dictatorship, likewise prevented all effective administration. In a ministry constantly fluctuating, coherency, continuous application, or secrecy, was impracticable. Scarcely was a member initiated in affairs, ere he was compelled to forego their management; and though a peculiar aptitude were manifested, as by Carnot for war, Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or] and Robert Lindet for civil administration, and Cambon for finance, still such superior talent was lost to the state at the term fixed; for the mere absence during a month, required by the law, rendered almost nugatory the advantages of a subsequent re-election.

But the spirit of reaction was irresistible. An extreme concentration of power was to be succeeded by an equally extreme dissemination, hazardous in the opposite tendency. The former committee of public welfare, being intrusted with the exercise of sovereign control over all that concerned the well-being of the state, had enjoyed the prerogative of summoning the other committees before it, and constraining them to render an account of their operations; whereby it had contrived to appropriate every important function in the department of each. To prevent such encroachments for the future, the new system of organisation separated and specified the jurisdictions of the committees, and constituted them mutually independent. Sixteen were established:—

1. The committee of public welfare.
2. The committee of general safety.
3. The committee of finance.
4. The committee of legislation.
5. The committee of public instruction.
6. The committee of agriculture and arts.
7. The committee of trade and supplies.
8. The committee of public works.
9. The committee of post-conveyances.
10. The military committee.
11. The committee of the navy and colonies.

12. The committee of public aids.
13. The committee of division.
14. The committee of minutes and records.
15. The committee of petitions, correspondence, and dispatches.
16. The committee of curators of the national palace.

The committee of public welfare was composed of twelve members. It retained the direction of military and diplomatic operations; it was charged with the levy and equipment of armies, the choice of generals, the plans of campaigns, &c.; but its powers were confined within those limits. The committee of general safety, composed of sixteen members, had the police assigned it; that of finance, composed of forty-eight members, had the management of the revenue, the exchequer, the coinage, assignats, &c. The committees were empowered to unite for objects of common concernment. Thus, the absolute authority of the former committee of public welfare was superseded by a number of rival boards, liable to embarrass and interfere with each other in their action. Such was the new organisation of the government.

Other reforms, deemed equally exigible, were effected at the same time. The revolutionary committees, established in the smallest towns, and authorised to execute inquisitorial functions therein, were the most vexatious and abhorred of all the institutions attributed to the Robespierre faction. With the view of restraining their obnoxious activity, their number was reduced to one in each district; provided, however, that one must be maintained in every borough containing eight thousand inhabitants, whether it were the district capital or not. In Paris, the number was curtailed from forty-eight to twelve. These committees were henceforth to be composed of twelve members; the signature of three members at least was declared essential to the validity of a writ, and of seven to substantiate a warrant of arrest. Like the superior committees, they were subjected to a monthly renewal of one-fourth part. These regulations were accompanied by another not less important in its operation, namely, a decree prohibiting the sectional assemblies from being held more than once in a decade, appointing the decadis or tenth days for such meetings, and disallowing the further payment of forty sous to the citizens attending them. This measure had the effect of confining democracy within narrower limits, by rendering popular assemblages more rare, and especially by depriving the lower classes of the remuneration previously granted for their presence. A practice was thus abolished which had degenerated into a monstrous abuse in Paris. It had been usual to pay in each section twelve hundred members as present, whilst scarcely three hundred were actually in attendance. Those present had been accustomed to answer for the absent —a service alternately performed and returned. Now, that operative militia, so long devoted to Robespierre, found itself discarded and constrained to labour.

One of the most important determinations taken by the convention was aimed at the individuals composing the local authorities, revolutionary committees, municipalities, &c., who were appointed to undergo a process of purgation. In those bodies, as we have previously intimated, the most ardent revolutionists were comprised—men who in each locality had played the part of Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon at Paris, and exercised their sway with all the brutality of inferior demagogues. The decree of the revolutionary government, suspending the constitution until the return of peace, had postponed elections of every description, in order to avoid disturbance and to maintain authority in approved hands. The convention, for reasons perfectly similar, that is to say, in order to prevent collisions between the Jacobins and the aristocrats, confirmed the dispositions of that decree, and merely empowered the representatives on missions to purge the administrations throughout France. By this expedient it secured to itself the selection and control of the local authorities, and averted the ebullition of faction against faction.

Lastly, the revolutionary tribunal, recently suspended, was restored to activity. The judges and jurymen not being yet all nominated, those actually appointed were to assume their functions ad interim, and try prisoners according to the laws in force prior to the decree of the 22d Prairial. Those laws were of a sufficiently formidable character; but the men who had been chosen to apply them, and the aptitude of extraordinary tribunals to obey the spirit of the government that calls them into existence, were guarantees against fresh cruelties.

All these measures were adopted between the 1st and the 15th of Fructidor (end of August). Still one invaluable privilege remained to be adjusted—the liberty of the press. No law prescribed restrictions upon it; in the declaration of rights it was even recognised in an unlimited sense; but it had been practically interdicted under the reign of terror. A single indiscreet word sufficing to compromise the life of a citizen, it would have argued reckless temerity to essay authorship. The fate of the lamented Camille-Desmoulins had significantly proved the real thraldom of the press in recent times. Durand-Maillane, an ex-constituent, and one of those timid characters who had shrunk into complete nullity during the storms of the revolutionary era, was the first to demand that the liberty of the press should be again formally asserted. "We have never been able," said that exemplary personage to his colleagues, "to utter our sentiments within these walls, without being exposed to insults and menaces. If you wish our opinions in the discussions hereafter to arise, if you wish that we may contribute our information to the common stock, you must give fresh securities to those who are disposed either to speak or to write."

A few days thereafter, Fréron, the friend and associate of Barras in his mission to Toulon, the intimate of Danton and of Camille-Desmoulins, and since their death a determined enemy of the committee of public welfare, raised his voice in support of Durand-Maillane, and moved the grant of unlimited freedom to the press. Opinions were divided. Those who had lived in constraint under the late dictatorship, and longed to express their ideas upon all subjects without hazard, those who were inclined to react energetically against the revolution, argued in favour of a formal declaration guaranteeing the liberty of thought, written or spoken. The Mountaineers, foreboding the use to which this license might be converted, seeing in embryo the tirades contemplated against all the individuals who had exercised any functions during the terror; and many others also, who, without having personal fears, duly appreciated the dangerous weapon proposed to be conferred on the counter-revolutionists, already swarming in all quarters—all these opposed an express declaration. They alleged as their reasons, that the declaration of rights consecrated the liberty of the press; that to acknowledge it anew was useless, since it was proclaiming a recognised right; and that, if it were intended to render the license unfettered, such a purpose was imprudent and impolitic. "Would you then permit royalism to spring up again," asked Bourdon-de-l'Oise and Cambon, "and publish whatsoever it may please against the institution of the republic?" The proposition was referred to the competent committees, to consider the expediency of a fresh declaration.

Thus the provisional government, framed to direct the revolution until the advent of peace, was integrally modified in accordance with the lenient and generous principles manifested since the 9th Thermidor. The governing committees, the revolutionary tribunal, the local administrations, were reorganised or purged; the liberty of the press was vindicated, and all announced a new era.

The effect these reforms were calculated to produce was not long in becoming apparent. Hitherto, the party of ultra-revolutionists had occupied the seats of government itself; it monopolised the committees and swayed the convention; it reigned supreme at the Jacobin Clubs, and filled the municipal administrations and the revolutionary committees wherewith all France was ramified. Now dispossessed, it began to find itself utterly excluded from the government, and to form a hostile faction against it.

The Jacobin Club had been suspended during the night of the 9th-10th Thermidor. Legendre had closed their hall, and deposited the keys on the table of the convention. The keys were restored, and the society was permitted to be reconstituted, on condition of undergoing purification. Fifteen of the oldest members were appointed to investigate the conduct of the whole fraternity on the night of the 9th Thermidor. They were enjoined to admit those only who, during that famous night, had been at their posts as citizens, instead of attending at the commune to conspire against the convention. Pending this purgation, the former members were allowed to occupy the hall as provisional members. The scrutiny being commenced, it was found that a strict inquiry touching each of them would involve great delay and difficulty; wherefore the censors were content to pass them through an interrogatory, and adjudicate on their replies. In how indulgent a spirit such an examination was likely to be conducted may be surmised, when it is remembered that Jacobins were sitting in judgment on Jacobins. In the course of a few days, upwards of six hundred members were reinstalled, upon their simple assurance that, during the night in question, they had been at the posts prescribed by their duty. The club was speedily recomposed in its previous condition, filled with individuals the zealous adherents of Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, and mourners of them as martyrs to liberty and victims of the counter-revolution. In connexion with the parent society, that famous electoral club still existed, into which those retired who had propositions to make inconsistent with the caution expedient on the public arena of the Jacobins themselves, and wherein some of the signal events of the revolution had been concocted. It still met at the Evêché, and was composed of old Cordeliers, of the most determined Jacobins, and of men the most compromised during the reign of terror. The Jacobin Club and it were the natural asylums of those functionaries whom the recent purgations had expelled from office. Thus the judges and jurymen of the revolutionary tribunal, the members of the forty-eight committees to the number of four hundred or thereabouts, the agents of the secret police under Robespierre and Saint-Just, the order-bearers of the committees, who formed the band of the notorious Héron, the clerks in different departments, the officials, in short, of every order, excluded from the places they had filled, congregated at the Jacobin and Electoral Clubs, whether they chanced to be already members or now obtained admission for the first time. There they gave free vent to their complaints and resentments. They were uneasy as to their personal safety, dreading the vengeance of those they had persecuted; and furthermore, they regretted the loss of lucrative appointments, especially those who, being members of the revolutionary committees, had enjoyed opportunities of adding plunder and extortion to their fixed emoluments. The union of these men produced a violent and vindictive party, the natural ardour of their opinions being now inflamed with the exasperation of wounded self-interest. The precedent of Paris served for example to the rest of France. The discarded members of the municipalities, the revolutionary committees, and the district directories, gathered together in the affiliated societies, and gave utterance in concert to their grievances and their animosities. They commanded the sympathy of the populace, who had likewise been despoiled of agreeable functions since the payment of the forty sous was discontinued as the reward of attendance in the sections.

In abhorrence of this party and in antagonism to it, there grew up another, which was, however, little more than a revival. It comprehended all who had suffered or been reduced to silence during the system of terror, and who now deemed the moment arrived for springing into activity, and directing in their turn the course of the revolution. We have already seen, when on the topic of the liberations, the relatives of captives and victims reappear in the sections, and there busily agitate to accelerate the opening of the prisons, or stimulate the denunciation and arraignment of the revolutionary committees. The new tendencies of the convention, the reforms effected, increased the hopes and the courage of these first reclaimers. They belonged to all the classes that had endured oppression, various in grade and calling, but chiefly to the commercial and burgher class—to that industrious, opulent, and moderate community, which, monarchical and constitutional with the Constituent Assembly and republican with the Girondists, was vanquished on the 31st May, and had been since exposed to unrelenting persecution. In its ranks were now concealed the small remnants of nobility, who dared not yet complain of their depression, but who invoked the rights of humanity in their own behalf, and sundry partisans of royalty, creatures or agents of the old court, who had never ceased to foster obstacles in the way of the revolution, by joining in every opposition, whatever might be its principle or character. The young men of these different classes were they who, as usual, declared themselves with the greatest vivacity and energy, for the impetuosity of youth is always the first to assail an oppressive system. These filled the sections, the Palais-Royal, and the public places, and vented their opinions against those who were called the terrorists, in the most resolute strain. They alleged the most exalted motives. Some had witnessed the desolation of their families; others foreboded their tyrannical treatment, should the reign of terror be restored; and all obtested they would resist its revival to the last drop of their blood. But the secret of the vehemence on the part of many amongst them lay in the conscription: some had avoided it by secreting themselves, others had quitted the armies on hearing of the 9th Thermidor. To them were joined the authors and writers, so enthralled in recent times—an order of men prone as youth itself to swell the cry of opposition; these already inundated the journals, and stocked pamphlets with furious diatribes against the reign of terror and its abettors.

The two parties expressed themselves in the most strenuous but contradictory terms on the modifications introduced by the convention into the revolutionary system. The Jacobins and the clubbists exclaimed against aristocracy; they complained of the committee of general safety, for liberating counter-revolutionists, and of the press, as being already made the vehicle of ruthless calumny against those who had saved France. The measure which chiefly roused their ire, however, was the sweeping process of purgation applied to the various authorities. Not venturing precisely to remonstrate against the dismissal of individuals, since that would have implied personal motives, they declaimed against the mode of nomination, maintaining that the right of electing their magistrates ought to be restored to the people, and that to delegate the appointment of members of municipalities, district directories, and revolutionary committees, to representatives on missions, was a flagrant usurpation. They likewise asserted that the limitation of the sections to one meeting in each decade was a violation of the inherent right possessed by the citizens of assembling to deliberate on public affairs. Most of such complaints were in direct contradiction to the principles of the revolutionary government, which had prohibited all elections until the restoration of peace; but parties are regardless of inconsistencies when their interests are affected, and the revolutionists were aware that a popular election would have reseated them in their places.

On the other hand, the burghers in the sections, the young men at the Palais-Royal and in the public places, and the writers in the journals, demanded with vehemence the unlimited freedom of the press, and inveighed against the retention of numerous agents of the late dictatorship in the existing committees and authorities. They even ventured to frame petitions against representatives who had been engaged on certain missions. In truth, they derided all services hitherto rendered, and began to revile the convention itself.

Tallien, who, in his capacity of the Thermidorian leader, considered himself peculiarly responsible for the new impulse imparted to affairs, was desirous that such impulse should be sustained with firmness, bending neither to the one side nor to the other. In a discourse replete with subtle distinctions between the system of terror and the revolutionary government, the general purport whereof was, that, without putting in vogue systematic cruelty, an adequate degree of energy must yet be observed, Tallien moved the convention to declare that the revolutionary government was still in force, and that consequently the primary assemblies ought not to be convoked for the purpose of elections; but he proposed to declare at the same time, that all the courses of terror were proscribed, and that proceedings instituted against writers for freely delivering their opinions, should be deemed modes of terror.

These propositions, which embodied no specific measure, and merely intimated the views of the Thermidorians, who wished to plant themselves between the two parties without favouring either, were referred to the three committees of public welfare, general safety, and legislation, to whom every thing bearing on these questions was remitted.

The rancour of the two parties, however, was not to be assuaged by such impartial indications. They continued their mutual invectives with unabated virulence; and what greatly contributed to augment the general uneasiness and to multiply topics of complaint and accusation, was the economical situation of France, more deplorable at this moment, perhaps, than it had ever been, even in the most calamitous epochs of the revolution.

The assignats, notwithstanding the victories of the republic, had experienced a rapid depreciation, and represented in trade only the sixth or the eighth fraction of their nominal value, which caused a lamentable derangement in traffic, and rendered the maximum more impracticable and vexatious than ever. Want of confidence was obviously no longer the reason of this depreciation, since no fears could now be entertained for the existence of the republic; it was owing to the excessive and always increasing issues commensurate with the decline. The taxes, gathered with difficulty and paid in paper, scarcely supplied a fourth or a fifth of the sums monthly dispensed by the government for the extraordinary expenses of the war, and the deficiency was to be made good by fresh emissions. Thus, since the previous year, the quantity of assignats in circulation, which it had been expected to reduce by various combinations to two thousand millions, had risen, on the contrary, to four thousand six hundred millions.

To this enormous accumulation of paper-money, and to the depreciation consequent thereon, were added all the calamities resulting both from the war itself and the arbitrary measures it had superinduced. We recollect that, in order to establish a forced relation between the nominal value of assignats and articles of merchandise, the law of the maximum had been devised, which regulated the price of all commodities, and interdicted dealers from enhancing it in proportion to the decline of paper; and that this measure was aggravated by requisitions, in the enforcement whereof the representatives or agents of the administration were invested with power to purvey all supplies necessary for the armies and the larger boroughs, paying for them in assignats, and at the rates of the maximum. These expedients had saved France, but with the evil of throwing trade and the circulation into irremediable confusion.

The principal inconveniences of the maximum have been already detailed, but may be recapitulated. The general establishment of two markets, the one public, in which the dealers exposed only their worst articles, and in the smallest possible quantity, and the other clandestine, in which they sold their best commodities for specie, and at unfettered prices; the universal secretion of produce, which the cultivators contrived to shield from the vigilant scrutiny of the agents charged to make requisitions; lastly, disorder and intermission in manufacturing, because the manufacturers could not realise, from the prices allowed on their goods, the cost even of production. All these evils of a two-sided traffic, the concealment of agricultural produce, and the stagnation of manufacturing industry, had only increased with the course of time. Throughout all the ramifications of trade, two exchanges had been established—the one public and deficient, the other furtive and extortionate. There were two qualities of bread, two qualities of meat, two qualities of every thing; the one for the rich, who could pay in specie or exceed the maximum, the other for the poor, the artisan, the annuitant, who could only offer the nominal value of the assignat. The farmers had become daily more ingenious in hoarding their stocks; they made false declarations, and abstained, under pretext of lacking labour, from threshing their corn—an allegation sufficiently plausible, for the war had absorbed fifteen hundred thousand men; they urged, likewise, the bad harvest, which had certainly not turned out so favourably as had been anticipated in the early part of the year, when, at the festival to the Supreme Being, thanksgivings were chanted to Heaven for victories and abundant crops. As to the manufacturers, they had entirely suspended their operations. We recollect that, in order to avoid injustice towards the retailers, it had been found necessary during the preceding year to extend the law to the manufacturers, and to fix the price of fabrics at the place of production, adding thereto the cost of carriage; but the law then became unjust towards these new objects of its attention. Raw materials and handicraft labour having shared in the general enhancement, the manufacturers had been unable to redeem their outlay, and had accordingly ceased to produce. The commercial community were in the same predicament. For example, the freight on merchandise from the Indies had risen from 150 francs to 400 francs per ton, and the rates of insurance from 5 and 6 to 50 and 60 per cent. Importers, therefore, could no longer afford to dispose of foreign cargoes at the prices of the maximum, and they consequently ceased their traffic. As we have elsewhere remarked, if the price be forced on one article, it must be equally so through all the ramifications of industry; which is altogether impracticable.

Time had unfolded other mischievous consequences resulting from the maximum. The price of corn had been fixed upon an uniform scale throughout France. But the production of corn being unequal in cost and quantity in the different provinces, the legal rate proved inappropriate to the various local peculiarities. Again, the power vested in the municipalities of determining the prices of all commodities, led to another species of derangement. When a deficiency existed in any town, the authorities raised the standard of prices, which had the effect of attracting supplies to the prejudice of adjacent districts; so that in one place a glut, in another a dearth, prevailed, at the will of those who regulated the tariff, and the operations of trade, instead of flowing in a regular and natural channel, were subjected to capricious, partial, and convulsive vicissitudes.

The consequences of the requisitions were even more disastrous. This oppressive system was enforced for the purposes of supplying the armies, providing the great arm-manufactories and arsenals with all that they needed, provisioning the large towns, and sometimes obtaining for manufacturers the materials required in their business. Those to whom the power of making requisitions was delegated, were the representatives on missions, the commissaries in the armies, and the agents of the commission for trade and supplies. During the urgency of the danger, requisitions had been made with precipitation and disorder, frequently encountering on the same articles, whereby the owners were perplexed which to obey. They were generally on an unlimited scale, embracing an entire commodity in a town or a department. In such cases, the traders or farmers were debarred from selling to any but the purveyors of the republic; and all dealings being interdicted, the article under requisition remained for a long period without being removed or paid for, and the interchanges of trade were effectually checked. In the confusion of the emergency, distances had been scarcely calculated, and departments were often laid under requisition the most remote from the town or army intended to be supplied, whereby transports were inconveniently augmented. Several rivers and canals being devoid of water on account of an unusual drought, land-carriage alone was feasible, and the horses engaged in agriculture were absorbed for the purpose. This extraordinary employment, combined with a forced levy of 44,000 horses, rendered them so scarce, that the means of conveyance were absolutely exhausted. The effect of these ill-designed and often useless removals, was to accumulate enormous quantities of goods and provisions in the public magazines, heaped promiscuously together, and exposed to infinite damage and loss. The cattle collected for the republic were insufficiently fed; they reached the shambles in lean and poor condition, and a calamitous deficiency in greasy products, lard, tallow, &c., resulted. To all this were added woful waste, and abuses of the most disgraceful description. Dishonest agents secretly resold at the highest currency the commodities they had obtained at the maximum by means of requisitions. Such frauds were likewise practised by traders and manufacturers, who, having previously procured orders of requisition under pretence of supplying their own wants, subsequently disposed at enhanced prices of what they had purchased at the rates of the maximum.

These various causes co-operating with the evils of a continental and naval war, had reduced commercial industry to the most melancholy condition. All intercourse with the colonies was at an end, the English cruisers rendering access almost impracticable, and nearly the whole of them being ravaged by war. The most important, Saint-Domingo, was laid waste with fire and sword by the hostile parties contending for its possession. By this concourse of untoward accidents, external communication had become rare and precarious—a state of isolation further augmented by the revolutionary measure subjecting to sequestration the property of aliens at war with France. The object of the convention, in ordaining that sequestration, was to suppress the negotiation of foreign paper, and prevent capitalists from disparaging assignats by purchases of bills of exchange on Frankfort, Amsterdam, London, and other emporiums. The confiscation of credits held by Spaniards, Germans, Dutch, and English, on France, provoked a similar proceeding on their part, and all circulation of exchangeable values between France and the principal states of Europe ceased. Commercial relations existed only with the neutral countries, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, the United States, and the Levant; but the commission for trade and supplies had engrossed the whole of such intercourse in procuring grain, iron, and different articles requisite for the navy. For those purposes it had placed all the bills drawn on those countries under requisition, giving the French bankers assignats in return, and using them to pay for the various products purchased in Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, or America.

The whole commerce of France, therefore, was reduced to the operations of government in drawing supplies from foreign countries by means of the bills forcibly extorted from the French bankers. If any cargoes chanced to arrive on private account, they were summarily attached by requisitions, whereby, as we have already intimated, the merchants were effectually discouraged, since freight and insurance cost them a prodigious outlay, and they were remunerated at the rates of the maximum alone. The only merchandise at all abundant in the French ports proceeded from captures made by corsairs; but it was stopped in transitu by the requisitions, and also by the prohibitions issued against the produce of hostile nations. Nantes and Bordeaux, previously devastated by the civil war, had fallen into decay and extreme distress through this stagnation of commerce. Marseilles, which formerly flourished by its trade with the Levant, saw its harbours blockaded by the English, its principal merchants dispersed by the reign of terror, its soap-manufactories destroyed or transported into Italy, and a meagre, disadvantageous intercourse with Genoa its sole field of activity. The cities in the interior were stricken with a ruin equally complete. Nismes had ceased to produce its silks, which it formerly exported to the value of twenty millions. The opulent town of Lyons, destroyed by bombs and mines, was in a state of demolition, and no longer fabricated the rich tissues it was wont to vend annually for an amount exceeding sixty millions. A decree directing the stoppage of all articles destined for towns in rebellion, had been the means of accumulating around Lyons immense stores, part whereof had been intended for Lyons itself, and the remainder for conveyance through it to the numerous points studding the great route to the south. The towns of Châlons, Mâçon, and Valence, had taken advantage of this decree to arrest the commodities proceeding along that usually crowded thoroughfare. The manufacturers of Sedan had been obliged to intermit the weaving of fine fabrics, and apply themselves to the production of cloth suitable for troops; whilst, at the same time, the principal amongst them were imprisoned as accomplices of the movement projected by Lafayette after the 10th August. The departments of the North, the Pays-de-Calais, the Somme, and the Aisne, so rich from the cultivation of flax and hemp, had been completely devastated by the war. Towards the west, in the unfortunate La Vendée, upwards of six hundred square leagues were lying almost an entire waste. The country was in part an unpeopled desert, and the flocks roamed at hazard, without pasturage or covering. In fine, even where peculiar calamities were not superadded to the general disasters, the war had fatally thinned the labouring population, whilst terror on the one hand, and political preoccupation on the other, had driven from or disgusted with toil a vast number of industrious citizens. In every locality the workshops and fields were abandoned by multitudes for the charms of the clubs, the municipal councils, and the sections, where they received forty sous for indulging in excitement and agitation.

Thus, disorder in the markets, scarcity of provisions, and stagnation of manufacturing industry in consequence of the maximum; inconsiderate removals, useless accumulations, waste and damage of goods, and exhaustion of the means of transport under the system of requisitions; interruption of intercourse with neighbouring nations on account of the war, naval blockade and sequestrations; devastation of manufacturing towns and agricultural districts in civil strife; loss of population by the conscription; idleness resulting from the passion for political excitation—such is the picture of France rescued from foreign conquest, but shattered for a moment by the stupendous efforts imposed upon her.

Under these circumstances it is that we perceive two parties at issue after the 9th Thermidor—the one upholding the revolutionary measures as indispensable, and striving to prolong indefinitely a state of things essentially transient; the other, exasperated at the inevitable calamities of an extraordinary organisation, forgetting the services rendered by that organisation, and labouring to abolish it as atrocious; and, in the existing condition of France, we may conceive how profusely two such parties would be supplied with topics of recrimination. The Jacobins exclaimed against the relaxation of the laws; against the violation of the maximum by the farmers, dealers, and rich merchants; against the impunity allowed to stock-jobbing, and against the depreciation of assignats; thus reviving the outcries of the Hébertists against the rich and against forestallers and stockjobbers. Their opponents, on the contrary, now venturing for the first time to assail revolutionary expedients, inveighed against the excessive emission of assignats, the tyranny of requisitions, the injuries inflicted on Lyons, Sedan, Nantes, and Bordeaux, and the various prohibitions and fetters which paralysed and ruined commerce. These were, with the liberty of the press and the mode of nominating public functionaries, the standard themes dilated upon in the counter-petitions from the clubs and sections. All such documents were meanwhile referred to the committees of public welfare, finance, and trade, with instructions to frame reports and propound their views thereon.

Thus, in all that had been done and in all that was yet doing, two parties in hostile array were bent on seeking and finding continual subjects of accusation and reproach. Every thing hitherto performed, good or evil, was imputed to the members of the old committees, against whom the authors of the reaction now began to vent their smothered wrath. Although they had contributed to overthrow Robespierre, it was alleged that their quarrel with him was instigated solely by ambition and the desire of more largely participating in the tyranny; that at bottom they thought alike, held identical principles, and purposed to continue the same odious system in their own persons. Amongst the Thermidorians ranked prominently Lecointre of Versailles, who, being of an ardent and wayward temperament, expressed himself with an imprudent warmth disapproved by his colleagues. He had formed the design of denouncing Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, of the old committee of public welfare, and David, Vadier, Amar, and Vouland, of the committee of general safety, as accomplices and continuators of Robespierre. He neither could nor dared make the same accusation against Carnot, Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or], and Robert Lindet, whom opinion entirely separated from their colleagues, and who were esteemed as exclusively occupied by the labours to which the safety of France was owing. Neither did he venture to attack all the members of the committee of general safety, because in public estimation they were not all equally criminal. He communicated his project to Tallien and Legendre, who endeavoured to dissuade him from its execution; but, deaf to their entreaties and arguments, in the sitting of the 12th Fructidor (29th August), he presented twenty-six heads of accusation against the members of the old committees. These twenty-six articles were compounded of vague charges, that the accused had been accomplices in the system of terror which Robespierre had perfected to oppress the convention and all France; had joined in the arbitrary acts of the two committees; had signed orders of proscription; had disregarded the appeals made on behalf of citizens unjustly imprisoned; had powerfully contributed to the death of Danton; had upheld the law of the 22d Prairial; had left the convention in ignorance that law was not the work of the whole committee; had failed to denounce Robespierre when he seceded from the committee of public welfare; and, lastly, had taken no precautions during the 8th, 9th, and 10th Thermidor, to shield the convention from the designs of the conspirators.

When Lecointre had finished the perusal of these twenty-six articles, Goujon, deputy of the Ain—a young, sincere, fervent republican, and a disinterested Mountaineer, for he was free from the reproaches to which the late government was obnoxious—arose and mounted the tribune, with all the appearances of profound sorrow. "I am painfully affected," he said, "when I behold the cool tranquillity wherewith endeavours are made to sow new seeds of discord and accelerate the ruin of the country. Sometimes you are urged to anathematise, under the name of the system of terror, all that has been done during the last year; at other times you are asked to impeach men who have rendered signal services to the revolution. They may be culpable; I know not. I was with the armies, and I am unable to judge; but if I had documents criminating members of the convention, I would not produce them, or only bring them under grievous necessity. On the contrary, with what matchless unconcern do others attempt to plunge a dagger in the breasts of men dear to the country for their important services! But mark, the charges alleged against them bear on the convention itself. Yes, it is the convention that is accused—the French people who are put upon their trial—since both the one and the other have endured the tyranny of the infamous Robespierre. As Jean Debry told you shortly ago, they are aristocrats who submit or instigate all these propositions"— "And embezzlers," interrupted sundry voices. "I move," resumed Goujon, "that the discussion instantly cease." Several deputies opposed this summary dismissal of the subject. Billaud-Varennes started to the tribune, and vehemently insisted that the debate be continued.

"There is no doubt," he stated, "that if the facts alleged be true, we are great criminals, and our heads ought to be forfeited. But we defy Lecointre to prove them. Since the fall of the tyrant, we have been exposed to the attacks of the whole body of intriguers, and we declare that life has no value in our eyes if they are to prevail." Thus proceeding, Billaud averred that he and his colleagues had long meditated the 9th Thermidor; that if they had deferred it, circumstances had rendered the delay imperative; that they had been the first to denounce Robespierre and tear away the mask he had assumed; that if the death of Danton were charged on them as a crime, he would be the promptest to accuse himself; that Danton was the accomplice of Robespierre, the rallying point for all counter-revolutionists, and that, if he had lived, liberty must have perished. "For some time," exclaimed Billaud, "we have seen in agitation, intriguers, embezzlers"—— At this last word, Bourdon interrupted him by saying, "The word is uttered; it must be proved." "I undertake to prove it, for one," retorted Duhem. "We will prove it, for others," echoed several voices from the Mountain. This was an old reproach the Mountaineers were always ready to revive against the friends of Danton, now for the most part ranked as Thermidorians. Billaud, who, amidst the tumult and interruption, had still clung to the tribune, persisted, and finally moved for an investigation, in order that the guilty might be ascertained. Cambon succeeded him, and warned the convention to avoid the snare set to entrap it; he affirmed that the aristocrats were seeking to induce it to dishonour itself by disgracing certain of its members, and that, if the committees were culpable, it was equally so. "And all the nation with it," added Bourdon [de-l'Oise]. At this instant of commotion, Vadier suddenly appeared in the tribune with a pistol in his hand, vociferating that he would not survive the calumny, if he were not permitted to justify himself. Divers members rushed to seize and drag him from the tribune. The president Thuriot declared that he would adjourn the assembly if the tumult were not abated. Duhem and Amar insisted upon the continuation of the debate, as an act of justice to the inculpated parties incumbent on the convention. Thuriot, who was a zealous Thermidorian but nevertheless a staunch Mountaineer, had listened with pain to the agitation of such angry topics. He now addressed the assembly from the chair in these words: "On the one hand, the public interest is concerned that such a discussion as the present be immediately closed; on the other, the interest of those accused is concerned that it be proceeded with: let us reconcile both by passing to the order of the day on the proposition of Lecointre, and declaring that the assembly has heard that proposition with the deepest indignation." The convention adopted the suggestion of Thuriot with eager alacrity, and passed to the order of the day, branding, as proposed, the denunciation of Lecointre.

This discussion gave rise to anxious reflections on the part of all sincerely attached to their country. What advantage, they asked, could be gained by reverting to the past, winnowing the evil from the good, and deciding to whom really belonged the tyranny so recently subverted? Or how, in fact, assign the respective parts—of Robespierre and of the committees who had divided the power, of the convention which had supported them, of the nation, in short, which had suffered the convention, the committees, and Robespierre? And how, moreover, could this tyranny be truly judged? Did it proceed from criminal ambition, or from the energetic and irreflective action of men determined to attain their aim at all hazards, and reckless of the means they employed? How, in such multifarious action, could be discriminated the share of cruelty, ambition, mistaken zeal, sincere and fervid patriotism? To unravel so many mysteries, to penetrate the thoughts and hearts of so many men, partook of the impracticable. On the contrary, it behoved the predominant party to forget the past, receive from the hands of those now excluded from power the France they had saved, control anarchical tendencies, mitigate the ruthless severity of the laws, and remember that in political affairs evils may be redressed, never avenged.

Such were the conclusions of prudent moderate men. But the enemies of the revolution were overjoyed at Lecointre's rash proceeding; and seeing that the discussion had been abruptly closed, they proclaimed the convention under the influence of fear, and asserted that it dared not entertain questions so embarrassing and dangerous to itself. The Jacobins, likewise, and the Mountaineers, still the enthusiasts and fanatics of earlier times, and prepared in extremity to vindicate the reign of terror, were eager for the discussion and furious at its interruption. On the following day, accordingly, the 13th Fructidor, several Mountaineers protested, alleging that the president had yesterday taken the assembly by surprise when he closed the debate; that he had delivered his opinion without quitting the chair; that, as president, he was incompetent to express his sentiments; that the termination was an act of injustice; and that it was due to the members inculpated, the convention itself, and the revolution, to enter frankly upon a discussion which patriots assuredly had no reason to dread. In vain did the Thermidorians, Legendre, Tallien, and others, who were accused of having instigated Lecointre, but who, on the contrary, had sought to dissuade him from his project, maintain the expediency of allowing the subject to drop. The assembly, which had not altogether thrown off its habitual deference for the Mountain, agreed to revoke its decision of the eve and re-open the debate. Lecointre was called into the tribune, to read his twenty-six articles and substantiate them by authentic documents.

Lecointre had found it impossible to procure documentary evidence for this singular process, since he would have required proofs of what had occurred in the interior of the committees, to show how far the accused members had participated in the so-called tyranny of Robespierre. He could merely adduce, in corroboration of each article, public notoriety, speeches delivered at the Jacobin Club or in the convention, and a few original warrants of arrest, which of themselves proved nothing. At each new charge, the incensed Mountaineers vociferated, "The documents! the documents!" and protested against his proceeding unless he produced the written proofs. Lecointre, generally in the predicament of being unable to furnish them, appealed to the recollection of the assembly, and demanded whether it had not always considered Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, as in concert with Robespierre. But a reliance on this fact, the only material one citable under the circumstances, demonstrated the absurdity of his accusation. By analogous assumptions, it might have been maintained that the convention was the accomplice of the committee, and all France of the convention. The Mountaineers would not permit Lecointre to continue such remarks: they cried to him, "Thou art a calumniator!" and obliged him to pass to another count. No sooner had he read the succeeding one, than they again assailed him with shouts of "The documents! the documents!" and Lecointre not supplying them—"To the next!" they exclaimed, more boisterously than before. Amidst this continual tumult, Lecointre arrived at his last count, without having been able to authenticate any charge he had advanced. The only reason he could allege consisted in the averment that the accusation was political, and did not admit the usual mode of procedure; to which a ready answer might have been given, that it was improper to institute one of such a character. After a prolonged and stormy debate, the convention declared the charges of Lecointre false and calumnious, and thus assoilzied the old committees.

The result of this proceeding tended to re-invigorate the Mountain, and partially to revive in the convention its ancient dread of that redoubtable faction. Nevertheless, Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois tendered their resignation as members of the committee of public welfare. Barrère was ejected by the hazard of the ballot. Tallien also, on his part, voluntarily retired; and all four were replaced by Delmas, Merlin of Douay, Cochon, and Fourcroy. Thus, of the members of the famous committee of public welfare, Carnot, Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or], and Robert Lindet, alone remained. The committee of general safety likewise underwent the prescribed renewal of one-fourth its members. Elie-Lacoste, Vouland, Vadier, and Moyse-Bayle, had to withdraw. David, Jagot, and Lavicomterie, had been previously excluded by a decision of the assembly. These seven members were succeeded by Bourdon [de-l'Oise], Colombelle, Méaulle, Clauzel, Mathieu, Mon-Mayau, and Lesage-Senault.

The prevailing ferment was unexpectedly increased by an unfortunate and entirely fortuitous event. The powder-magazine of Grenelle ignited and exploded. The sudden and tremendous concussion threw Paris into the utmost consternation, and seemed to the affrighted population ominous of some new and dire conspiracy. The calamity was at once charged upon the aristocrats, and by the aristocrats upon the Jacobins. The convention again became the arena of fierce recrimination between the two parties, without leading to any definite result. Amidst the excitement of this first accident, another happened to inflame the discord. On the evening of the 23d Fructidor (9th September), Tallien was returning to his residence. A man, enveloped in a large cloak, fell upon him, exclaiming, "I have been awaiting thee!—thou shalt not escape me!" At the same moment he discharged a pistol at his person, which fractured his shoulder. The following day Paris was in a state of commotion. Moderate citizens lamented that all hope of repose seemed extinguished; that two parties, infuriated against each other, had apparently sworn to keep the republic in perpetual turmoil. On one side, the attempt on Tallien was attributed to the Jacobins; on the other, to the aristocrats. Many, again, ventured to intimate that Tallien, following the example of Grangeneuve previous to the 10th August, had purposely caused himself to be wounded, in order to upbraid the Jacobins with the crime, and to introduce an occasion for urging their dissolution. Legendre, Merlin [de Thionville], and other friends of Tallien, hurried to the tribune, and asserted with vehemence that the Jacobins were the instigators of the atrocity. Thus they argued: Tallien had not forsaken the cause of the revolution, yet miscreants alleged that he had passed over to the aristocrats and moderates. These latter, therefore, could not have formed the design of murdering him; the idea could have originated only with the furious men who accused him, that is to say, the Jacobins. Subsequently, Merlin specifically denounced their last meeting, and quoted an expression of Duhem—"The toads of the marsh are raising their heads; so much the better, they will be the more easy to chop off." Thus inveighing against the Jacobins, Merlin eventually moved, with his accustomed hardihood, the dissolution of that celebrated club, which had rendered, he admitted, most eminent services, and had powerfully contributed to prostrate the throne; but which, having no longer a throne to subvert, was now aiming at the overthrow of the convention itself. The conclusions of Merlin and his friends were not adopted; but, as usual, the whole subject was referred to the appropriate committees, with instructions to digest a report thereon. Remits of this description had been already made with regard to all the material questions at issue between the two parties. Reports had been ordered on the liberty of the press, on assignats, on the maximum, on the system of requisitions, on the impediments affecting commerce; in short, on all that had become the object of dissension and controversy. A desire was now manifested that all these reports should be comprised in one; and, accordingly, the committee of public welfare was charged to present a general report on the actual condition of the republic. The task was delegated to Robert Lindet, as the member most conversant with the state of affairs, since he had belonged to the old committees, and most to be relied on for impartiality, inasmuch as he had been exclusively occupied in serving his country by indefatigable attention to the arduous department of supplies and transports. The day fixed for receiving this report was the 4th Sans-culottide of the year 2 (20th September 1794).

In the interim, whilst all awaited with anxious impatience the presentation of this report as the precursor of most important decrees, Paris continued a prey to agitation. The young men confederated against the Jacobins were accustomed to assemble in the garden of the Palais-Royal. There they read aloud the newspapers and pamphlets, which appeared in great numbers, against the late revolutionary system, and were sold by the booksellers of the arcades. They frequently formed bands, and departed to disturb the meetings of the Jacobins. On the day of the 2d Sans-culottide, several of these bands were formed, composed of those zealous youths who, to distinguish themselves from the Jacobins, affected great propriety of attire, and wore high cravats, which procured them the cognomen of muscadins. A person in one of these groups chanced to exclaim, that, if any evil betided the rallying cry must be "the convention," and that the Jacobins were intriguers and miscreants. A Jacobin came forward to answer him. Thereupon a tumult arose; on one side was vociferated, "The convention for ever! Down with the Jacobins! Down with Robespierre's tail!" On the other, "Down with the aristocrats and the muscadins! The convention and the Jacobins for ever!" The tumult speedily grew into a conflict. The Jacobin who had attempted to speak, and the few bystanders disposed to abet him, were maltreated. The guard hastened to the spot, dispersed the crowd already beginning to accumulate, and prevented a general engagement.

At length, on the second day thereafter, being the one fixed for receiving the joint and comprehensive report of the three committees of public welfare, general safety, and legislation, Robert Lindet appeared in the tribune. The picture he drew of the state of France was sufficiently gloomy. After tracing the course of successive factions, and the progress of Robespierre's power to its decline and fall, he exhibited two parties as existing, the one composed of ardent patriots, fearful for the revolution and for themselves, the other of disconsolate families, whose near kinsmen had been immolated or were still groaning in fetters. "Restless men conceive," said Lindet, "that the government gives symptoms of lacking energy; and they avail themselves of all possible expedients to propagate their opinion and their apprehensions. They send deputations and addresses to the convention. These apprehensions are chimerical: in your hands the government will preserve all its force. And can patriots or public functionaries fear that their services will be effaced from recollection? How great the courage they needed to accept and perform their dangerous functions! But now France recalls them to their occupations and professions, from which they have been too long estranged. They know that their functions were temporary, and that power too long continued in the same hands becomes a subject of uneasiness; they ought to have no dread that France will abandon them to resentment and vengeance."

Then adverting to the position of the other party, composed of those who had suffered, Lindet proceeded in these words: "Restore freedom to those whom animosities, passions, the error of public functionaries, and the fury of the last conspirators, have caused to be thrown multitudinously into jails; restore it to the artisans, the traders, and the relatives of the young heroes who are defending the country. The arts have been persecuted; and yet it is from them you have learned to forge the thunderbolt; it is through their instrumentality the invention of Mongolfier has served to ascertain the movements of armies;* it is by them metals are purified and prepared, leather tanned, dressed, and fashioned for use within the week. Protect them, succour them. Many useful men still languish in dungeons."

The reporter subsequently drew a sketch of the agricultural and commercial condition of France. He showed the calamities resulting from the over issues of assignats, from the maximum, the system of requisitions, and the interruption of external intercourse. "Industry," he said, "has lost much of its activity, as well because fifteen hundred thousand men have been transferred to the frontiers, and multitudes, besides, have been engaged in civil strifes, as because the minds of men, distracted by political passions, have been diverted from their habitual occupations. There are many new tracts drained or cleared, but infinitely more neglected. The corn remains unthreshed, the wool uncarded; the cultivators neither steep their hemp nor peel their flax. Let us endeavour to repair evils so numerous and various; let us restore tranquillity to the great maritime and manufacturing cities. Let the demolitions at Lyons be terminated. With peace, prudence, and oblivion, the citizens of Nantes, Bordeaux, Marseilles, and Lyons, will resume their callings. Let us revoke the laws so destructive of commerce, give to commodities their natural and beneficial circulation, and encourage exportation, in order that what we want may be brought us in return. Let the cities and departments cease to exclaim against the government, which, they allege, has exhausted their resources, failed to observe just proportions in its demands, and caused the burden of requisitions to weigh unequally. Let those who thus complain but cast their eyes on the accounts, the declarations, and the addresses, of their fellow-citizens in other districts! They will there behold the same complaints, the same remonstrances, the same energy, inspired by the sense of identical sufferings. Let us recall tranquillity of mind and industry to the country; the artisans to their workshops, the husbandmen to their fields. Above all, let us strive to cultivate union and confidence amongst ourselves. Let us cease to reproach each other with our misfortunes and errors. Have we ever been, have we had it in our power to be, what we would always wish in fact to be? We have all been hurled into the same career: some have combated with courage and calm reflection; others have rushed headlong, in their exuberant ardour, against all the obstacles they desired to surmount and overthrow. Who will interrogate us, and demand an account of those movements it was impossible to foresee and control? The revolution is accomplished: it is the work of all. What generals, what soldiers have never overstepped the limits of rigid necessity, or have been able to pause exactly where cold and unimpassioned reason would have warned them to stop? Were we not in a state of war with countless and redoubtable adversaries? Have not reverses inflamed our courage, kindled our wrath? What has happened to us that happens not to all men thrown an incalculable space from the ordinary course of human existence?"

This report, so appropriate, impartial, and complete, was received with plaudits. All approved the sentiments it embodied, and it was unfortunate all could not cordially embrace them. Lindet eventually proposed a series of decrees, which commanded the same favourable reception as his report, and were forthwith adopted.

By the first decree, the committee of general safety and the representatives on missions were directed to investigate the reclamations of traders, agriculturists, artists, and parents of citizens absent with the armies, who were themselves or had relatives in prison. By the second, the municipalities and committees of sections were bound to assign their reasons when they refused to grant certificates of civism. These were intended as concessions to those who incessantly complained of the system of terror, and were haunted with the dread of its revival. A third decree ordained the preparation of moral institutes, designed to inculcate the value of industry and respect for the laws, and to instruct the citizens in the principal circumstances of the revolution, which were appointed to be read to the people on the decadal festivals. A fourth decree established a plan of normal schools, for training young teachers, and thus disseminating education and knowledge throughout France.

These decrees were accompanied by others, enjoining the committees of finance and commerce to consider with due promptitude, 1st, The advantages of allowing a free exportation of articles of luxury, on condition of their value being returned to France in miscellaneous merchandise.

2d, The advantages or disadvantages of allowing a free exportation of the surplus of articles of primary necessity, on condition of a similar return, and the observance of certain formalities.

3d, The most advisable means of putting into circulation the commodities seized on the way to cities in rebellion and retained under seal.

And, 4th, The appeals of merchants, who were bound, by virtue of the law of sequestration, to deposit in the district treasuries the sums they stood indebted to foreigners with whom France was at war.

Hence, we perceive, these decrees afforded securities to those who exclaimed against persecution, and accelerated the adoption of measures calculated to ameliorate the depressed state of commerce. The Jacobin party alone was benefited by no decree; but it in truth needed none. It had undergone neither molestation nor imprisonment; of power alone it had been deprived; and no reparation, therefore, was exigible in its behalf. To reassure it as to the future course of the government was all that could be attempted, and the report presented by Lindet was conceived and expressed in such spirit. Consequently, the effect of that report, and of the decrees accompanying it, was in the highest degree favourable on all parties.

A partial lull ensued. On the morrow, the last day and 5th Sans-culottide of the year 2 (21st September 1794), was performed the long-decreed ceremony of placing Marat in the Pantheon and ejecting Mirabeau therefrom. This proceeding was now no longer in harmony with the spirit and feelings of the moment. Marat was no longer the saint, nor Mirabeau the culprit, in public estimation, sufficient to warrant such honour to the sanguinary apostle of terror, or such opprobrium to the mightiest orator of the revolution. But, lest the Mountain might take umbrage, and the symptoms of reaction become too rapid and prominent, the previous ordinance was not disturbed. On the appointed day, the remains of Marat were borne in pomp to the Pantheon, and those of Mirabeau ignominiously cast out by a lateral postern.

Thus, pre-eminence in power, perilously wrested from the Jacobins and Mountaineers, was now possessed by the partisans of Danton and Camille-Desmoulins—by the much vilified indulgents, in short, who had become known as Thermidorians. These latter, however, whilst intent on repairing the evils produced by the revolution, whilst liberating the suspected, and striving to confer freedom and security on commerce, still evinced a prudent deference towards the Mountain they had superseded, and even consented to enshrine Marat in the temple whence they repudiated Mirabeau.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

RESUMPTION OF MILITARY OPERATIONS.—SURRENDER OF CONDE, VALENCIENNES, &C.—DEJECTION OF THE ALLIES.—PASSAGE OF THE MEUSE.—OCCUPATION OF THE RHINE ALONG ITS WHOLE COURSE.—SITUATION OF THE ARMIES ON THE ALPS AND PYRENEES.—THE SUCCESS OF THE FRENCH ON ALL POINTS.—LA VENDEE AND BRITTANY; WAR OF THE CHOUANS.—ROYALIST INTRIGUES IN FRANCE.

The activity of military operations had somewhat abated toward the middle of the season. The two grand armies of the North and of the Sambre and Meuse, after entering Brussels in Thermidor (July), and subsequently marching, the one on Antwerp, the other on the Meuse, had sunk into a long repose, awaiting the reduction of Landrecies, Le Quesnoy, Valenciennes, and Condé, fortresses lost during the preceding campaign. On the Rhine, General Michaud was occupied in recomposing his army, to retrieve the check of Kayserlautern, and expecting a reinforcement of 15,000 men drawn from La Vendée. The armies of the Alps and of Italy, now in possession of the great chain, were encamped on the heights of the Alps, awaiting the approval of a plan of invasion, generally attributed to the young officer who had decided the capture of Toulon and the lines of Saorgio. On the Eastern Pyrenees, Dugommier, after his previous success at Boulon, had been delayed in taking Collioure, and was now blockading Bellegarde. The army of the Western Pyrenees was still organising. This prolonged inertness in the midst of the campaign, which must be imputed to the critical events occurring in the interior, and to defective combinations, might have frustrated the success of the French, if their enemies had known how to turn time to account. But so great was the disorder and despondency prevailing amongst the allies, that they sought no advantage from the fault, and it merely tended to retard for an interval the extraordinary progress of the French arms.

Nothing could be worse judged than the inaction of the French in Belgium, encamped around Antwerp and on the banks of the Meuse. Their most certain plan, for accelerating the surrender of the four fortresses, consisted in always increasing the distance between them and the great armies, which could alone afford them succour. If due advantage had been taken of the confusion into which the defeat of Fleurus and the retreat consequent thereon had thrown the allies, they might, with comparative ease, have speedily reached the margin of the Rhine. Unfortunately, the grand art of profiting by victory was yet unknown—an art most rare in military commanders; for it infers that success is not the mere accident of a fortunate attack, but the foreseen result of profound and vast combinations. In order to hasten the reduction of the four strongholds, the convention had passed a ruthless decree, similar in spirit to all those that marked the era from Prairial to Thermidor. Premising that the allies held four French possessions, and that every means are justifiable to expel an enemy from invaded territory, it had decreed that if, twenty-four hours after being summoned, the garrisons failed to surrender, they should be put to the sword. The garrison of Landrecies alone yielded before this terrible menace. The commandant of Condé returned the dignified answer, "that one nation had no right to ordain the dishonour of another." Le Quesnoy and Valenciennes also manifested a determined spirit of resistance. The committee, sensible of the injustice of such a decree, contrived to avoid its enforcement by a subtle device, without subjecting the convention to the necessity of repealing it. The committee drew the presumption that the decree had not been formally notified to the commandants of the three places, and therefore was to them unknown. Before intimating it in express terms, it directed General Schérer to carry on the works with sufficient activity to render the summons imposing, and to justify a capitulation on the part of the garrisons. In consequence, Valenciennes was ceded on the 12th Fructidor (29th August); Condé and Valenciennes were delivered on the following days. Those fortresses, therefore, which had cost the allies such efforts to reduce during the preceding campaign, were recovered by the French with trifling exertion; and the French territory in Flanders no longer contained a single point in hostile occupation. On the contrary, the French were masters of all Belgium from Antwerp to the Meuse.

Moreau had just taken Sluys and returned into line; Schérer had detached Osten's brigade to Pichegru, and rejoined Jourdan with his own division. By these junctions, the army of the North, under Pichegru, was raised to upwards of 70,000 men under arms, and that of the Meuse, under Jourdan, to 116,000. The government, exhausted by the efforts it had made to expedite the equipment of these armies, attended but imperfectly to their maintenance, and it was found necessary to make amends by moderate requisitions and the exercise of much military virtue. The soldiers accustomed themselves to dispense with the most necessary articles; without tents to encamp beneath, they contentedly bivouacked under the foliage of trees or the open canopy of heaven. The officers, without appointments, or paid in assignats, lived as the common soldiers, subsisted on the same coarse food, and marched on foot like them, with knapsacks on their backs. Republican enthusiasm and the confidence of victory supported those armies in their hardships, composed as they were of the most docile and heroic troops ever possessed by France.

The allies were in a state of lamentable disorder. The Dutch, ill supported by their confederates the English, and doubtful of their good faith, were in the utmost consternation. They formed a cordon before their strongholds, with the view of gaining time to put them in a state of defence, which ought to have been effected long before. The Duke of York, equally incompetent and presumptuous, knew not how to make use of his English forces, and took no decisive part. He retired towards the Lower Meuse and the Rhine, stretching his wings alternately towards the Dutch and towards the imperialists. But, by uniting with the Dutch, he might have disposed of 50,000 men, and attempted, on the flanks of either of the two armies of the North and of the Meuse, one of those enterprising movements which General Clairfayt, in the following year, and the Archduke Charles, in 1796, executed with such effect and credit, and whereof a great commander has since given so many memorable examples. The Austrians, intrenched along the Meuse, from the mouth of the Roer to that of the Ourthe, were discouraged by their reverses and lacked supplies. The Prince of Cobourg, whose incapacity had been strikingly exemplified in the last campaign, had yielded the command to Clairfayt, the most worthy to hold it amongst all the Austrian generals. It was not yet too late to have joined the Duke of York, and operated en masse against one of the two French armies; but all thought was centred on guarding the Meuse. The cabinet of Saint-James, alarmed at the course of events, had sent envoy after envoy to rekindle the zeal of Prussia, to claim on its part the execution of the treaty of the Hague, and to engage Austria, by promises of aid, to defend with vigour the line still occupied by its troops. A congress of English, Dutch, and Austrian ministers and generals was held at Maestricht, and a firm resolution taken to dispute the country beyond the Meuse.

The French armies at length shook off their lethargy in the middle of Fructidor (beginning of September). Pichegru advanced from Antwerp towards the mouths of the rivers. The Dutch thereupon committed the mistake of separating from the English. To the number of 20,000 men, they took up positions parallel with Bergen-op-Zoom, Breda, and Gertruydenberg, resting on the sea, and so injudiciously ranged, that they were incapable of acting in defence of the places they wished to cover. The Duke of York, with his British and Hanoverians, retreated on Bois-le-Duc, keeping up a communication with the Dutch by a chain of posts, which the French army could force the moment it appeared. At Boxtel, on the edge of the Dommel, Pichegru came up with the Duke of York's rearguard, surrounded two battalions, and compelled them to lay down their arms. The following day, he encountered General Abercromby on the banks of the Aa, again took several prisoners, and continued to push the Duke of York, who hastily repassed the Meuse at Grave, under protection of the guns of that fastness. In this march Pichegru had taken 1500 prisoners. He reached the banks of the Meuse on the anniversary of the 2d Sans-culottide (18th September).

At the same time, Jourdan advanced on his side, and prepared to cross the Meuse. The Meuse has two main tributaries—the Ourthe, which joins it towards Liege, and the Roer, which flows into it towards Ruremonde. These two confluents form two lines, dividing the country between the Meuse and the Rhine, which must be successively carried in order to reach the Rhine. The French, masters of Liege, cleared the Meuse, and immediately took up a position in front of the Ourthe; they skirted the Meuse from Liege to Maestricht, and the Ourthe from Liege to Comblaine-au-Pont, thus forming an angle whereof Liege was the apex. Clairfayt had drawn up his left wing behind the Ourthe, on the heights of Sprimont. These heights are flanked on one side by the Ourthe, and on the other by the Ayvaille, which falls into the Ourthe. General Latour commanded the Austrians on this point. Jourdan ordered Schérer to attack the position of Sprimont on the side defended by the Ayvaille, whilst General Bonnet was to assail it by passing the Ourthe. On the anniversary of the 2d Sans-culottide (18th September), Schérer divided his troops into three columns, commanded by Generals Marceau, Mayer, and Hacquin, and moved on the line of the Ayvaille, which flows in a deep bed between two steep banks. The generals themselves gave the example, plunged into the water, and led their soldiers to the opposite shore, despite the play of a formidable artillery. Latour had remained immoveable on the heights of Sprimont, intending to fall on the French columns when they had passed the stream. But the moment these had scaled the precipitous barrier, they rushed on his position, without giving him time to anticipate the aggression. They attacked him with the utmost energy; and at the same time General Hacquin deployed on his left flank, and General Bonnet, having passed the Ourthe, advanced on his rear. Latour was thereupon constrained to decamp, and fall back on the imperial army.

This enterprise, well designed and admirably executed, reflected equal credit on the commander-in-chief and the army. Thirty-six pieces of ordnance and one hundred ammunition waggons fell into the hands of the French; and the Austrians lost 1500 men, killed and wounded. This reverse determined Clairfayt to quit the line of the Ourthe, being apprehensive, now that his left was defeated, lest his retreat might be cut off from Cologne. Accordingly, he abandoned the banks of the Meuse and the Ourthe, and retired upon Aix-la-Chapelle

The barrier of the Roer now alone remained to the Austrians. They occupied that river from Dueren and Juliers to its junction with the Meuse, that is to say, to Ruremonde. They had yielded all the course of the Meuse extending from the Ourthe to the Roer, between Liege and Ruremonde; they only occupied the space from Ruremonde to Grave, the point by which they held communication with the Duke of York.

It behoved the imperialists to defend vigorously the line of the Roer, to prevent the loss of the left bank of the Rhine. Clairfayt concentrated all his forces on its banks, between Dueren, Juliers, and Linnich. Some time previously he had ordered the erection of considerable works to strengthen the line, and had stationed advanced corps in front of the Roer, on the plateau* of Aldenhoven, fortified with intrenchments. He himself encamped behind the steep declivities of the river, with the bulk of his army and a numerous artillery.

On the 10th Vendémiaire year 3 (1st October 1794), Jourdan came in presence of the enemy with all his forces. He ordered General Schérer, commanding the right wing, to move on Dueren, passing the Roer at every fordable point; General Hatry to cross towards the centre of the position, at Altorp; Championnet and Morlot, with their divisions, supported by cavalry, to carry the plateau of Aldenhoven rising in advance of the Roer, then to sweep the plain, traverse the stream, and mask Juliers, to prevent the Austrians debouching from it; General Lefebvre to seize upon Linnich and cross by all the fords abounding in its vicinity; and, lastly, Kléber, who was stationed towards the mouth of the river, to ascend it as far as Ratem, and pass it at that weakly defended point, so as to cover the battle on the side towards Ruremonde.

The next day, the 11th Vendémiaire, the French commenced their movement along the whole line. One hundred thousand young republicans marched simultaneously, with an order and precision worthy of veteran troops. They had not hitherto appeared in such numbers upon the same field of battle. They advanced resolutely towards the Roer, the prize to be contested. They were unfortunately a considerable distance from that river, and failed to reach it until nearly mid-day. The general-in-chief, in the judgment of military men, had committed but one fault, which consisted in having taken a point of departure too remote from the point of attack, and not having devoted a day to approaching nearer the hostile line. General Schérer, commanding the right, moved his brigades on different points of the Roer, and directed General Hacquin to proceed to the ford of Winden, far up the river, and there pass, in order to turn the left flank of the enemy. It was eleven o'clock when he issued this order. Hacquin occupied a long interval in traversing the circuit assigned him. Schérer paused until Hacquin should reach the prescribed point, ere throwing his divisions into the Roer, and thus allowed Clairfayt time to prepare all his means of resistance along the heights of the opposite bank. At three in the afternoon Schérer determined to wait no longer, and forthwith put his troops in motion. Marceau plunged into the water with his division, and crossed at the ford of Mirveiller; Lorges did the same, advanced on Dueren, and drove out the enemy after a sanguinary conflict. The Austrians evacuated Dueren but for a moment: retiring to the rear, they speedily returned in augmented force. Marceau immediately threw himself into Dueren, to support the brigade of Lorges. Mayer, who had passed the Roer a little above, at Niedereau, and sustained a murderous fire of artillery, likewise fell back on Dueren. On that point, therefore, all efforts were now concentrated. The enemy, who had hitherto acted only with his vanguards, was drawn up in the background, on heights planted with sixty pieces of ordnance. He now brought these into play, and mowed down the French with a continuous shower of grape-shot and balls. The young soldiers, encouraged by their generals, stood firm to their position. Unfortunately, Hacquin had not yet made his appearance on the left flank of the enemy, a manœuvre on which the success of the battle mainly depended.

Meanwhile the battle was raging in the centre, on the advanced plateau of Aldenhoven. The French had scaled it at the point of the bayonet. Their cavalry had then deployed, and made and received several charges. The Austrians, perceiving the Roer carried above and below Aldenhoven, ultimately abandoned the plateau, and fell back on Juliers beyond the river. Championnet, who pursued them even to the glacis, opened a fire on the fortress, and a vigorous cannonade was maintained on both sides. At Linnich, Lefebvre had repulsed the Austrians and gained the Roer; but, having found the bridge burnt, he was compelled to lose time in restoring it. At Ratem, Kléber had encountered masked batteries, and was engaged in answering them by all his disposable artillery.

The decisive conflict, therefore, lay on the right at Dueren, where Marceau, Lorges, and Mayer were concentrated, awaiting the movement of Hacquin. Jourdan had ordered Hatry to move on Dueren, instead of effecting the passage at Altorp; but the distance was too great for that column to become available on the decisive point. At length, at five in the afternoon, Hacquin appeared on the left flank of Latour. Thereupon the Austrians, seeing themselves threatened on the left by Hacquin and confronted by Lorges, Marceau, and Mayer, determined to retreat, and drew in their left wing, the same [illegible] fought at Sprimont. On their extreme ri[illegible] menaced them with a bold movement. The bridge he had attempted to throw across proving too short, his soldiers demanded leave to breast the stream. Kléber, to encourage and cover their hazardous undertaking, concentred all his artillery, and poured tremendous volleys on the enemy occupying the opposite bank. From that point, likewise, the imperialists were then obliged to retire, and in a short while they withdrew from all the others. Thus they abandoned the Roer, leaving 800 prisoners, and 3000 men on the field of battle.

On the following day, the French found Juliers evacuated, and were enabled to pass the Roer on all points. Such was the important action which secured them the definitive conquest of the left bank of the Rhine—one of those achievements which have especially recommended General Jourdan to the gratitude of his country and the applause of military men. Nevertheless, critics have reproached him with not taking a point of departure nearer the point of attack, and not directing the bulk of his army on Mirveiller and Dueren.

Clairfayt took the high road to Cologne. Jourdan followed him, and occupied that city on the 15th Vendémiaire (6th October). On the 29th (20th October) he entered Bonn. Kléber proceeded, in conjunction with Marescot, to beleaguer Maestricht.

Whilst Jourdan thus brilliantly executed his task, and took possession of the important line of the Rhine, Pichegru was busied in preparing to pass the Meuse, with the view of subsequently advancing on the Wahl, the principal branch of the Rhine towards its embouchure. As we have shortly ago narrated, the Duke of York had traversed the Meuse at Grave, leaving Bois-le-Duc to its own resources. Before attempting the passage of the Meuse, it was necessary for Pichegru to possess himself of Bois-le-Duc; but a siege at that advanced season, and with insufficient materiel for the purpose, was attended with difficulty and hazard. However, the daring enterprise of the French, and the despondency of their antagonists, rendered nothing impossible. The fort of Crevecœur, near the Meuse, being suddenly menaced by a battery bearing on a point it had been deemed impracticable to attain, surrendered. The munitions found therein became available in pressing the siege of Bois-le-Duc. Five consecutive attacks astounded the governor, who yielded the place on the 19th Vendémiaire (10th October). This unhoped-for acquisition secured to the French a solid basis and considerable munitions, to aid their further operations beyond the Meuse to the banks of the Wahl.

Moreau, who formed the right, had advanced to Venloo, since the victories of the Ourthe and the Roer. The Duke of York, alarmed at that movement, had withdrawn all his troops beyond the Wahl, and abandoned the ground intervening between the Meuse and the Wahl or Rhine. Subsequently, however, reflecting that Grave (on the Meuse) would be left without communications or support, he repassed the Wahl, and undertook to defend the space comprised between the two streams. The ground, as always happens near the mouths of large rivers, was lower than the bed of the water, presenting vast meadow-lands intersected by dykes and canals, and inundated in sundry places. General Hammerstein, stationed intermediately between the Meuse and the Wahl, had added to the difficulty of the approach by occupying the roads, planting the dykes with artillery, and throwing bridges over the canals, which his soldiers were to destroy as they retired. The Duke of York, whose vanguard he formed, remained in the rear, on the banks of the Wahl, in the camp of Nimeguen.

In the course of the 27th and 28th Vendémiaire (18th and 19th October), Pichegru passed two of his divisions across the Meuse upon a bridge of boats. The English, intrenched under the cannon of Nimeguen, and Hammerstein's vanguard, disposed along the canals and dykes, were much too distant materially to impede the operation. The rest of the army reached the opposite shore under protection of those two divisions. On the 28th, Pichegru determined upon an attack of all the works covering the intermediate space between the Meuse and the Wahl. He threw four columns, composing a mass superior to the enemy, into those inundated and intersected meadows. The French braved the fire of the artillery with admirable fortitude, and plunged into the canals, having the water to their necks, through which they steadily advanced, whilst the riflemen, distributed along the elevations of the ground, fired over their heads. The enemy retrograded in dismay, thinking only of saving his artillery. He took refuge in the camp of Nimeguen, on the banks of the Wahl, whither the French speedily followed, to taunt him with daily insults.

Thus, towards Holland as towards Luxumbourg, the French had at length succeeded in attaining that formidable barrier of the Rhine, which nature seems to have assigned as a boundary to their country, and which they have always felt ambitious to render one of its frontiers. Pichegru, it is true, checked by Nimeguen, was not yet master of the course of the Wahl; and, if he entertained any thoughts of conquering Holland, he had before his eyes numerous streams of water, divers fortified places, extensive inundations, and an inclement season; but, nevertheless, he touched upon the long-desired point, and with one more act of intrepidity, he might force his way into Nimeguen or the Isle of Bommel, and firmly establish himself on the Wahl. Moreau, styled the general of sieges, had just carried Venloo by a display of extraordinary gallantry. Jourdan was triumphantly consolidated on the banks of the Rhine. To complete the occupation of that majestic stream, the French armies had also reached its course from the Moselle and Alsace.

Since the check at Kayserlautern, the armies of the Moselle and of the Upper Rhine, commanded by Michaud, had been awaiting reinforcements in detachments drawn from the Alps and La Vendée. At length, on the 14th Messidor (2d July), an attack was adventured along the whole line, from the Moselle to the Rhine, upon both slopes of the Vosges. This attack, too scattered and divided, was repulsed. A second attempt, conducted upon better principles, was made on the 25th Messidor (13th July). The principal effort was directed upon the centre of the Vosges, with the design of conquering the defiles; and it induced, as in other places, the general retreat of the allied armies beyond Frankenthal. The committee then ordered a diversion on Trèves, which was occupied as a just chastisement on the elector. By this movement, a large division found itself exposed between the imperial armies on the Lower Rhine and the Prussian army on the Vosges, without the latter heeding the opportunity to inflict a grievous injury on their opponents. The Prussians, however, eventually taking advantage of the diminution of the French forces towards Kayserlautern, made a sudden onslaught, and repelled them beyond that town. At this moment intelligence arrived of Jourdan's victory on the Roer, and of Clairfayt's passage of the Rhine at Cologne. The allies no longer ventured to remain in the Vosges; they forthwith retrograded, abandoning the whole Palatinate to the French, and throwing a strong garrison into Mayence. Their sole possessions on the left bank, consequently, were limited to the two towns of Luxumbourg and Mayence. The committee issued immediate orders for their investment. Kléber was called from Belgium to Mayence, in order to direct the siege of that place, which he had so gallantly contributed to defend in 1793, and where he had first gained his renown. Thus the tide of victory flowed on all points, and the barrier of the Rhine fell throughout into possession of the French.

In the Alps, the state of inactivity had been continued, and the great chain confirmed definitively to the French. The plan of invasion ably devised by General Bonaparte, and communicated to the committee by Robespierre the younger, who was commissioned to the army of Italy, had been originally adopted. It consisted in uniting the two armies of the Alps and of Italy in the valley of Sturia, and thus overrunning Piedmont. The orders to march were already given, when the catastrophe of the 9th Thermidor happened: the execution was then suspended. The commandants of places who had been obliged to detach part of their garrisons, the representatives on missions, the municipalities, and all the partisans of reaction, alleged that the plan was designed to destroy the army by entangling it in Piedmont, re-open Toulon to the English, and aid the sinister views of Robespierre. Jean-Bon-Saint-André especially, who had been dispatched to Toulon to reorganise the navy, and who revolved peculiar schemes of action in the Mediterranean, appeared as one of the bitterest opponents of the plan. Bonaparte was even accused of being an accomplice of the Robespierres, an insinuation founded on the confidence his talents and views had inspired in the youngest of the two brothers. The army consequently retrograded in disorder upon the great chain, where it resumed its positions. The campaign closed, however, with a brilliant affair. The Austrians, in concert with the English, resolved to make an attempt on Savona, in order to intercept the communication with Genoa, which by its neutrality rendered important services with regard to supplies. General Colloredo, accordingly, advanced with a body of eight to ten thousand men; but using little celerity in his march, he gave the French time to prepare for him. Surprised amidst the mountains by the French troops, whose movements General Bonaparte directed, he lost 800 men and retired ingloriously, charging the English with his disaster, which they retorted on him. The communication with Genoa was maintained, and the army consolidated in all its positions.

On the Pyrenees the French had recommenced a successful career. Dugommier had been long engaged on the siege of Bellegarde, being anxious to reduce that place before descending into Catalonia. La Union had endeavoured, by a general attack on the French line, to succour the besieged; but, repulsed at all points, he had moved off in disorder; whereupon the garrison, effectually discouraged by this rout of the Spanish army, surrendered on the 6th Vendémiaire (27th September). Dugommier, now secure in his rear, prepared to advance into Catalonia. On the Western Pyrenees, the French, at length emerging from their inertness, had overrun the valley of Bastan, carried the strongholds of Fontarabia and Saint-Sebastian, and, under the genial climate of that region, made dispositions, as on the Eastern Pyrenees, to push their successes notwithstanding the approach of winter.

In La Vendée the war continued: not an active or dangerous, but a slow and devastating war. Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette, had of late divided the command in the insurgent districts. Since the death of Larochejacquelein, Stofflet had succeeded him in Anjou and Upper Poitou. Sapinaud had long preserved the small circuit of the centre. Charette, renowned for his campaign during the previous winter, when, with forces almost destroyed, he had invariably contrived to baffle the pursuit of the republicans, commanded in Lower Vendée, but aspired to the commandership-in-chief. A meeting had been held at Jallais, where a convention was adopted under the influence of the Abbé Bernier, incumbent of Saint-Laud, the monitor and friend of Stofflet, and governing the country in his name. This abbé was equally ambitious with Charette, and desired such a combination as would enable him to exercise over all the chiefs the sway he already held over Stofflet. It was agreed to form a superior council, [illegible] orders every thing should be conducted for the future. Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette, mutually confirmed their several commands in Anjou, the centre, and Lower Vendée. M. de Marigny, who had survived the great Vendéan expedition against Granville, having infringed an order issued by the newly appointed council, was arrested and cruelly shot by Stofflet on a report of Charette. This act of rigour, which produced a mournful impression on all the royalists, has been generally attributed to jealousy.

The war, in the absence of any possible result, had become little more than one of plunder and extermination. The republicans had established fourteen intrenched camps around the insurgent country, whence issued devastating columns, which, under the superior command of General Turreau, executed the terrible decree of the convention. They burnt the woods, hedges, and heaths, frequently even the villages, carried off the crops and cattle, and, alleging the decree which enjoined every inhabitant not engaged in the revolt to withdraw twenty leagues from the insurgent districts, treated as enemies all whom they met. The Vendéans, on the other hand, obliged to find means of existence, still continued to cultivate their fields amidst these horrible scenes, and revenged the aggressions in a manner calculated to render the warfare perpetual. At a signal from their chiefs, they formed sudden assemblages, fell upon the camps from the rear, and swept all before them; or, allowing the columns to penetrate, they assailed them when entangled in the country, and if they succeeded in breaking their ranks, they massacred them to the last man. On such occasions they seized upon the arms and munitions with extraordinary avidity; and, without having at all weakened an enemy so far superior to themselves, indulged in congratulations upon obtaining the means of continuing this atrocious warfare.

Such was the state of things on the left bank of the Loire. On the right bank, in that part of Brittany comprised between the Loire and the Vilaine, a new insurrectionary assemblage had been formed, composed in a great measure of the remnants of the Vendéan column dispersed at Savenay, and of the peasants dwelling on those plains. M. de Scépeaux was the leader of this band; it contained a force nearly equal to that of M. de Sapineau, and served to connect La Vendée with Brittany.

Brittany had become the theatre of a war altogether different from that of La Vendée, and not less deplorable. The Chouans, of whom we have already spoken, were smugglers whom the abolition of provincial duties had left without employment, young men who had contrived to elude the conscription, and a few Vendéans, escaped, like those under M. de Scépeaux, from the disaster of Savenay. They secreted themselves as banditti among the rocks and vast woods of Brittany, particularly in the great forest of Pertre. They did not form, as the Vendéans, numerous bodies, capable of keeping the field; they roamed in bands of thirty and fifty, stopping couriers and public conveyances, and assassinating justices of the peace, mayors, all republican functionaries, in fact, and especially the purchasers of national domains. As to those who were not owners, but simply the cultivators of any such domains, they visited their farmsteads and levied the amount of rent payable. They generally adopted the plan of destroying bridges, breaking up roads, and disabling wains, in order to prevent the transport of provisions into the towns. They issued terrible menaces against those who carried their produce to market, and made good their threats by pillaging and burning their property. Incapable of occupying the country in a military point of view, their aim manifestly was to throw it into a state of anarchy, by scaring the citizens from accepting any functions under the republic, by avenging the acquisition of national domains, and by famishing the towns. Less united and numerous than the Vendéans, they were even more formidable, and truly merited the appellation of brigands.

They had a secret leader, whose name has already occurred in our annals, M. de Puisaye, formerly a member of the Constituent Assembly. After the 10th August he had retired into Normandy, joined in the federalist insurrection, and, after the defeat at Vernon, concealed himself in Brittany, where he laboured to collect the remains of the conspiracy of La Rouarie. With great intelligence and a rare capacity for uniting the elements of a party, he combined extreme activity of mind and body, and boundless ambition. Struck with the peninsular position of Brittany, the vast extent of its coasts, the peculiar nature of its surface, covered by forests, mountains, and impenetrable retreats, and, above all, with the ignorance of its inhabitants, speaking a strange language, whereby they were isolated from communication with the other inhabitants of France, entirely subject to the influence of priests, and three or four times more numerous than the Vendéans, Puisaye deemed it possible to organise an insurrection in Brittany much more formidable than that under the guidance of such chiefs as Cathelineau, D'Elbée, Bonchamps, and Lescure. The vicinity of England, and the happy juxtaposition of the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, had suggested to him, moreover, the idea of inducing the cabinet of London to concur in his projects. He was consequently desirous that the energy of the country should not be wasted in useless ruffianism, but strove to bring it under regulation, and mould it in furtherance of his own extended views. Aided by the priests, he had caused all the men capable of bearing arms to be enrolled on registers opened in the various parishes. Each parish was to furnish a company, and each canton a division; the united divisions were to form four principal divisions, those of Morbihan, Finisterre, Côtes-du-Nord, and Ille-et-Vilaine, all dependent on a central committee representing the supreme authority of the country. Puisaye presided over the central committee in the character of generalissimo; and, by means of these ramifications, he ensured the distribution of his orders over the whole district. Until entering upon the execution of his ultimate designs, he recommended as few acts of hostility to be committed as possible, in order to avoid drawing too many troops into Brittany; he enjoined his partisans to content themselves with collecting munitions and intercepting the conveyance of provisions to the towns. Nevertheless, the Chouans, little fitted for the kind of general war he meditated, continued to indulge in individual lawlessness, which they found more profitable and more to their taste. Puisaye used indefatigable exertions to complete his arrangements, and proposed, so soon as he had achieved the organisation of his party, to visit London for the purpose of opening a negotiation with the English cabinet and the French princes.

As already mentioned in the account of the preceding war, the Vendéans had held no intercourse with foreign powers. M. de Tinténiac had been, however, sent amongst them, to ascertain their character, principles, and numbers, and to offer them arms and aid if they could possess themselves of a port on the coast. This was the inducement that led them to Granville, an expedition which ended in the disastrous issue we have recorded. Lord Moira's squadron, after a fruitless cruise off the coasts, had conveyed to Holland the succours intended for La Vendée. Puisaye hoped to prevail on the English cabinet to dispatch a second flotilla, and to form arrangements with the French princes, who had hitherto neither testified gratitude nor given encouragement to the royalists under arms in the interior.

On their part, the princes, despairing of effective support from the allies, began to cast their eyes on their partisans in France. But they were not surrounded by counsellors fitted to take advantage of the zeal manifested by the brave men prepared to sacrifice themselves in their cause. A few old lords and friends had followed the fortunes of Monsieur, who had been declared regent, and taken up his abode at Verona, since the district of the Rhine had become unsafe for peaceful residents. The Prince of Condé, a brave but incompetent leader, continued on the Upper Rhine, drawing to him all who were willing to use their swords. A party of young nobles accompanied the Count d'Artois in his travels, and had followed in his train to St Petersburg. Catherine had given the prince a brilliant reception, and presented him with a frigate, a million of money, a sword, and the gallant Count de Vauban to admonish and stimulate him in the use of those precious gifts. She had furthermore held out magnificent promises of future aid, if the prince should succeed in making a descent on La Vendée. That operation, however, was not effected; and the Count d'Artois had sailed to Holland, and repaired to the head-quarters of the Duke of York.

The situation of the three emigrant princes was far from enviable. Austria, Prussia, and England, had refused to recognise Monsieur as regent; for the acknowledgment of a sovereign of France other than the sovereign de facto, would have implied an interference in its domestic concerns which no power desired ostensibly to arrogate. Now, especially, when they were defeated, all affected to maintain that they had taken up arms solely with a view to their own security. The recognition of the regent would have entailed a still further inconvenience, in the pledge it involved to make peace dependent on the destruction of the republic—a consummation, under present prognostics, of rather hopeless achievement. At the same time, the powers received the agents of the princes, but allowed them no public character. The Duke d'Harcourt at London, the Duke d'Havré at Madrid, and the Duke de Polignac at Vienna, delivered notes, seldom read and more rarely heeded; they were rather the intermediate recipients of the pecuniary aid occasionally doled out to the emigrants than the organs of an acknowledged authority. Thus the utmost discontent prevailed in the three emigrant courts towards the great powers. They began to perceive that the boasted zeal of the coalition in favour of royalty concealed the most violent hatred against France. Austria, by planting her flag on Valenciennes and Condé, had, according to the emigrants, chiefly occasioned the outburst of French patriotism. Prussia, whose pacific tendencies they already detected, had failed, they asserted, in all her engagements. Pitt, who of all the allies evinced the greatest sternness and disdain towards them, was especially odious in their eyes. The only appellation he obtained amongst them was "the perfidious Englishman;" and they held it justifiable to accept his largesses and afterwards deceive him if the opportunity offered. They maintained that Spain only could be relied upon: Spain alone was a faithful relative, a sincere ally; upon it solely were any hopes to be founded.

The three petty fugitive courts, so slenderly connected with the belligerent powers, possessed no bond of union even amongst themselves. The court of Verona, stagnant and remote, transmitting orders to the emigrants, which they disregarded, and making communications through unaccredited agents to the cabinets, which they treated with contumely, distrusted the two others, viewed with jealousy the active conduct of the Prince of Condé on the Rhine, and the partial consideration his useless but energetic courage availed him with the cabinets, and even murmured enviously at the travels of the Count d'Artois through Europe. The Prince of Condé, on his part, equally deficient in talent as full of bravery, refused to enter into any consistent plan, and manifested but little deference for the two courts which held aloof from warfare. Lastly, the diminutive court located at Arnheim, abjured as well the dangers to be encountered on the Rhine as the authority to be obeyed in Verona, and clung to the English head-quarters, under pretext of divers momentous projects on the coasts of France.

Bitter experience having taught the French princes that they could not rely on the enemies of their country to restore their throne, they fondly turned to their partisans in the interior and to La Vendée, and alleged that upon them alone all hope thenceforth rested. When terror ceased its reign in France, malignants unfortunately recovered confidence equally with honest men. The communications of the emigrants with the interior then recommenced. The court of Verona, through the medium of the Count d'Entraigues, corresponded with one Lemaitre, an intriguer who had been successively an advocate, secretary of the council, a pamphleteer, a prisoner in the Bastille, and now finally an agent of the princes. To him were joined a certain Laville-Heurnois, formerly a master of requests and a creature of Calonne, and an Abbé Brothier, tutor of the Abbé Maury's nephews. From these intriguers were demanded details on the state of France, and on the situation and views of parties, and digested plans of conspiracy. They replied by statements for the most part false: they boasted of pretended relations with the chiefs of the government, and laboured with all their power to persuade the princes that every thing was to be expected from a movement in the interior. They had been specifically instructed to open a communication with La Vendée, and particularly with Charette, who by his long resistance had become the hero of the royalists, but with whom no negotiation had been yet attempted.

Such, then, was the position of the royalist party within and without France. In La Vendée it prosecuted a war, little alarming from its dangers, but afflictive by its ravages. In Brittany it formed extensive projects, but remote as yet, and dependent on a doubtful contingency—union and concert amongst a multitude of lawless individuals. Out of France it was divided, contemned, unsupported; but, finally disabused touching the efficaciousness of foreign aid, it had reverted to the royalists of the interior, and opened with them an insignificant intercourse.

The republic, therefore, had little to dread from the efforts of Europe or of royalism. Apart from the regret occasioned by the unsuppressed ravages in La Vendée, it had abundant themes of congratulation in its brilliant triumphs. Saved the preceding year from invasion, it had this year wreaked revenge by conquests: it had acquired Belgium, Dutch Brabant, the districts of Luxumbourg, Liege, and Juliers, the electorate of Trèves, the Palatinate, Savoy, Nice, a fortress in Catalonia, the valley of Bastan; and thus menaced at once Holland, Piedmont, and Spain. Such were the results of the extraordinary efforts of the celebrated committee of public welfare.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS.—ALTERATION OF MANNERS.—SALOONS OF PARIS.—CONFLICTS BETWEEN THE TWO PARTIES.—MODIFICATIONS IN THE MAXIMUM AND THE SYSTEM OF REQUISITIONS.—ATTACK ON THE HALL OF THE JACOBIN CLUB, AND CLOSING THEREOF.—RETURN OF THE SEVENTY-THREE DEPUTIES IMPRISONED AFTER THE 31ST MAY.—CONDEMNATION OF CARRIER.—PROCEEDINGS COMMENCED AGAINST BILLAUD-VARENNES, COLLOT-D'HERBOIS, AND BARRERE.

WHILST the events we have recounted were passing on the frontiers, the convention prosecuted its remedial measures. The representatives appointed to remodel the authorities, traversed France, every where reducing the number of revolutionary committees, composing them of other individuals, arresting as accomplices of Robespierre's system, those whose excesses were too flagrant to be allowed to pass unpunished, changing the municipal functionaries, reorganising the popular societies, and purging them of the most dangerous men. These operations were not always effected without opposition. At Dijon, for example, the revolutionary organisation had been more compactly knitted than at almost any other place. The same individuals, members at once of the revolutionary committee, the municipality, and the popular society had kept the inhabitants in constant dread and trepidation. They were accustomed to immure travellers and residents in the most arbitrary manner, to inscribe on the list of emigrants the names of all whom it suited them to include under that category, and to intimidate the sections from granting such persons certificates of residence. They had enrolled themselves under the form and name of a revolutionary army, and compelled the commune to allow them pay. They followed no industrious profession, attended the sittings of the club as a pastime, accompanied by their wives, and dissipated in orgies, where it was permitted to drink only from large and flowing goblets, the twofold product of their appointments and their rapine. They corresponded with the Jacobins of Lyons and Marseilles, and served as their medium of communication with the brethren of Paris. The representative Cales experienced infinite difficulty in breaking up this confederacy; he superseded all the revolutionary authorities, and selected twenty or thirty moderate members of the club, and charged them to institute a process of purgation as to the remainder.

When the ultra-revolutionists were expelled from the various municipalities in the departments, they followed the example of those at Paris, and usually retired into the Jacobin Club. If the club had been purged, they forcibly invaded it after the departure of the representatives, or formed another. There they indulged in language even more violent than heretofore, and gave way to all the frenzy of combined rage and fear, for they saw retribution and vengeance menacing them from every quarter. The Jacobins of Dijon transmitted an inflammatory address to those of Paris, breathing the most implacable sentiments. At Lyons they presented an equally determined aspect; and as the city still lay under the ban of the convention's ruthless decrees, the representatives were greatly fettered in their endeavours to repress their fury. At Marseilles they were yet more audacious; joining the heated passions characteristic of the locality to those of their universal party, they gathered into a tumultuous crowd, surrounded a room in which the deputies Auguis and Serres were dining, and sent in envoys, who, with swords and pistols in their hands, demanded the liberation of the imprisoned patriots. The two representatives displayed the utmost firmness; but, ill supported by the gendarmerie, which had constantly assisted in the perpetration of the recent cruelties, and deemed itself in a great measure responsible for them, they narrowly escaped being strangled or stabbed. Several Parisian battalions, however, happening to be in Marseilles at the moment, came to the rescue of the representatives, and dispersed the multitude. At Toulouse, also, the Jacobins provoked riots. In that city were four individuals who had rendered themselves the leaders of the revolutionary party—a director of the post-office, a secretary of the district, and two comedians. These had formed a committee of surveillance for an extensive district, and stretched their tyranny far beyond Toulouse. They opposed the reforms and imprisonments ordered by the deputies D'Artigoyte and Chaudron-Rousseau, aroused the popular society, and had the hardihood to induce it to publish a declaration that those representatives had forfeited the confidence of the people. Ultimately overpowered, however, they were incarcerated, with their principal accomplices.

Such scenes occurred throughout all France, with more or less violence, according to the character of the provincial population. Nevertheless, the Jacobins were repressed in every locality. Those of Paris, the ruling elders of the confederacy, were in the greatest alarm. They beheld the capital obviously repugnant to their doctrines, and it now became equally apparent that in the departments, opinion, less prompt in its manifestations than at Paris, had also emphatically pronounced against them. They knew they were every where stigmatised as cannibals, as partisans, accomplices, and continuators of Robespierre. True, they felt themselves supported by the horde of dismissed functionaries, by the Electoral Club, by a zealous and often victorious minority in the sections, and even by a portion of the members of the convention, some of whom still frequented their society; but they were not the less dismayed at the unequivocal tendency of the public mind, and they loudly proclaimed there was a plot formed to dissolve all the popular societies, and after them the republic itself.

They drew up an address to the affiliated societies, with the view of refuting the charges alleged against them. "Endeavours are making," so their manifesto ran, "to destroy our fraternal union, to break a compact formidable to the enemies of liberty and equality: we are denounced and assailed with the blackest calumnies. Aristocracy and moderatism are raising their audacious fronts. The disastrous reaction caused by the fall of the triumvirs is perpetuated; and, from amidst the storms brewed by the enemies of the people, has started a new faction, which aims at the dissolution of all the popular societies. It exacerbates and labours to infuriate public opinion; it pushes effrontery so far as to represent us a rival power to the national representation—we who have fought and coalesced with it in all the dangers of the country. It accuses us of being the successors of Robespierre, whilst we have on our registers the names of those only who, during the night of the 9th and 10th Thermidor, occupied the posts which the danger of the country assigned to them. But we will answer these vile calumniators by assiduously combating them; we will answer them by the purity of our principles and actions, and by an unshaken devotion to the cause of the people which they have betrayed, to the national representation which they would dishonour, and to the equality which they so much abhor."

They affected great respect, it will be observed, for the national representation. At one of their meetings they had even delivered up to the committee of general safety a member for having stated that the chief conspirators against liberty were in the bosom of the convention itself. They caused their address to be circulated through all the departments, and particularly through the sections of Paris.

The party opposed to them became every day more emboldened. It had already assumed peculiar emblems and manners, and agreed upon places and cries for rallying together. It was composed, especially in the beginning, as we have previously mentioned, of young men belonging to the persecuted families, or who had eluded the conscription. These had found ready allies in the female sex, who had passed the last winter in terror, and aspired to pass the present in festivities and pleasure. Frimaire (November) was approaching: the women were eager to throw off the semblance of indigence, simplicity, squalor even, they had been long condemned to affect during the reign of terror, and to substitute for such obnoxious constraint indulgence in elegant apparel, in the forms and enjoyments of refined intercourse. They made common cause with the youthful reprobators of a savage democracy, stimulated their zeal, and bound them, by their encomiums and exhortations, to observe the graces of politeness and studied costume. Thus fashion recommenced its sway. It imposed, as one of its laws, that the hair should be bound in tresses, and confined at the back of the head by a comb. This was a usage borrowed from the military, who thus disposed their hair to parry the strokes of swords. It originated in the idea of thereby intimating that those thus adorned had taken part in the success of the French armies. It was likewise essential to wear large cravats, black or green collars, according to a practice of the Chouans; and, above all, crape round the arm, as if mourning some victim of the revolutionary tribunal. Hence we see what a singular medley of ideas, recollections, and opinions, gave rise to the peculiarities of the gilded youth, for such was the name given to that class. At night, in the saloons, which were resuming their ancient brilliancy, the women rewarded with smiles and praises the young men who had displayed their courage in the sections, at the Palais-Royal, or in the garden of the Tuileries, and the writers also, who, in the thousand pamphlets and prints of the day, assailed with sarcasms the revolutionary rabble. Fréron had become the chief of journalists; he edited the Orator of the People, which speedily acquired renown. It was the journal read by the "gilded youth," and the monitor they consulted for their daily instructions.

The theatres were not yet open. The actors of the Comedie-Française were still in prison. In default of that place of resort, concerts were frequented, given at the Feydeau Theatre, and illustrated by a melodious voice which now first asserted its charms over the Parisians—the voice of Garat. There congregated all that might be called the aristocracy of the time, represented by a few nobles who had not quitted France, by persons of wealth who now ventured to show themselves in public, and by contractors who no longer dreaded the severity of the committee of public welfare. The women appeared in a costume modelled on the antique, according to the mania of the epoch, and copied from designs by David. They had long ago abandoned powder and hoops; they wore fillets around their hair; the form of their garments approached as nearly as possible the simple tunic of the Grecian women; and, instead of high-heeled shoes, they assumed that covering we see on ancient statues —a slight sandal attached to the ankle by ribands. The young men, with braided hair and black capes, filled the pit of the theatre, and occasionally arose to greet with acclamations the elegant and capriciously attired females who embellished those assemblies by their presence.

Madame Tallien was the most beautiful and admired of those women who introduced the new tastes: her saloon was the most brilliant and crowded. Daughter of the Spanish banker Cabarus, widow of a president at Bordeaux, and recently married to Tallien, she was linked both to the men of the old and of the new order of things. She had viewed with abhorrence the reign of terror, as well from indignation as from amiability; she had warmly interested herself in the misfortunes of others, and both at Bordeaux and at Paris had never ceased to act the part of a petitioner, which she performed, it is said, with irresistible fascination. It was she who had contrived to soften the proconsular severity which her husband manifested in the Gironde, and recall him to more humane sentiments. She aspired to make him the pacificator, the redresser of the wrongs of the revolution. She invited to her house all those who had contributed with him to consummate the 9th Thermidor, and strove to gain them over to the cause of mercy by gentle flattery, and by firing their minds with dazzling hopes of public gratitude, of oblivion of the past, which many assuredly needed, and of power, which now inclined rather to the opponents than to the partisans of terror. She drew around her fair associates, who aided in this scheme of pardonable seduction. Amongst them shone pre-eminent the widow of the unfortunate General Alexander Beauharnais, a young creole, attractive not so much from her beauty as her inimitable grace.* Into this polished circle were attracted the rough and enthusiastic men who had been wont to lead so austere and harassing a life. They were there caressed, sometimes even rallied on their garb, their manners, or their rigorous principles. They were brought to sit at table with men whom they would have formerly persecuted under the character of aristocrats, enriched stockjobbers, or peculators of the public moneys, and thus made to feel their inferiority with regard to the ancient models of good taste and conversation. Many amongst them, deficient in acquirements, lost their self-possession with their rudeness, and were unable to sustain the energy of their character; others again, who, by their superior resources, knew how to vindicate their rank and speedily to acquire those advantages of mien and expression required in society, so frivolous and so easily caught after all, were nevertheless not always proof against alluring blandishments. The member of a committee, adroitly besought during an entertainment, often granted a favour or allowed his vote to be influenced.

Thus, a woman, born of a financier, married to a magistrate, and fallen, like any other spoil of the olden time, into the arms of an ardent revolutionist, took upon herself to reconcile simple men, sometimes uncouth and almost uniformly fanaticised, with elegance, taste, pleasure, freedom of social intercourse, and indifference as to opinions. The revolution redeemed (and that was, doubtless, a blessing) from the extreme limit of fanaticism and coarseness, was, notwithstanding, advancing too rapidly towards an utter disregard of republican manners, principles, and, we may almost say, antipathies. The Thermidorians were reproached with the change; they were accused of having commenced it, of eagerly embracing it, and of accelerating its predominance. The charge was true, and could not be gainsaid.

The revolutionists shunned these concerts and saloons. Rarely some amongst them ventured to enter such uncongenial scenes, and then hastened from them to their own tribunes, there to inveigh against "La Cabarus,"† and all the aristocrats, intriguers, and contractors she drew in her wake. They, the ultra-revolutionists, had no other places of resort than their clubs and sectional assemblies, which they frequented, not in quest of pleasure properly so called, but to give their passions vent. Their wives, who were styled "the Furies of the Guillotine," because they had often formed a circle around the scaffold during executions, appeared in the galleries of the clubs, attired in the popular costume, to bestow their applause on the most violent motions. Several members of the convention still continued to attend the meetings of the Jacobins, some bearing the halo of celebrity with them, but silent and gloomy, as Collot-d'Herbois, Billaud-Varennes, and Carrier. Others, such as Duhem, Crassous, Lanot, &c., gave their presence from attachment to the cause, and without having any peculiar reason for defending their revolutionary conduct.

The two parties repeatedly came into collision at the Palais-Royal, around the convention, in the galleries, and in the sections. In the sections, especially, where they had to deliberate and discuss, the tumults were characterised by extreme violence. It had become usual for certain unruly spirits to carry the address of the Jacobins to the affiliated societies from one to the other of the sectional meetings, and insist upon having it read. On the other hand, a special decree had directed the report of Robert Lindet on the state of France to be read on such occasions—a report which presented so truthful a picture, and expressed in so appropriate a manner the sentiments wherewith the majority of the convention and all honest men were animated. The reading of these two diverse documents became every decade the subject of lively contention. The revolutionists demanded with loud shouts the address of the Jacobins; their adversaries clamoured for Lindet's report. An indescribable uproar generally ensued. The members of the old revolutionary committees took down the names of all who mounted the tribune from the opposing ranks, and as they wrote them they exclaimed, "We will exterminate them!" Their habitual pursuits during the reign of terror had familiarised on their tongues the vocabulary of ruffianism and slaughter, and they could scarcely speak in any other language. By their present proceeding they gave occasion to a reproach that they were drawing up fresh lists of proscription, and making ready to recommence the system of Robespierre. These scenes usually terminated in actual conflicts; sometimes the victory remained uncertain, and ten o'clock arrived without any thing having been read. At such times the revolutionists, who never scrupled to overstep the legal hour, waited until their antagonists, who professed unlimited submission to the law, had retired, when they read whatever they pleased, and entertained all such topics of deliberation as their fancies suggested.

Every day scenes of this nature were reported to the convention, and bitter complaints lodged against the members of the old revolutionary committees, who were, it was generally asserted, the originators of all these disturbances. The Electoral Club, a more outrageous and turbulent arena than even any of the sections, contrived at length to provoke the patience of the assembly by an address conceived in the most dangerous spirit. That club was the resort, as we have before mentioned, of all the men most irretrievably compromised, and the place where the most daring schemes were concocted. A deputation from this club appeared, to demand that the election of municipal magistrates should be restored to the people; that the municipality of Paris, which had not been re-established since the 9th Thermidor, should be reconstituted; and, lastly, that instead of one sectional meeting each decade, two should be again allowed. On this audacious petition being read, sundry deputies arose, enforced the prevailing topics of complaint, and moved that proceedings be commenced against the members of the old revolutionary committees, to whom all the disorders were attributable. Legendre, although he had disapproved the previous attack of Lecointre upon Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, affirmed that the evil was to be traced to a higher source; that it was to be found in the members of the old government committees, who abused the indulgence of the assembly, and that the time had at last arrived when it was imperative to punish their former tyranny in order to avert its recurrence. This declaration occasioned a renewed and acrimonious outburst. After long and deplorable recriminations had been exchanged, the assembly, feeling the questions either insoluble or dangerous, for the second time passed to the order of the day.

Divers measures were then successively propounded, designed to repress ebullitions in the popular societies and abuses in the right of petition. It was proposed to subjoin to Lindet's report an address to the French nation, expressing in more clear and energetic terms the sentiments of the assembly, and the new course it purposed to follow. This suggestion was adopted. The deputy Richard, who had just returned from the army, maintained that the expedient was inadequate; that a vigorous government was the required panacea; that addresses were of no avail, because the framers of petitions would take care to neutralise their effect by counter-appeals; and that words ought no longer to be allowed utterance at the bar, which, pronounced in the streets, would lead to the arrest of those using such license. Bourdon [de l'Oise] rose to speak. "It is time," he said, "to tell you some useful truths. Do you know why your armies are constantly victorious? It is because they observe an exact discipline. Establish in the state a good police, and you will have a good government. Do you know whence spring the perpetual attacks directed against your rule?—from the mischievous purposes to which your enemies convert whatever is democratic in your institutions. They delight in repeating that you will never have a government—that you will be eternally torn by anarchy. Can it then be possible that a nation uniformly victorious should be ignorant how to govern itself; and that the convention, aware that the defect alone prevents the consummation of the revolution, should not remove it? No, no; let us deceive our enemies. It is by the abuse of popular societies and of the right of petitioning that they think to destroy us: it is that abuse which must be suppressed."

* [This lady, it is perhaps scarcely necessary to state, subsequently became Empress of the French, as the wife of Napoleon Bonaparte.]

Various modes of rendering the popular societies innocuous without annihilating them, were then suggested. Pelet, with the view of depriving the Jacobins of the support they derived from several Mountaineer deputies sitting in their club, and more especially of tearing from them Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and other dangerous leaders, proposed that all the members of the convention be prohibited to enrol themselves members of a popular society. His motion was adopted. But vehement remonstrances were urged by the Mountain: it was alleged that the right of meeting to discuss public interests was a privilege inherent in all the citizens, which a deputy could be no more debarred from exercising than any other member of the community, and that consequently the decree just passed was a violation of an absolute and unassailable right. The decree was rescinded. Dubois-Crancé thereupon submitted another motion. Reciting the manner in which the Jacobins had executed the process of purification, he showed that the club still retained within its pale the very individuals who had misled it under Robespierre. He maintained that the convention had an undoubted right to purge it in the same effective manner it had pursued, through its commissioners, with regard to the popular societies in the departments. He eventually moved that the subject be referred to the competent committees, with instructions to devise a suitable method of purification and a plan for rendering the popular societies beneficial. This amended proposition was finally adopted.

The Jacobins were thrown into an extraordinary ferment by the decision of the convention. They protested that Dubois-Crancé had deceived the deputies; that the purification ordained after the 9th Thermidor had been rigorously executed; that no authority could warrant another revisal; that they were all equally worthy to sit in that illustrious society, which had rendered such eminent services to the country; but that, at the same time, they shrunk from no scrutiny howsoever severe, and that they were ready to undergo the examination required. In consequence, they resolved that the list of all the members should be printed, and borne to the bar of the convention by a deputation. On the following day, the 13th Vendémiaire (4th October), however, they evinced a less docile spirit. They affirmed that their resolution of the eve was inconsiderate; that to deliver the list of the society to the national assembly, was tantamount to a recognition of the right to institute a purification, which they held was possessed by no earthly power; that all the citizens enjoying the privilege of meeting, without arms, to confer on questions of public import, no individual could be declared unfit to be enrolled in a society; and that, consequently, the purification was contrary to all right, and the list should not be rendered. "The popular societies," exclaimed a certain Giot, an outrageous Jacobin, and one of the delegates to the armies—"the popular societies are independent of all but themselves. If it were otherwise, the infamous court would have purged that of the Jacobins, and you would have seen these benches, which ought to be filled by virtue alone, polluted by the presence of the Jaucours and the Feuillants. Well! the court itself, which respected nothing, dared not interfere with you; and what the court dared not do, is to be attempted at a moment when the Jacobins have sworn to prostrate all tyrants, whoever they may be, and to yield invariable submission to the convention! I have just arrived from the departments; I can assure you the existence of the popular societies is seriously jeopardised; I have been treated as a miscreant, because the title of Jacobin was in my commission. I was told that I belonged to a society which was composed only of brigands. There are furtive schemes hatching to alienate from you the other societies in the republic; I have been fortunate enough to check the schism, and to knit more firmly the bands of fraternity between you and the society of Bayonne, which Robespierre had calumniated in your hall. What I have stated of one is common to all: be prudent; always adhere to your principles and to the convention; and, above all, acknowledge in no power the right to purify you." The Jacobins applauded this discourse, and determined they would not furnish their list to the convention, but would await its decrees.

The Electoral Club was still more unruly. Since its last petition, it had been excluded from the Evêché, and taken refuge in a room of the Museum, in the immediate vicinity of the convention. There, in a sitting held during the night, amidst furious cries from the assembled horde, and clattering peals from the feet of the women located in the galleries, it declared that the convention had overstepped the duration of its powers; that it had been deputed to try the last king and frame a constitution; and that, having accomplished those two objects, its task was performed and its authority extinct.

These scenes in the Jacobin and Electoral Clubs were quickly denounced before the convention, which referred the additional facts to the committees charged to present a report touching the abuses of the popular societies. It had adopted an address to the French nation, as previously resolved, and transmitted it to the sections and all the communes in the republic. This address, couched in firm and moderate language, inculcated in a manner more positive and precise the sentiments expressed in the report of Robert Lindet. It became the subject of fresh contests in the sections. The revolutionists strove to prevent its being read, and opposed addresses of adhesion being voted in reply; on the contrary, they moved and carried the adoption of addresses to the Jacobins, expressive of the interest felt in their cause. Frequently, after having thus decided a vote, auxiliaries reinforced their adversaries, who proceeded to expel them; and the section, thus remodelled, arrived at an opposite conclusion. It consequently happened that several amongst them proffered two contradictory addresses—the one to the Jacobins, the other to the convention. In the first, the services of the popular societies were extolled, and vows offered up for their preservation; in the latter, the convention was assured that the section, freed from the thraldom of anarchists and terrorists, came to express its true feelings, to place at its disposal the arms and lives of its members, to combat both the successors of Robespierre and the agents of royalism. The convention calmly surveyed these dissensions, whilst awaiting the forthcoming project on the regulation of the popular societies.

It was presented on the 25th Vendémiaire (16th October). Its principal aim was to break up the coalition formed throughout France by the various Jacobin societies. Affiliated to the parent society, regularly corresponding with it, and obeying its orders, these composed a vast party, skilfully organised, under a supreme and central direction—the feature most obnoxious to a ruling power. The proposed decree interdicted "all affiliations and federations, as likewise all correspondence, in a collective capacity, between popular societies." It provided, moreover, that no petitions or addresses should be framed in a collective capacity, in order to avoid those imperious manifestoes which the delegates of the Jacobin and Electoral Clubs were wont to read at the bar, and which had often become mandates to the assembly. Every address or petition was to be individually signed. This stipulation assured the means of ascertaining and prosecuting the authors of inflammatory motions; and hopes were entertained that the necessity of appending their signatures would induce them to pause. The list of members belonging to each society was to be immediately drawn out and affixed in the place of meeting.

Scarcely was the project submitted to the assembly, ere a hundred voices broke forth in condemnation. "The design of destroying the popular societies is manifest," said the Mountaineers; "but you forget that they have saved the revolution and liberty; you forget that they offer the most potent engine for uniting the citizens, and preserving in them energy and patriotism; you infringe, by prohibiting them from holding correspondence, the essential right appertaining to all citizens of corresponding together—a right equally sacred as that of congregating peaceably to confer on questions of public interest." The deputies Lejeune, Duhem, and Crassous, all Jacobins, all strongly interested in discarding such a decree, were not the only members who thus expressed themselves. The deputy Thibaudeau, a sincere republican, unconnected with either Mountaineers or Thermidorians, betokened alarm at the possible consequences of the decree, and urged its postponement, signifying himself apprehensive that it would endanger the very existence of the popular societies. "No intention exists of destroying them," replied the Thermidorians, the authors of the decree; "it is merely wished to place them under necessary restrictions."

Amidst the contention, Merlin de Thionville suddenly exclaimed—"President, call the previous speakers to order. They pretend that we desire to abolish the popular societies, whereas the question solely relates to the regulation of their external position.' Rewbel, Bentabolle, and Thuriot, likewise maintained that their suppression was not contemplated. "Are they prevented," they argued, "from meeting peaceably and unarmed to confer on public affairs? Certainly not; that right remains unimpeached. They are prevented from affiliating or confederating, and they are thereby treated only as the departmental authorities have previously been. These latter were interdicted, by the decree of the 14th Frimaire, instituting the revolutionary government, from corresponding or concerting together. Is it intended that the popular societies should be allowed a license withheld from the departmental authorities? They are prohibited from corresponding in a collective capacity, and in that restriction no right is violated: every citizen, doubtless, is entitled to correspond from one extremity of France to another; but do citizens correspond through presidents and secretaries? It is this official correspondence between powerful and organised bodies that the decree purposes, and most reasonably purposes, to prevent, in order to destroy a federalism more monstrous and dangerous than that of the departments. It is by means of these affiliations and correspondences that the Jacobins have succeeded in attaining so formidable an influence over the government, and assuming a part in the direction of affairs which rightfully belongs to the national representation alone."

Bourdon [de-l'Oise], one of the most influential members of the committee of general safety, and, as we recollect, not always in perfect concord with his friends, although a Thermidorian, thus spoke:—"The popular societies are not the people; I see the people only in the primary assemblies: the popular societies are collections of men self-elected, self-nominated, like monks, who have concluded by forming an exclusive and permanent aristocracy, entitling itself the people, and planting itself alongside the national representation, to dictate, modify, or oppose its resolutions. I say, by the side of the convention I perceive another representation in full activity, and that representation is located at the Jacobin Club." Loud plaudits interrupted Bourdon: he continued in these terms:—"I bring so little passion to the discussion, that to have peace and union I would willingly say to the people, 'Determine between the men you have appointed to represent you and those who have reared themselves by their side; it matters little, so that you have a single representation.'" Fresh cheers again compelled Bourdon to pause. He resumed: "Yes," he passionately exclaimed, "let the people choose between you and the men who would have proscribed representatives possessing the national confidence—between you and the men who, leagued with the municipality of Paris, laboured so strenuously, but a few months ago, to strangle liberty. Citizens, would you conclude a glorious peace?—would you grasp the boundaries of ancient Gaul? Then offer to the Belgians, to the people bordering on the Rhine, a peaceable revolution—a republic without a double representation—a republic without revolutionary committees imbrued with the blood of citizens. Say to the Belgians and the people of the Rhine, 'You aspired to a demi-liberty, we give it you whole, only sparing you the cruel calamities which precede its establishment—sparing you the bloody trials through which we have ourselves passed.' Remember, citizens, that in order to deter the neighbouring populations from uniting with you, they are told that you have no government; that in treating with you it is difficult to ascertain whether the convention or the Jacobin Club ought to be addressed. Give, on the contrary, unity and concentration to your government, and you will find that no population will display aversion towards you and your principles—you will find that no population hates liberty."

Duhem, Crassous, and Clausel, pressed for at least the postponement of the decree, alleging that it was too important a measure to be passed thus abruptly; all anxious to address the assembly, they contended for priority. Merlin de Thionville demanded it in preference to them all, with that ardour he could manifest in the tribune as well as on the field of battle. The president ended the strife by calling upon them successively. Dubarran, Levasseur, Romme, were likewise heard against the decree; Thuriot in its favour. Finally, Merlin once more spoke. "Citizens," he exclaimed, "when the establishment of the republic was discussed, you decreed it without delay or report; today its establishment for the second time is in some sort the question, since it has to be rescued from the popular societies coalesced against it. Citizens, there is no reason to recoil from an attack on that cavern, notwithstanding the blood and corpses that obstruct its entrance; penetrate boldly into it, drive out the knaves and assassins, and leave none but good citizens therein, to ponder tranquilly on the great interests of the country. I move you to pass this decree, which saves the republic, as you did that which created it, that is to say, without delay or report."

Merlin was greatly applauded, and the decree forthwith voted, clause by clause. It was the first blow levelled at that celebrated society, which had hitherto held the convention in trembling thraldom, and constantly imparted to it the revolutionary impulse. The importance of the decree was not to be estimated merely by its provisions, which might be easily evaded, but by the courage manifested in its adoption, for the spirit was portentous to the Jacobins of their approaching fall. Congregating that same evening in their hall, they commented on the measure and the manner in which it had been passed. The deputy Lejeune, who had strenuously opposed it in the convention, complained of not having been adequately supported; he asserted that few members of the assembly had spoken in defence of the society to which they belonged. "There are certain members of the convention," he said, "renowned for their revolutionary and patriotic energy, who maintained this day a reprehensible silence. Either those members are guilty of tyranny, as alleged against them, or they have laboured for the public welfare. In the first supposition they are culprits, and ought to be punished; in the second, their task is not yet accomplished. After having facilitated by their vigils the successes of the country's defenders, they ought to vindicate their principles and the endangered rights of the people. But two months ago, you, Collot and Billaud, were incessantly descanting on the rights of the people from this tribune; how comes it that you have ceased to uphold them? Why are you silent now, when so many appeals are still made upon your courage and talents?"

In truth, since the formal accusation lodged against them in the convention, Billaud and Collot had observed a sullen silence. But thus invoked by their colleague Lejeune, and upbraided with not having defended the society, they appeared in the tribune, and declared, "that if they had preserved silence it was from motives of prudence, not from weakness; that they had been apprehensive their support might injure rather than benefit the cause advocated by patriots; that this dread of prejudicing discussions had long been the sole reason of their reserve; that, moreover, being accused of having domineered over the convention, they had sought to answer their accusers by abstaining from all prominent participation in affairs; but that they responded with delight to the call made upon them by their colleagues, to emerge from that voluntary retirement, and would again feel authorised to devote their energies to the cause of liberty and the republic."

Satisfied with this explanation, the Jacobins greeted them with applause, and reverted to the law enacted that morning. They found consolation in the idea that they would still communicate with all France by means of their orations in the tribune. Goujon urged them to respect the decree just passed, and prevailed in extorting a promise from them to that effect; but a Jacobin, by name Terrasson, propounded a scheme for continuing the correspondence without directly infringing the law. This consisted in framing a circular letter, not written in the name of the Jacobin Club and addressed to other Jacobins, but signed by all the free men assembled in the hall of the Jacobins, and addressed to all the free men of France assembled in popular societies. The suggestion was hailed with rapture, and the plan of transmitting such circulars definitively adopted.

Thus we see how lightly the Jacobins treated the menaces of the convention, and how little disposed they showed themselves to profit by the warning it had given them. Meanwhile, until fresh provocations should render additional measures respecting them indispensable, the convention applied itself to the task traced out in Robert Lindet's report, and entered upon the discussion of the various questions treated by him in that document. The objects in view were to remedy the effects of a violent system of government on agriculture, trade, and currency, and to revive confidence, security, and the spirit of order and industry, in all classes of the community. But here, again, the contending parties were equally at variance, equally certain to be engaged in altercation, as on all other matters of polity.

The requisitions, the maximum, the assignats, and the sequestration on the property of foreigners, were topics of as virulent invective against the late government as the imprisonments and executions. The Thermidorians, supremely ignorant on subjects of political economy, were moved, by the mere force of reaction, to censure all that had been done in that branch of administration in bitter and outrageous terms; and yet, if in the general government of the state, during the preceding year, any thing had been really irreproachable and completely justified by necessity, it was the conduct of the financial and victualling departments. Cambon, the most influential member in the committee of finance, had brought the exchequer into admirable order: he had caused large issues of assignats, it is true, but that was the sole resource; and he had quarrelled with Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, because he refused to concur in an increased revolutionary expenditure. And Lindet, charged with the superintendence of transports and requisitions, had laboured with the most exemplary zeal in obtaining from abroad, amassing in France, and conveying both to the armies and to the great towns, the supplies that were necessary. The mode of requisitions was undoubtedly a violent one; but on all hands it was acknowledged to be the only possible expedient, and Lindet had sedulously endeavoured to use it with the utmost moderation. At the same time, he could not be held responsible either for the fidelity of all his agents or for the conduct of those who exercised the privilege of making requisitions, such as municipal functionaries, representatives on missions, or commissioners to the armies.

The Thermidorians, and especially Tallien, directed the most frivolous and unjust attacks upon the general system of these revolutionary expedients, and upon the manner in which they had been carried into effect. The primary cause of all the evils was, according to them, the excessive issue of assignats, whereby they had been depreciated, and rendered utterly disproportionate in value to articles of food and merchandise. It was thus the maximum had become so disastrous and oppressive, because it compelled all venders or creditors to receive in payment a nominal and purely illusory acquittance. There was nothing very novel or profound in these objections; no indication of any remedy, or of any discovery unknown to all the world; but it was the object of Tallien and his friends to attribute the inordinate issue of assignats to Cambon, and thus apparently to charge upon him all the calamities of the state. They likewise reproached him with the sequestration of foreign property—a measure which, having provoked reprisals against the French, had interrupted the circulation of bills of exchange, destroyed every species of credit, and annihilated commerce. As to the commission for supplies and provisions, the same censors accused it of having harassed France with requisitions, expended enormous sums abroad in procuring corn, and left Paris in scarcity at the commencement of a rigorous winter. They maintained the expediency of subjecting it to a severe inquiry.

Cambon possessed a reputation for integrity unimpugned by any party. He was actuated with an ardent zeal for the best practicable administration of the finances, but combined therewith an impetuous temperament, which an unjust reproach excited beyond the limits of control. He had intimated to Tallien and his friends that he would not assail them, but that, at the first whisper of calumny, he would approve himself a merciless antagonist. Tallien had the imprudence to aggravate his attacks from the tribune of the convention by vituperative articles in the journals. Cambon was incensed to fury, and during one of the numerous sessions devoted to the discussion of those matters, he hurried to the tribune, and thus apostrophised Tallien: "Ah! thou attackest me!—thou wouldst throw doubts upon my honesty! So be it! I will prove that thou art an embezzler and an assassin. Thou hast not rendered thy accounts as secretary of the commune, and I have the proof thereof at the committee of finance; thou hast ordered an outlay of fifteen hundred thousand francs for an object which will cover thee with infamy. Thou hast not rendered the accounts of thy mission to Bordeaux, and I have likewise proofs of this at the committee. Thou wilt remain for ever suspected of confederacy in the crimes of September, and I shall proceed to prove, by thy own words, that confederacy against thee, which ought to condemn thee to silence for the rest of thy life." Here Cambon was interrupted; he was told that such personalities were trespasses on the order of debate, that no person impugned his honesty, and that the discussion had reference merely to the financial system. Tallien muttered a few incoherent sentences, to the effect that he did not answer personal charges, but simply such as related to public questions. Cambon subsequently proceeded to demonstrate that assignats had been the sole resource of the revolution, as the expenditure had amounted to three hundred millions per month; that the income, amidst the prevailing disorder, had scarcely furnished the fourth of that sum, and the deficiency was to be made good every month by assignats; that the quantity in circulation was no mystery, and amounted to six thousand four hundred millions; and that at the same time the national domains represented twelve thousand millions, and supplied adequate means for redeeming the republic from debt. He averred that he had, at the peril of his life, saved five hundred millions, which Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon proposed to apply to certain purposes; that he had long opposed the maximum and sequestration; and that, with regard to the commission for commerce, being obliged to pay twenty-one francs the quintal abroad for corn, and to resell it in France for fourteen, there could be little ground for wonder that its transactions had entailed heavy losses.

These controversies, so indiscreet on the part of the Thermidorians, who, whether right or wrong in their views, had assuredly a somewhat tarnished reputation, and should have paused ere they ventured to assail a man at once upright, able, and violent, caused to the assembly the loss of much valuable time. Although the attacks ceased on the side of the Thermidorians, Cambon's wrath was not appeased, and every day he repeated in the tribune: "To accuse me! the vile rabble! I challenge you to examine my accounts, and investigate my conduct!" "Be tranquil," exclaimed the members around him; "no one doubts your integrity." But he reverted to the subject almost daily. Amidst this hot contention and personal recrimination, the assembly adopted, to the extent of its capability, such measures as were most calculated to repair or mitigate existing evils.

It ordered a general statement of the finances, detailing the receipts and payments, and a report on the means of withdrawing a part of the assignats from circulation, without depriving them of their current character, so as to avoid discrediting them. On the motion of Cambon, it renounced a miserable financial expedient, which gave rise to infinite peculation, and outraged the prejudices of sundry provinces, to wit, the melting of church plate. This resource had been originally estimated at a thousand millions; in reality, it produced only thirty millions. A resolution was passed that the plate in question should not be touched for the future, but remain in deposit with the communes. The more serious inconveniences of the maximum next occupied the attention of the assembly. Some members already advocated the entire abolition of that measure; but the apprehension of a disproportionate enhancement of prices prevented acquiescence in so sweeping a reaction. The modification of the law was alone aimed at. The maximum had contributed to destroy commerce, because the merchants obtained, in the rates of the tariff, no allowance for the charges of freight or insurance. In consequence, all colonial produce, all articles of primary necessity, and all raw materials brought from abroad into the French ports, were freed from the maximum and the burden of requisitions, and might be sold in open competition. The same privilege was granted with regard to merchandise captured in prizes, which had hitherto lain unproductive in the warehouses. The uniform maximum on corn had been attended with manifold inconveniences. The production of grain being more costly and less copious in certain departments, the prices received by the farmers in those departments had not repaid even their outlay. It was decided that the prices of grain should vary in each department, according to the scale of 1790, and be raised two-thirds upon that basis. When thus increasing the value of the commodities of life, it was proposed to augment appointments, salaries, and the incomes of small annuitants; but this suggestion, considerately submitted by Cambon, was repudiated as interested by Tallien, and deferred for after consideration.

The subject of requisitions was subsequently discussed. The principal evils attending them were the general, unlimited, and confused manner in which they were levied, and the exhaustion of the means of transport; to avert which for the future, it was determined that the commission for supplies should alone possess the right of making requisitions; that it should be debarred from exacting an entire commodity, or all the produce of a department; but that it should specify the article needed, both as to its nature and quantity, and the period for its delivery and payment; and that it should regulate its demands according to the actual necessity, and select the district contiguous to the locality requiring supplies. The representatives with the armies were solely authorised, in urgent cases of destitution or of rapid movements, to make prompt and indispensable requisitions.

The question touching the sequestration of foreign property was warmly debated. One party argued that the war ought not to be extended from governments to subjects; that it was fitting the latter should be allowed peaceably to continue their relations and interchanges, and armies only be attacked; that the French had confiscated but twenty-five millions, whereas they had lost by seizures in foreign countries at least one hundred millions; that policy dictated the restitution of the twenty-five in order to recover the one hundred millions; that the sequestration was ruinous to the French bankers, inasmuch as they were obliged to deposit in the public treasury the sums they owed to aliens, whilst they were debarred from receiving what aliens were indebted to them, as the foreign governments appropriated all such balances by way of reprisal; that this measure, thus prolonged, rendered commercial intercourse with France distasteful and suspicious even to neutrals; and that, lastly, the circulation of bills having ceased, it was found necessary to pay for a considerable portion of the produce imported from adjacent countries in specie. The other party replied that, since a distinction was taken between subjects and governments in time of warfare, the rule must be applied to balls and bullets as well as commerce, and those missiles be directed at the heads of kings alone, not at those of their soldiers; that the English trading vessels taken by French privateers ought to be restored, upon the same principle, and only ships of war retained; that if the twenty-five millions sequestrated were reimbursed, the example would not be imitated by the hostile governments, and the one hundred millions belonging to Frenchmen be still withheld; and, finally, that to re-establish the circulation of bills of exchange would merely serve to provide the emigrants with a medium for drawing funds out of France.

The convention shrunk from deciding the point, and simply resolved that the sequestration should be raised so far as regarded the Belgians, whom conquest had in a certain sense placed at peace with France, and the merchants of Hamburg, who were guiltless of the war declared by the empire, and whose credits represented grain furnished to France.

To all these retrieving measures adopted in behalf of agriculture and commerce, the convention super-added others calculated to revive confidence and reinstate the trading community in its wonted activity A former decree placed beyond the pale of the law al who should elude a sentence, or evade the provision of an enactment; it was abolished, and those condemned by revolutionary commissions, or included in the lists of suspected, who had concealed themselves, were formally authorised to re-enter their abodes in safety. The suspected still under detention were allowed the right of administering their property. Lyons was declared to be no longer in a state of rebellion; its name was restored; the demolitions ceased the goods stopped by the surrounding communes were given up to it; its merchants no longer needed certificates of civism to receive or transmit merchandise, and the benefits of trade recommenced for that unfortunate city. The members of the popular commission of Bordeaux and their adherents, that is to say, nearly all the Bordeaux merchants, were under the ban of outlawry; the decree fulminated against them was cancelled. An invidious column had been ordered for erection at Caen, in execration of federalism; the order was countermanded, and a resolution passed that no such column should be reared. Sedan was pronounced free to manufacture all descriptions of cloth. The departments of the North, the Pays de Calais, the Aisne, and the Somme, were relieved from the land-tax for four years, on condition they resumed the cultivation of flax and hemp. Lastly, a commiserating glance was cast at the ill-fated La Vendée. The representatives Hentz and Francastel, General Turreau, and several others, who had executed the ruthless decrees promulgated under the reign of terror, were recalled. It was alleged, naturally enough, that they were accomplices of Robespierre and the committee of public welfare, who had purposed, by the employment of cruelty, to render the war of La Vendée perpetual. Why the committee should have harboured such an intention, was not stated; but parties are not scrupulous in branding adversaries. Vimeux was appointed to command in La Vendée, young Hoche in Brittany; and into both districts new representatives were dispatched, with commissions to examine whether any probability existed that an amnesty would be accepted, and thereby a pacification happily accomplished.

It now becomes obvious how rapid and general was the reaction towards other ideas. And whilst alleviating all manner of woes, reintegrating all classes of proscribed, it was natural that the sympathy of the convention should be likewise awakened on behalf of its own members. For more than a year, seventy-three deputies had languished in detention at Port Libre, for having signed a protest against the outrage of the 31st May. They had written a letter demanding a trial. All that yet remained of the right side, and a portion of the section stigmatised as the Belly, started from their long slumber on a question which involved the freedom and security of debate, and strenuously advocated the reinstalment of their colleagues. Then ensued one of those stormy and interminable discussions which invariably arose when the past came under review. "You would then condemn the thirty-first of May!" the Mountaineers exclaimed; "you would anathematise a day which up to this hour you have asserted glorious and salutary; you would resuscitate a faction which, by its baneful opposition, almost ruined the republic; you would reorganise federalism!" The Thermidorians, themselves the authors or approvers of the 31st May, were embarrassed; and, in order to delay the decision, the convention ordered a report on the suspended deputies.

It is in the nature of reactions not only to seek redress for ills inflicted, but also to exact vengeance. At this time the convention was besieged with exhortations to hasten the trial of Lebon and Fouquier-Tinville. We are aware that proceedings against Billaud, Collot, Barrère, Vadier, Amar, Vouland, and David, members of the old committees, had been previously and repeatedly urged. Circumstances daily led to further propositions of the like nature. The drownings at Nantes, atrocities long unknown, had at length been revealed. One hundred and thirty-three Nantese, transferred to Paris for trial before the revolutionary tribunal, had not arrived until after the 9th Thermidor. They had been acquitted, and heard with favour whilst recounting the calamities visited on their city. The public indignation was so vividly excited, that it had been found expedient to summon the members of the revolutionary committee of Nantes to Paris. The evidence adduced on their trial furnished a melancholy picture of the enormities usual in civil strife. At Paris and elsewhere, remote from the theatre of warfare, no conception was formed of the excess to which ferocity had been carried. The accused could allege but two facts in their exculpation, and they pleaded them to all the charges—La Vendée raging around them, and the orders of the representative Carrier. As the proceedings drew towards a close, they inveighed more bitterly against Carrier, and demanded that he be made to partake their fate, and to answer in his own person for the acts he had enjoined. The entire population was aroused, and clamoured for the arrest of Carrier, and for his arraignment before the revolutionary tribunal. It became necessary for the convention to adopt some resolution upon the topic thus agitating the public mind. The Mountaineers were struck with dismal apprehensions; they asked whether, after having already immured Lebon and David, and several times accused Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, their adversaries intended to finish by calling to account all the deputies who had been engaged on missions. To allay their fears, the expedient of a decree was devised, for the purpose of placing under the safeguard of strict formalities prosecutions against members of the national representation. The introduction of this decree gave rise to lengthened debates, characterised by great asperity on both sides. The Mountaineers desired, with the view of averting a fresh proscription, to render the formalities slow and complicated. Those they called "the reactors," on the contrary, desired to simplify them, in order to ensure more promptly and certainly the chastisement of those obnoxious deputies classed under the title of "proconsuls." Eventually the measure was so framed that all denunciations were to be referred to the three committees of public welfare, general safety, and legislation, who should decide whether there were grounds for investigation; that, in case of an affirmative decision, a committee of twenty-one members should be chosen by ballot to draw up a report; and that, with such report and the vindication of the inculpated deputy before it, the convention should determine in the last resort whether there were grounds for impeachment, and, in the unfavourable alternative, send the deputy before the competent tribunal.

So soon as the decree was passed, the three committees declared there were grounds for investigation against Carrier. A committee of twenty-one members was thereupon impanelled, to which all the documents in the pending trial were referred: it summoned Carrier to give appearance before it, and forthwith entered upon the examination. After the circumstances that had transpired at the revolutionary tribunal, and the notoriety of his revolting acts, the fate of Carrier could not be doubtful. The Mountaineers, albeit reprobating the crimes of Carrier, professed to believe that, if he were prosecuted, it was not so much to punish his transgressions, as to prepare the way for a long series of avenging sacrifices against the men whose energy had saved France. Their opponents, on the other hand, comparing the urgent demands, pressed by the members of the revolutionary committee on trial, for the arraignment of Carrier, with the singular tardiness of the committee of twenty-one, concluded there was a project formed for sparing him. The committee of general safety, fearing that he might take flight, surrounded him with police agents, who kept constant vigils on his movements. Carrier does not seem, however, to have meditated flight. Certain ultra-revolutionists had secretly urged him to escape; but their exhortations were lost on him—he appeared overwhelmed and paralysed by the public abhorrence. One day, perceiving he was followed, he turned upon one of the agents, asked furiously why he was dogging him, and, showing a pistol, threatened to blow out his brains. A crowd collected, symptoms of a commotion were manifested; the armed force hastened to the spot, seized Carrier, and conducted him to his dwelling. This occurrence gave rise to considerable excitement in the assembly, and to vehement outcries in the Jacobin Club. It was maintained that the national representation had been outraged in the person of Carrier, and explanations were demanded from the committee of general safety. The committee frankly avowed its share in the matter; and, though subjected to severe animadversion, it gained the credit of being determined to prevent Carrier's escape. At length, the committee of twenty-one made its report, concluding for impeachment before the revolutionary tribunal. Carrier essayed despondingly to defend himself; he traced all his cruelties to the exasperation provoked by the civil war, to the necessity of terrifying La Vendée, still in a menacing condition, and to the impulse imparted from the committee of public welfare, on which he dared not directly charge the drownings, but to which he explicitly imputed that inspiration to ferocious energy which had hurried into extravagance divers commissioners of the convention. Here, as had often previously happened, dangerous questions were revived; the more hazardous, that the share of each in the violences of the revolution must become, when brought under discussion, the fertile theme of recrimination. The commissioners might attribute to the committees, the committees to the convention, the convention to all France, that inspiration which had led to such frightful and to such great results, which was common to the whole country, and which above all sprung from a situation without example. "Every one," exclaimed Carrier, in a moment of despair—"every one is guilty here, even to the president's bell!" Nevertheless, the narrative of the abominations perpetrated at Nantes had aroused so deep a feeling of indignation, that not a single member ventured to vindicate Carrier, or attempted to shield him even upon general considerations. He was decreed under impeachment by an unanimous vote, and consigned to the revolutionary tribunal.

The reaction was thus proved to be making rapid strides. The blow, which the convention had heretofore shrunk from aiming at the members of the old committees of government, was now levelled at Carrier. All the deputies who had filled missions, all the individuals who had officiated on revolutionary committees—all those, in short, who had exercised rigorous powers—began to tremble for their safety.

The Jacobins, already struck at by a decree which interdicted them from maintaining affiliations and correspondence in a collective capacity, had need of prudence; but, since the late measures of the assembly, so contrary to their views and doctrines, it was scarcely to be anticipated they would subside into acquiescence, and thus avert a rupture with the convention and the Thermidorians. The resolution taken with regard to Carrier, in fact, evoked all their latent animosity, and led to a violent outburst in their club. Crassous, a deputy and Jacobin, described it as one of the means employed by aristocracy to ruin the patriots. "The trial now proceeding before the revolutionary tribunal," he said, "is the chief reliance of aristocracy, and that on which it grounds its hopes. The accused are scarcely allowed the privilege of being heard before the tribunal; nearly all the witnesses are men interested in making a great uproar about this affair—some of them have passports signed by Chouans; the journalists and pamphleteers have conspired to exaggerate the most trifling facts, bewilder public opinion, and keep out of view the cruel circumstances which produced and which explain the calamities that occurred, not only at Nantes but throughout France. Unless the convention be on its guard, it will find itself disgraced by these aristocrats, who make so much noise about this trial only to throw upon it all the odium. It is not the Jacobins who are to be accused of seeking to dissolve the convention, but these men, confederated to compromise and degrade it in the eyes of France. Let all good patriots, therefore, be vigilant; the attack upon them is commenced; let them hold together and be prepared to defend themselves with energy."

Several Jacobins spoke after Crassous, and harangued in the same strain. "The reactors descant," they said, "on drownings and shootings; but they omit to mention that the individuals whom they profess to commiserate had furnished aid to the brigands; they forget the cruelties inflicted on our volunteers, who were hanged on trees and shot in files. If the brigands are to have vengeance, let the families of two hundred thousand republicans, mercilessly massacred, also come forward and demand vengeance." The minds of the assembled Jacobins became furiously excited; the meeting was converted into a raging tumult. At length, Billaud-Varennes, whose long silence had been a subject of reproach, appeared in the tribune. "The tactics of the counter-revolutionists are well known," he said: "when they endeavoured, under the Constituent Assembly, to assail the revolution, they called the Jacobins disorganisers, and massacred them on the Champ de Mars. After the 2d September, when they strove to prevent the establishment of the republic, they called them drinkers of blood, and loaded them with atrocious calumnies. Now they are recommencing the same machinations. but let them not delude themselves with hopes of triumph; the patriots have thought fit to observe silence for a moment, but the lion is not dead when he sleeps, and on his awakening he annihilates all his enemies. The trenches are opened, and the patriots are about to shake off their slumber and resume all their energy. We have already a thousand times exposed our lives; if the scaffold still await us, let us remember that it is the scaffold which secured the glory of the immortal Sidney!"

These words electrified the assemblage. The Jacobins gathered around Billaud-Varennes, and rapturously applauded him; they pledged themselves to make common cause with all the threatened patriots, and to combat in their defence whilst life held.

In the present position of parties, this scene necessarily attracted attention. The speech of Billaud-Varennes, who had hitherto abstained from occupying either of the two tribunes, was a veritable declaration of war. The Thermidorians, at all events, so construed it. On the following day, Bentabolle produced the Journal of the Mountain, which contained an account of the meeting at the Jacobin Club, and denounced that expression of Billaud-Varennes—"The lion is not dead when he sleeps, and on his awakening he annihilates all his enemies." Scarcely had Bentabolle time to repeat this phrase, ere the Mountaineers arose in a body, assailed him with abusive epithets, and exclaimed that he too was one of those who had liberated aristocrats. Duhem, in particular, pronounced him a villain. Tallien vehemently insisted upon Bentabolle's right to be heard, that deputy, scared at the tumult, being about to leave the tribune. He was induced to remain, however, and proceeded to demand an explanation from Billaud-Varennes as to the words on the awakening of the lion." Billaud rose to reply in his place. "To the tribune!" was shouted from all sides. He resisted; but was finally obliged to mount the rostrum, and speak from that conspicuous station. "I do not disavow," he said, "the opinion I uttered at the Jacobin Club. So long as I deemed personal quarrels the only matters at issue, I remained silent· but I could no longer be silent when I saw aristocracy arising more formidably than ever." At these words a laugh broke forth in one of the galleries, and a noise in another. "Turn out the Chouans!" vociferated the Mountaineers. Billaud continued, amidst antagonist cheers and murmurs. He affirmed, in an embarrassed tone, that known royalists had been liberated and the purest patriots immured; in corroboration, he cited the instance of Madame de Tourzel, the governess of the children of France, "who had recently been set at large, and who might of herself form a nucleus of contra-revolution." Much laughter was elicited by this remark. He added, that the secret conduct of the committees belied the public language of the convention in its addresses; and that in such a state of things he was justified in speaking of "an awakening" as necessary to patriots, for it is the slumber of men on their rights that leads them to slavery.

Partial applause from the Mountain accompanied Billaud as he descended the steps of the tribune, but the great body of the audience and the assembly indulged in obstreperous laughter, or evinced that insulting pity engendered at the sight of fallen tyranny, struggling dismally and vainly to plead its justification. Tallien hastened to succeed Billaud, and retort his reproaches. "It is time," he said, "to answer the men who are striving to incite the people against the convention." "No person is doing so," cried sundry voices in the hall. "Yes, yes!" responded others; "men are striving to incite the people against the convention!" "They are those men who tremble for themselves," continued Tallien, "on beholding the sword of justice suspended over guilty heads, light piercing into all parts of the administration, and the vengeance of the law ready to fall upon assassins; they are the men now agitating, who pretend that the people ought to awaken, who seek to mislead patriots by assuring them that they are all compromised, and who fondly hope, in short, under favour of a general commotion, to prevent the prosecution of Carrier's accomplices and upholders." Universal plaudits interrupted Tallien. Billaud, who repudiated any connivance with Carrier, exclaimed from his seat, "I assert that I have not upheld the conduct of Carrier." No attention was given to this disclaimer of Billaud. The cheering continued, and it was not for some moments Tallien could resume. "It is impossible," he subjoined, "that two rival authorities can be longer suffered to exist—that members who are silent here should be permitted to denounce elsewhere what you have done." "No, no!" echoed several voices; "no rival authorities to the convention!" "It must not be," pursued Tallien, "that men go, I care not where, to throw ignominy upon the convention, and on such of its members as it has intrusted with the government. I will not submit any resolution at this moment," he added. "It is sufficient that this tribune has replied to what has been said in another; it is sufficient that the unanimity of the convention against the men of blood is strikingly manifested."

Renewed acclamations proved to Tallien that the assembly was in a mood to sanction whatever might be proposed against the Jacobins. Bourdon [de-l'Oise] supported the views of the preceding speaker, although on several questions he differed from his friends the Thermidorians. Legendre, also, made his sonorous voice be heard. "Who are those," he asked, "who censure our operations? It is a handful of men of prey. Look them in the face: you will see on their visage a varnish compounded of the gall of tyrants." This expression, which was levelled at the sombre and livid countenance of Billaud-Varennes, elicited great applause. "Of what do you complain," Legendre continued—"you who so unceasingly accuse us? Is it because citizens are no longer incarcerated by hundreds? Is it because fifty, sixty, eighty persons are no longer guillotined each revolving day? Ah! I confess, in that our gratification is different from yours, and our manner of emptying the prisons is not the same. We have visited them; we have drawn, as well as we were able, the distinction between aristocrats and patriots: if we have been deceived, our heads are here to answer for the error. But whilst we redress wrongs—whilst we seek to make you forget that those wrongs are yours—why repair to a famous club to denounce us and mislead the people, fortunately few in number, who frequent it?" In conclusion, Legendre added, "I move that the convention take measures to prevent its members attending and preaching revolt at the Jacobin Club." The convention adopted the proposition of Legendre, and instructed the committees to devise and propound those measures.

The convention and the Jacobins were thus in hostile array, and under circumstances where, words being exhausted, the final appeal must be to coercion. That the convention was well disposed to abrogate that celebrated club, could not be doubted; it only remained for the committees to muster courage formally to submit the proposition. The Jacobins felt their precarious tenure, and complained in all their sessions of the manifest intention to dissolve them: they compared the existing government to Leopold, Brunswick, and Cobourg, who had also demanded their dissolution. Moreover, a phrase dropped in the tribune had furnished them with a fertile text whereon to descant, in proof that they were calumniated and menaced. It had been unguardedly stated, that in certain intercepted letters evidence was discovered that the committee of emigrants in Switzerland coincided with the Jacobins of Paris. If it were merely intended by this statement that the emigrants viewed with satisfaction any excitement or agitation calculated to embarrass the government, nothing could be more true. A letter seized on an emigrant was found, in fact, to maintain that the hope of subduing the revolution by arms was pure folly, and that its annihilation was to be sought through its own disorders. But if, on the contrary, it were meant to be inferred that the Jacobins and emigrants corresponded and concerted together in order to attain an identical object, the charge was equally preposterous and ludicrous; and nothing could be more agreeable to the Jacobins than to be criminated and assailed after such a fashion. Accordingly, we find that for several days they ceased not to proclaim themselves injured and calumniated men; and Duhem insisted, at repeated intervals, that these pretended letters should be produced and read in the tribune of the assembly.

Meanwhile an extraordinary ferment prevailed in Paris. Large crowds, issuing on the one hand from the Palais-Royal, and composed of the young men with braided hair and black collars, and on the other from the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, the streets Saint-Denis and Saint-Martin—from all the quarters, in short, commanded by the Jacobins—encountered on the Carrousel, in the garden of the Tuileries, and on the Place de la Revolution. The first raised shouts of "The convention for ever! Down with the terrorists and the tail of Robespierre!" The second retorted with cries of "The convention for ever! The Jacobins for ever! Down with the aristocrats!" They had also distinct songs. The "gilded youth" had adopted an air which was called Le Reveil du Peuple; the partisans of the Jacobins struck up that old air of the revolution, immortalised by so many victories—"Allons! enfans de la patrie!" When these hostile crowds came in contact, they roared their respective airs, chorus against chorus; then they yelled forth their several rallying whoops, and charged with volleys of stones and flourishes of bludgeons; blood soon flowed, and on both sides prisoners were made and taken to the committee of general safety. The Jacobins asserted that this committee, entirely composed of Thermidorians, released the young men thus delivered into its hands, and detained only the patriots.

These scenes recurred several days consecutively, and ultimately became sufficiently alarming to induce the committees of government to take measures of precaution, and to double the guards at all the posts. On the 19th Brumaire (9th November), the assemblages were more multifarious and considerable than on any preceding occasion. One crowd, pouring out of the Palais-Royal and advancing along the Rue Saint-Honoré, stopped before the hall of the Jacobins and surrounded it. The multitude swelling every moment, all the avenues were obstructed; and the Jacobins, who chanced to be in session at the time, had reason to believe themselves besieged. Some groups, favourable to them, gave utterance to the accustomed shouts—"The convention for ever! The Jacobins for ever!" which provoked the adverse cries; a conflict ensued, and, as the youths were the strongest, they speedily succeeded in putting the hostile groups to flight. They then completely encompassed the hall of the club, and broke the windows with showers of stones. Large fragments of flint fell amidst the congregated Jacobins. They, incensed and furious, exclaimed they were about to be murdered: and, on the ground that members of the convention were in the meeting, they affirmed that it was intended to assassinate the national representation. The women who filled their galleries, known under the cognomen of "furies of the guillotine," endeavoured to leave the hall in order to escape the danger; but the young men outside, seizing upon those who sought to fly, subjected them to the grossest indecencies, and even cruelly maltreated many of them. Several retreated into the hall, their dresses in shreds, their hair dishevelled, echoing shrieks of "murder!" Still the stones continued to shower into the assembly. The Jacobins then resolved to make sallies and charge the assailants. The energetic Duhem, armed with a club, headed one of these sorties, and a frightful encounter in the Street Saint-Honoré resulted. If the weapons of the two parties had been deadly, a prodigious massacre must have attended the collision. The Jacobins re-entered, carrying with them sundry prisoners. The young men, remaining without, threatened, if their comrades were not released, to storm the hall and wreak upon their adversaries remorseless vengeance.

This commotion had continued several hours before the governing committees assembled or could issue orders. Emissaries, on the part of the Jacobins, had appeared before the committee of general safety, to announce that the deputies sitting in the society were exposed to assassination. The four committees of public welfare, general safety, legislation, and war, consulted jointly, and determined to dispatch patrols forthwith to rescue their colleagues engaged in this scandalous rather than sanguinary scene.

The patrols departed, accompanied by a member of each committee, towards the place of combat. The members of the committees restrained the gensdarmes from attacking the assailants, contrary to the instigations of the Jacobins; they likewise refused to enter the hall, although strongly urged by their colleagues present at the meeting. They remained without the building, exhorting the young men to disperse, and promising to secure the freedom of their comrades. Eventually, they succeeded in gradually dissipating the assemblage, and afterwards caused the hall of the Jacobins to be evacuated, dismissing every one to his abode.

Tranquillity being re-established, they returned to their colleagues, and the four committees passed the night in discussions upon the course to be adopted. Some argued in favour of suspending the Jacobin Club, others dissented. Thuriot especially, albeit a strenuous opponent of Robespierre on the 9th Thermidor, began to be alarmed at the sweeping rapidity of the revulsion, and betokened a leaning towards the Jacobins. The committees separated without arriving at any conclusion.

On the following morning, 20th Brumaire, the convention met under the excitement of the night's occurrence. Duhem was foremost, as may be imagined, to maintain that a conspiracy had been laid to exterminate the patriots, and that the committee of general safety had failed in its duty. The galleries, taking part in the discussion, made a terrific noise, manifesting on one side approval, on the other denial, of the facts alleged. The disturbers were ordered to be removed, and immediately afterwards a number of members demanded simultaneously to be heard—Bourdon [de-l'Oise], Rewbel, and Clausel, to defend the committee; Duhem, Duroy, and Bentabolle, to censure it. Each spoke in his turn, and represented the circumstances according to his peculiar view, interrupted at intervals by the contradictions of those who had viewed them in a different light. Some had chanced merely to perceive crowds in which patriots were maltreated; others had happened only to encounter groups in which the youths were ill-used, and the convention and the committees denounced. Duhem, who could with difficulty restrain his violent temper in discussions of this nature, exclaimed that the attack had been planned by the aristocrats who dined with La Cabarus and pursued the chase at Raincy. He was ordered out of the tribune, and debarred from addressing the assembly. From amidst this chaos of conflicting assertions, it remained obvious that the committees, notwithstanding their alacrity in meeting and summoning the armed force, had been unable to send it until late to the scene of commotion; that when the patrols were at length directed to the Rue Saint-Honoré, they had not allowed them to extricate the Jacobins by force, but contented themselves with gradually dispersing the multitude; that, in short, they had exhibited a very natural forbearance towards men who used as their motto, "The convention for ever!" and who were not accustomed perpetually to vociferate that the government was delivered over to counter-revolutionists. More, in fact, could scarcely have been expected from them. To prevent assaults on their enemies was distinctly their duty; but it was too much to insist that they should charge sword in hand their own friends, or in other words, young men who daily mustered in numerous bands, ready to support them against the ultra-revolutionists. They declared to the convention that they had consumed the night in deliberation upon the question whether it were fitting or not to suspend the Jacobin Club. They were asked if they had passed a resolution, and on their intimation that they had not yet settled the point, the whole subject was remitted to their consideration, with instructions to frame a report and submit it to the assembly.

The Jacobins not meeting this day (the 20th), it elapsed in comparative quietude. But on the morrow (the 21st), being one of the usual club days, crowds congregated as before. On both sides, the parties seemed prepared for a determined struggle, and it was evident they would come into collision during the evening. The four committees hastily assembled, suspended by an ordinance the sittings of the Jacobins, and directed that the key of the hall should be immediately brought to the office of the secretary to the committee of general safety.

The order was executed, the hall closed, and the key lodged in the secretary's office. This measure prevented the tumult justly apprehended: the crowds dispersed, and the night passed in perfect calmness. On the following day, Laignelot appeared in the name of the four committees, to communicate to the convention the resolution they had taken. "We never entertained the idea of attacking popular societies," he said; "but we have the right to close the doors of buildings where factions are reared and civil war preached." The assembly showered upon him repeated plaudits. The call of the roll was demanded, and the resolution sanctioned almost unanimously, amidst acclamations and cries of "The republic for ever! The convention for ever!"

Thus finished that society whose name has remained so celebrated and so odious, and which, similar to all the assemblies, to all the men who successively figured on the scene, similar to the revolution itself, possessed the merit, together with the vices, of extreme energy. Occupying a position inferior to the convention, and open to all new aspirants, it was the arena whereon the young revolutionists, who had not yet distinguished themselves, and were impatient to emerge from obscurity, made trial of their powers, and sought to propel the slower movement of revolutionists already seated in power. So long as the demand existed for fresh champions, fresh talents, fresh lives ready to offer themselves for sacrifice, the society of the Jacobins was useful, and furnished men of whom the revolution had need in its sanguinary and terrible struggles. When the revolution had reached its final term, and began to retrograde, the ardent men who had been formed amongst the Jacobins, and had survived the convulsion, were driven for sanctuary, as it were, into the bosom of their club. Soon it became obnoxious from its anxieties and ebullitions, dangerous from its very terrors. It was then sacrificed by the men who were striving to heave back the revolution from the extreme point it had reached, and to substitute a medium system, with reason, equity, and liberty for its principles—men who, blinded by hope, as are all who innovate, fondly believed they could fix it in that desired medium. They had reason, doubtless, in wishing to return to moderation, and the Jacobins, too, had reason in warning them they were advancing to counter-revolution. Revolutions sweeping like a pendulum violently agitated from one extreme to another, we may always surely prognosticate they will have excesses; but, fortunately, political societies, after oscillating fitfully in contrary directions, conclude by settling into an equable and justly-poised movement. But what an interval was yet to occur—what calamities, what bloodshed—before arriving at that happy epoch! The English, also, the forerunners in revolutions, had to pass through the ordeal of a Cromwell and two Stuarts.

The dispersed Jacobins were not men to retire at once into private life and renounce political agitation. Part repaired to the Electoral Club, which, expelled from the Evêché by the committees, had since mustered in a room of the Museum; others betook themselves to the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, to the popular society of the section of the Quinze-Vingts, the resort of the most prominent and decided men in that faubourg. The Jacobins appeared there in a cluster, on the 24th Brumaire, saying—"Brave citizens of the Faubourg Antoine, you who are the sole supporters of the people, you see before you unfortunate persecuted Jacobins. We ask to be received into your society. We have said to each other, 'Let us go to the Faubourg Antoine, we shall be there unassailable; united, we shall strike surer blows to guarantee the people and the convention from slavery!'" They were all admitted without scruple. They gave utterance to the most inflammatory and dangerous doctrines, and several times read that clause in the declaration of rights which ran: "When the government violates the rights of the people, insurrection becomes for the people the most sacred of rights and the most indispensable of duties."

The committees, having made trial of their power and found themselves capable of acting decisively, did not deem it necessary to pursue the Jacobins into their asylums, but permitted them to indulge in idle vapourings; prepared, at the same time, to interfere on the first symptom of turbulence, if deeds should happen to follow words.

The majority of the sections in Paris, emboldened by the aspect of affairs, altogether expelled from their purlieus those known as terrorists, who retreated into the quarters of the Temple and the Faubourgs Saint-Antoine and Saint-Marceau. Thus freed from opposition, they adopted addresses of congratulation to the convention on the energy it had just displayed against the "accomplices of Robespierre." Similar addresses emanated from nearly all the towns in France; and the convention, already committed to the line of conduct recently exemplified, was hurried forward still more rapidly. The seventy-three suspended deputies, whose restoration had been previously advocated, now became the objects of still more assiduous reclamations from members of the centre and the right side, whose zeal was kindled by the desire not only of vindicating the freedom of debate, compromised in the persons of their colleagues, but also of securing the valuable reinforcement of seventy-three votes. They were at length liberated and reinstated; the convention, without passing any judgment on the 31st May, declared that it was possible to have thought differently from the majority touching that event without thereby incurring guilt. They entered the assembly in a body, the aged Dusaulx at their head. He spoke in behalf of all on the occasion, and gave assurance that, in seating themselves again by the side of their colleagues, they buried all resentment, and would be actuated solely by anxiety to promote the public weal. This boon granted, it seemed as if concession were to become illimitable. Louvet, Lanjuinais, Henri-Larivière, Doulcel, Isnard, all the Girondists escaped from proscription, and for the most part concealed in caverns, wrote and claimed to be reinstalled. A violent debate ensued upon this subject. The Thermidorians, aroused to a sense of the extraordinary progress of the reaction, resisted the demand, and overawed the right side, which, deeming itself in need of their further assistance, presumed not to irritate them, and desisted from enforcing the point. It was, however, decreed that the deputies under the ban of outlawry should be no longer molested, but not allowed to resume their functions as members of the national representation.

The same spirit which led to the absolution of some, instigated the condemnation of others. A venerable deputy, named Raffron, scaled the tribune, and obtested that the time was come for punishing all who were culpable, and for proving to France that the convention was not the confederate of assassins. He urged that Lebon and David, both under arrest, should be forthwith brought to trial. The enormities committed in the south, and especially at Bedouin (Vaucluse), having been made known, a report and a decree of impeachment against Maignet were demanded. Sundry voices also claimed an immediate judgment upon Fouquier-Tinville,* and a prosecution against the for-

* [Now that Fouquier-Tinville disappears from the scene, a few particulars of that revolting character may not prove unacceptable. We quote from the author of the Graphic History of the French National Convention, vol. ii. pp. 216, 217.

Fouquier-Tinville, a Picard by birth, born in 1747, and procureur in the court of the Châtelet, exhibited one of those extraordinary characters, in which there is such a mixture of bad and strange qualities as to be almost inconceivable. Gloomy, cruel, atrabilious, the unsparing enemy of every species of merit or virtue, jealous, artful, vindictive, ever ready to suspect, to aggravate the already overwhelming dangers of innocence, he appeared impervious to every feeling of compassion or equity: justice in his estimation consisted in condemnation; an acquittal caused him the most severe mortification; he was never happy but when he had sent all the accused to the scaffold; he prosecuted them with an extreme acharnement, made it a point of honour to repel their defences: if they were firm or calm in presence of the judges of the tribunal, his rage knew no bounds. But with all this hatred to what generally secures admiration and esteem, he showed himself alike insensible to the allurements of fortune and the endearments of domestic life: he was a stranger to every species of recreation—women, the pleasures of the table, the theatres, had for him no attractions. Sober in his habits of life, if he ever be-mer minister of war, Bouchotte, the same who had delivered up the offices of that department to the Jacobins. A similar measure was advocated against the ex-mayor Pache, who was alleged to have been the accomplice of the Hébertists, and saved by the influence of Robespierre. Amidst this torrent of accusation against revolutionary leaders, the three principal chiefs, so long spared, were at length doomed to fall. Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, once more formally denounced by Legendre, could not escape the common lot. The committees were constrained to receive the denunciation and pronounce an opinion on its merits. Lecointre, declared a calumniator in his previous accusation, announced that he had caused the documents to be printed which he had formerly lacked, and they were accordingly referred to the committees. They, impelled by the current of opinion, dared no longer resist, and speedily resolved that there were grounds for investigation as against Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, but not in the case of Vadier, Vouland, Amar, and David.

The trial of Carrier, tardily prosecuted in presence of a public which ill disguised the spirit of reaction wherewith it was animated, finally closed on the 26th Frimaire (16th December). Carrier and two members of the revolutionary committee of Nantes, Pinel and Grand-Maison, were condemned to undergo the pains of death, as agents and accomplices of the system of terror. The others were acquitted, as exonerated from their participation in the drownings by obedience to their superiors. Carrier, still persisting that the entire revolution—those who had caused, suffered, or directed it—were equally culpable with himself, was dragged to the scaffold: at the fatal moment he evinced resignation, and received death with calmness and courage. In proof of the unnatural passions engendered by civil war, traits of character were adduced of Carrier before his mission to Nantes, which showed him to have possessed a temperament the reverse of sanguinary. The revolutionists, even whilst condemning his conduct, were dismayed at his fate; they could not dissemble from themselves that his execution was the commencement of those ruthless reprisals the counter-revolution was preparing for them. Besides the proceedings threatened against representatives, members of the old committees, or envoys on missions, recent enactments warned them that vengeance was about to take a lower range, and that inferiority of function would be no safeguard. A decree made it imperative on all who had exercised any powers whatsoever, or disbursed the public funds, to render an account of their transactions. Now, as all the members of revolutionary committees had formed treasuries with the proceeds of the taxes, with the plate of churches, and with extraordinary revolutionary imposts, in order to organise the first battalions of volunteers, to subsidise revolutionary armies, to pay for transports, to establish police, to meet multifarious expenses of the like nature, it was obvious that every individual functionary during the reign of terror, however low his grade, would be liable to all the hazards of retribution.

These well-founded apprehensions were aggravated by divers alarming rumours. Peace was spoken of with Holland, Prussia, Spain, the Empire, La Vendée even, and it was alleged that the conditions of such pacification would be fatal to the revolutionary party.

came intoxicated, it was with the commonest kind of wine. The orgies in which he participated had all a political view, as, for example, to procure a feu de file; on such occasions he was the first to bring together the judges and juries, and to provoke Bacchanalian orgies. What he required, above every thing, was human blood.

A feu de file, in the Jacobin vocabulary, was the condemnation to death of all the accused. When it took place, the countenance of Fouquier-Tinville became radiant; no one could doubt that he was completely happy; and to attain such a result he spared no pains. He was, to be sure, incessantly at work: he went into no society, hardly ever showed himself at the clubs: it was not there, he said, that his post lay. The only recreation which he allowed himself was to go to the place of execution, to witness the pangs of his victims: on such occasions his gratification was extreme.

Fouquier-Tinville might have amassed a large fortune: he was, on the contrary, poor, and his wife, it is said, actually died of starvation. He lived without any comforts: his whole furniture, sold after his decease, only produced the sum of five hundred francs. He was distinguished by the appearance of poverty and a real contempt of money. No species of seduction could reach him: he was a rock, a mass of steel, insensible to every thing which usually touches men—to beauty and riches; he became animated only at the prospect of a murder which might be committed, and on such occasions he was almost handsome, so radiant was the expression of his visage.

The friend of Robespierre, who fully appreciated his valuable qualities, he was the depository of his inmost thoughts. The dictator asked him one day what he could offer him most attractive, when supreme power was fully concentrated in his hands, 'Repose,' replied Fouquier-Tinville, 'but not till it is proved that not another head remains to fall: incessant labour till then.'"

CHAPTER XXXIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE WAR ON THE RHINE.—CAPTURE OF NIMEGUEN BY THE FRENCH.—CONQUEST OF HOLLAND BY PICHEGRU.—CAPTURE OF UTRECHT, AMSTERDAM, AND THE PRINCIPAL TOWNS.—NEW POLITICAL ORGANISATION OF HOLLAND.—VICTORIES ON THE PYRENEES.—CLOSE OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1794.—NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE.—STATE OF LA VENDEE AND BRITTANY.—NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE VENDEAN CHIEFS.

The French armies, consolidated on the left bank of the Rhine, and with no formidable impediment to obstruct their passage to the right shore, menaced Holland and Germany. Was it prudent to move them onwards, or ought they to be withdrawn into cantonments? Such was the question to be solved.

Notwithstanding their triumphs and long sojourn in fertile and teeming Belgium, they were in the utmost destitution. The country they occupied, overrun for three years by innumerable legions, was entirely exhausted. With the evils of war were combined those of the French administration, which had introduced in its wake assignats, requisitions, and the maximum. Provisional municipalities, eight intermediate authorities, and a central administration established at Brussels, governed the country pending its definitive fate. Eighty millions had been imposed on the clergy, the abbeys, the nobles, and the corporations. The assignats had been put into forced circulation, and the prices at Lille had served to determine the rates of the maximum throughout all Belgium. Articles of food and commodities of essential usefulness were subjected to requisition. These regulations had failed to obviate the scarcity. The traders and farmers concealed all they possessed, and both officer and soldier were exposed to the greatest privations.

Levied en masse the preceding year, accoutred on the spur of the moment, and hastily transported to Hondtschoote, Watignies, Landau, the army had since received nothing from the government but powder and projectiles. Long ago it had ceased to encamp under tents; it bivouacked under the foliage of trees, despite the commencement of a winter already inclement. Many soldiers, in defect of shoes, enveloped their feet in wisps of straw, and covered their bodies with mats in place of mantles. The officers, paid in assignats, often found their appointments depreciated to eight or ten actual francs per month; those who received supplies from their friends were seldom allowed to appropriate them, for every thing was absorbed by the requisitions of the French adminis tration. They were reduced to the condition of the private soldier, marching on foot, carrying knapsacks on their backs, feeding on the coarse ration-bread, and trusting for existence to the precarious chances of war.

The war administration seemed exhausted by the extraordinary efforts it had made to levy and equip twelve hundred thousand men. Nor was the new organisation of the government, weak and disjointed, calculated to impart to it the requisite vigour and activity. Thus all conspired to counsel the withdrawal of the army into winter quarters, and the boon of permission for it to reap the recompense of its victories and military virtues in the enjoyment of repose and abundance.

At the same time, it was to be considered that the army was already before the fortress of Nimeguen, which, situated on the Wahl (such is the name of the Rhine near its mouth), commanded both its banks, and might serve the enemy as a means for debouching in the following campaign on the left bank. It was, therefore, important to occupy this place before wintering; but the attack presented almost insuperable difficulties. The English army, drawn up on the right shore, counted at least 38,000 men; a bridge of boats furnished it with the means of communicating with the town and throwing in supplies. Besides its own fortifications, Nimeguen was defended by an intrenched camp in advance, filled with troops. Consequently, to render an investment complete, it would have been necessary to detach a strong force over the river, exposed to all the hazards of the passage and of an engagement, and in case of defeat to almost certain destruction, as retreat would have been impracticable. The French, under these circumstances, could operate on the left bank alone, and were in the dilemma of having no alternative but to attack the intrenched camp, with very slender hopes of success.

The French generals, however, were determined to attempt one of those sudden and bold attacks, which had recently opened to them, in so short a time, the strongholds of Maestricht and Venloo. The allied generals, feeling the importance of Nimeguen, had assembled at Arnheim to deliberate on the best mode of defending it. They had arranged that an Austrian corps, under the orders of General Werneck, should pass into the English service, and form the left of the Duke of York, for the defence of Holland. Whilst the Duke of York, with his English and Hanoverians, remained on the right bank, before the bridge of Nimeguen, and reinforced the defenders of the place, General Werneck was to execute, towards Wesel, considerably above Nimeguen, a singular movement, which experienced military men have deemed one of the most absurd imagined by the allies in the course of their luckless campaigns. This corps, profiting by an islet which the Rhine forms towards Buderich, was to pass on the left bank, and attempt a point between the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse and that of the North. Thus 20,000 men were to be thrown, beyond a large river, between two victorious armies of 80,000 to 100,000 men each, to see what effect they would produce on the latter: they were to be reinforced according to the event. We can conceive that such a movement, effected by the united armies of the coalition, might have become grand and decisive; but, essayed with a force of 20,000 men, it was a project essentially puerile, and probably disastrous, so far as the troops charged therewith were concerned.

Nevertheless, trusting to save Nimeguen by these means, the allies caused, on the one hand, the corps of Werneck to advance, and on the other, the garrison of Nimeguen to prosecute harassing sallies. The French repelled these sorties, and, as at Maestricht and Venloo, opened the trenches at a proximity to the place as yet unusual in war. A fortunate accident facilitated their labours. The two extremities of the arc they described around Nimeguen rested on the Wahl; from these extremities they attempted to bombard the bridge. Some of their projectiles alighted on the pontoons, and jeopardised the communications of the garrison with the English army. The English in the fortress, surprised by this unexpected occurrence, re-established the pontoons, and hastened to rejoin the bulk of their army on the opposite shore, abandoning to its own resources the garrison, composed of 3000 Dutchmen. When the republicans perceived this evacuation, they redoubled their fire. The governor, struck with dismay, sent to apprise the Prince of Orange of his critical position, and obtained permission to retire so soon as he judged the danger sufficiently great. Scarcely had he received this authority, ere he repassed the Wahl in his own person. The garrison was thrown into the utmost disorder: one part grounded arms; the residue, attempting to escape on a floating bridge, were checked by the French cutting the cables, and eventually foundered on an island, where they were made prisoners.

On the 18th Brumaire (8th November), the French entered Nimeguen, and found themselves undisputed masters of that important station—an achievement due to their temerity and the terror inspired by their arms. Meanwhile, the Austrians, under the command of Werneck, had endeavoured to debouch by Wesel; but the impetuous Vandamme, falling on them the moment they set foot on the left bank of the Rhine, had forced them to recross the stream, fortunate that they had been thus stopped at the outset, for they would have surely incurred the risk of utter destruction, had they advanced farther.

The time was now at length arrived for entering into cantonments, since the French were in possession of all the important points on the Rhine. Doubtless, to conquer Holland, and thus secure the navigation of the three great rivers, the Scheldt, the Meuse, and the Rhine, deprive England of its most powerful maritime alliance, menace Germany on its flanks, interrupt the communications of the continental enemies of France with the insular, or at least oblige them to make the long circuit of Hamburg; in short, open up the richest country in the world, and the most desirable for France in its present commercial prostration, was an object, with such inordinate advantages, apt to tempt the ambition of the government and armies of France. But how many considerations prompted them to avoid hazarding an invasion of Holland—an enterprise almost impracticable at all times, but especially so in the season usually marked by deluges of rain! Planted at the mouths of several rivers, Holland is formed by mere fragments of soil, accumulated between the waters of such rivers and those of the ocean. Its surface, every where depressed below the bed of the waters, is incessantly menaced by the sea, the Rhine, the Meuse, the Scheldt, and intersected, moreover, by small detached branches of those rivers, and by a multitude of artificial canals. These low lands, thus perpetually threatened, are covered with gardens, manufacturing towns, and dockyards. At every step an army might adventure, it has to encounter either large rivers, whose margins are lofty dykes planted with cannon, or arms of rivers and canals, all defended by the art of the engineer, or, finally, fortresses which are the strongest in Europe. Those grand manœuvres, which often disconcert a methodical resistance by rendering sieges unnecessary, are therefore impossible upon a superficies intersected and defended by innumerable lines. Should an army succeed, however, in surmounting so many obstacles, and advancing into Holland, its inhabitants, by an act of heroism such as signalised them on the invasion of Louis XIV., have only to pierce their dykes, inundate the country, and with it engulf the enemy sufficiently rash to penetrate its confines. Their vessels remain to them; and they can, like the Athenians of old, fly with their moveable wealth, and await better times; or depart for India, and found a new empire in the vast territories there belonging to them. All the difficulties we have enumerated become still greater in the season of floods, and a naval alliance, such as that of England, renders them insurmountable.

It is true, that the spirit of independence which animated the Dutch at this period, their hatred of the stadtholderate, their aversion to England and Prussia, the knowledge they possessed of their true interests, the resentments still rankling for the violent suppression of the revolution in 1787—all gave assurance that the French armies would be welcomed by the great body of the people. It might be rationally concluded that the Dutch would oppose the cutting of the dykes, and the consequent ruin of the country, for a cause they detested. But the army of the Prince of Orange and that of the Duke of York still overawed them; and they united would amply suffice to prevent the passage of the multitudinous lines to be carried before their eyes. Upon the whole, therefore, if a surprise were rashness in the time of Dumouriez, it was almost madness at the end of 1794.

Nevertheless, the committee of public welfare, stimulated by the Dutch refugees, seriously discussed the expediency of pushing for a point beyond the Wahl. Pichegru, in a plight deplorable as that of his soldiers, who were covered with itch and vermin, had repaired to Brussels for relief from a cutaneous disorder. Moreau and Regnier had succeeded him in the command: both counselled repose and winter quarters. The Dutch general Daendels, a refugee and an intrepid soldier, earnestly recommended a preliminary attack on the Isle of Bommel, with the condition that, if it failed of success, the scheme should be prosecuted no farther. The Meuse and the Wahl flowing parallel towards the sea, mingle their waters for a moment considerably below Nimeguen, again diverge asunder, and ultimately reunite at Wondrichem, a little above Gorcum. The ground enclosed between their two streams forms what is called the Isle of Bommel. Notwithstanding the dissent of Moreau and Regnier, an attack was adventured on this island, at three different points. It was unsuccessful, and the plan forthwith abandoned, in good faith and candour, especially on the part of Daendels, who promptly acknowledged its impossibility the instant it became apparent to his mind.

Thereupon, that is to say towards the middle of Frimaire (commencement of December), the army was allowed to take up winter quarters, whereof it stood in such need; and part of the cantonments were established around Breda, so as to form a species of blockade. This fortress and that of Grave had not yet surrendered; but, from the want of communications during all the period of winter, they were inevitably doomed to fall.

In this state of repose the army confidently expected to pass the season; and assuredly it had achieved enough to be proud of its glory and services. But a hazard, partaking of the miraculous, opened for it a new career, to close in yet more brilliant destinies. The cold, already intense, soon increased to such a point as to foster hopes that the great rivers might be probably frozen. Pichegru quitted Brussels, without waiting for his effectual cure, eager to be on the spot to take advantage of the season if it offered the opportunity of fresh conquests. In effect, the winter speedily became more severe, and gave tokens of proving the most rigorous that had occurred during the century. Already the Meuse and the Wahl were filled with floating masses of ice, and their margins congealed. On the 3d Nivose (23d December), the Meuse was firmly frozen, so as to bear the weight of cannon. General Walmoden, to whom the Duke of York had devolved the command upon his own departure for England, and whom he had thereby condemned to a series of humiliating disasters, found himself in a precarious position. The Meuse being frozen over, his front was exposed; and the Wahl being filled with ice, threatening to carry away the bridges, his retreat was endangered. He speedily learned that the bridge of Arnheim had been actually swept away, and he thereupon hastened to transfer his baggage and heavy cavalry to the rear, and in person directed a retreat on Deventer, on the banks of the Yssel. Pichegru, profiting by the opportunity which fortune presented to him of surmounting obstacles usually invincible, prepared to cross the Meuse on the ice. He proposed to pass it on three points, and to seize on the Isle of Bommel, whilst the division blockading Breda should attack the lines encompassing that place.

The French soldiers, braving the hardest winter of the century almost in a state of nudity, marching in shoes whereof the upper leather was all that remained, left their quarters with alacrity, and cheerfully renounced the repose they had scarcely begun to enjoy. On the 8th Nivose (28th December), in a cold of seventeen degrees, they pressed forward on three points—Crevecœur, Empel, and Fort Saint-André—traversed the ice with their artillery, surprised the Dutch, nearly benumbed by the cold, and completely routed them. Whilst they took possession of the Isle of Bommel, the division besieging Breda attacked and stormed the lines. The Dutch, assailed on all points, retrograded in disorder, one part towards the head-quarters of the Prince of Orange, who had always continued at Gorcum, the residue to Thiel. Such was the confusion of their retreat, that they even omitted to take measures for defending the passage of the Wahl, which was not entirely frozen over. Pichegru, master of the Isle of Bommel, which he had reached by passing the stream of the Meuse, now crossed the Wahl at sundry points, but refrained from adventuring beyond that river, as the ice was not sufficiently strong to bear cannon. In this state of affairs, the fate of Holland hung on the contingency of a thaw, whilst every thing announced the long duration of the frost. The Prince of Orange with his dispirited forces at Gorcum, and Walmoden with his English in full retreat on Deventer, could offer but a slender resistance to the progress of a formidable victor, who was much superior to them in strength, and had already succeeded in breaking the centre of their line.

The political situation of Holland was not less alarming than the military. The Dutch, full of joyful anticipations as they viewed the approach of the French, began to evince symptoms of disaffection. The Orange party was too weak to keep the republicans in check. Every where the enemies of the stadtholderate upbraided the reigning power with having abolished the liberties of the country, imprisoned or banished the best and most enlightened patriots, and, above all, sacrificed Holland to the English, by entangling her in an alliance opposed to all her commercial and maritime interests. They congregated secretly in revolutionary committees, ready to rise on the first signal, supersede the authorities, and nominate others of more popular tendencies. The province of Friesland, whose states were assembled at the time, ventured openly to declare an intention of separating from the stadtholder; and the citizens of Amsterdam presented an address to the authorities of the province, wherein they announced their determination to oppose all preparations for defence, and especially their fixed purpose not to suffer the dykes to be breached. In this threatening posture of affairs the stadtholder resolved to negotiate, and dispatched envoys to the head-quarters of Pichegru, in order to solicit a truce, and offer, as conditions of peace, neutrality and an indemnity for the expenses of the war. The French general and the representatives refused to grant a truce; and as to the offers of peace, they undertook to refer them to the committee of public welfare.

Spain, likewise, menaced by Dugommier, whom we left descending from the Pyrenees, and by Moncey, who, master of Guipuscoa, was advancing on Pampeluna, had made propositions of peace. The representatives sent into La Vendée to ascertain whether a pacification were possible, had reported in the affirmative, and urged a decree of amnesty. However guarded a government may be, negotiations of this nature invariably transpire; they transpire even under absolute and permanent ministers; how then could they remain secret under committees partially renewed every month? It was publicly known that Holland and Spain had submitted proposals; it was alleged, moreover, that Prussia, awakened from her delusion, and recognising the error she had committed in allying herself with the house of Austria, had intimated a desire to treat; and it was matter of notoriety, as published in all the journals of Europe, that at the diet of Ratisbon several states of the empire, wearied of a war which but slightly interested them, had demanded the opening of negotiations. All tended, therefore, to inspire ideas of peace; and as the violent principles of revolutionary terrorism had formerly yielded to sentiments of lenity, so in like manner did the passion for war now give way to an inclination for a general reconcilement with Europe. The most trifling circumstances, in this disposition of the public mind, were made the foundations of ingenious conjecture. The unfortunate children of Louis XVI., still surviving in the prison of the Temple, cut off from all their relatives, and separated from each other, had experienced some alleviation in their lot since the 9th Thermidor. The cordwainer Simon, the keeper of the young prince, had perished as an accomplice of Robespierre. In his place three guardians had been nominated, one of whom attended throughout each day, and these treated the prince with more consideration and humanity. Mighty consequences were held to be involved in these changes at the Temple. The inquiry instituted as to the means of withdrawing assignats from circulation, also gave rise to sundry inferences. The royalists, who already appeared avowedly, and whose numbers were swelled by the cohesion of those waverers who always desert a party when it begins to totter, propagated with malicious industry the rumour of approaching peace. No longer able to taunt the republicans as before with the cry, "Your armies will be beaten!" which had been repeated too often without success, and had become, in truth, too ridiculous to avail any longer, they wheeled into an entirely different strain, and addressed them in such language as the following:—"You are to be stopped in your course of victory; peace is signed; you will not get the Rhine for a frontier; the conditions of the peace will be the establishment of Louis XVII. on the throne, the return of the emigrants, the abolition of assignats, and the restitution of the national domains." Such assertions, it may be well conceived, were eminently adapted to exasperate the patriots. Already alarmed at the proceedings threatened against them, they were driven to absolute despair by the conviction, that the objects for which they had struggled so long and painfully were about to be sacrificed by the government. "For what do you destine the young Capet?" they asked. "What is your intention respecting the assignats? Have our armies shed so much blood only to be stopped in the midst of their victories? Are they not to enjoy the satisfaction of giving their country the barriers of the Rhine and the Alps? Europe proposed to dismember France: the just retribution of victorious France upon Europe is to conquer the provinces which complete her surface. What is projected for La Vendée? Are rebels to be pardoned when patriots are immolated?" "It were better," exclaimed a member of the Mountain, in a transport of indignation, "to be Charette than a deputy in the convention!"

Such subjects of discord, added to those arising from the domestic policy of the government, necessarily caused a great and increasing ferment in the public mind. The committee of public welfare, finding itself pressed between the two parties, deemed it incumbent to explain the views of the government. On two different occasions, once through the medium of Carnot, a second time through Merlin of Douay, it declared that the armies had received orders to pursue their triumphs, and to heed no propositions of peace until within the walls of the enemies' capitals.

The overtures of Holland, in fact, had seemed to it somewhat too-tardy, nor did it deem France bound to listen to negotiations when on the very point of subduing the country. Moreover, the overthrow of the stadtholderate and the restoration of the republic in Holland, appeared to it objects signally worthy the ambition of the French republic. True, the Dutch colonies, and even navy, would be exposed to the risk of falling into the power of the English, who would profess to seize them in the name of the stadtholder; but immediate political considerations outweighed those yet distant contingencies. France was irresistibly impelled to subvert the stadtholderate; besides, the conquest of Holland would add to the marvels of her late career in arms, tend still more to intimidate Europe, uncover the flanks of Prussia, compel that power to treat without further delay, and, above all, reassure the French patriots. Accordingly, Pichegru was ordered to tarry not an instant.

Neither Prussia nor the empire had as yet submitted any proposals, so that no reply was called for in either case. As to Spain, which promised to recognise the republic, and pay it indemnities, on condition that it assigned a small principality to Louis XVII. near the Pyrenees, her offers were heard with indignation and scorn, and orders forthwith given to the two French generals to advance with augmented celerity. With regard to Vendée, a decree of amnesty was passed, which imported that all the rebels, without distinction of rank, who should lay down their arms in the space of a month, would be free from molestation on account of their insurrection. General Canclaux, formerly superseded on the ground of moderatism, was replaced at the head of the army called of the West, which comprehended La Vendée. Young Hoche, already in command of the army on the coast of Brest, was intrusted in addition with that of the army on the coast of Cherbourg. No persons could have been selected more capable than these two generals of tranquillising the country by a happy combination of prudence and energy.

Pichegru, who had received positive injunctions to prosecute his victorious march, waited until the surface of the Wahl was firmly congealed. Meanwhile, his army skirted its banks, distributed towards Millingen and Nimeguen, and along the shore of the Isle of Bommel, whereof it held complete possession. Walmoden, observing that Pichegru had merely stationed a few advanced posts on the right bank opposite Bommel, drove them back, and commenced an offensive movement. He urged the Prince of Orange to join him, in order to form, with their united armies, an imposing mass, capable of contesting a battle with an enemy whom it was no longer possible to restrain by the barrier of rivers. The Prince of Orange, however, resolute in his purpose of not uncovering the route to Amsterdam, refused to quit Gorcum. Walmoden then determined to plant himself on his line of retreat, which he had traced in anticipation from the Wahl to the Linge, from the Linge to the Leck, from the Leck to the Yssel, by Thiel, Arnheim, and Deventer.

Whilst the republicans awaited the operation of the frost with the utmost impatience, the fortress of Grave, heroically defended by the commandant Debons, surrendered, almost in a heap of ruins. It was the principal of the strongholds possessed by the Dutch beyond the Meuse, and the only one which had not yielded to the ascendancy of the French arms. The French entered it on the 9th Nivose (29th December). At length, on the 19th Nivose (8th January 1795), the Wahl was solidly frozen. The division of Souham passed over from Bommel; the brigade of Dewinther, detached from the corps under Macdonald, traversed it near Thiel. At Nimeguen and above, the passage was not equally easy, because the Wahl was not wholly firm. Nevertheless, on the 21st (10th January), the right of the French crossed it above Nimeguen; and Macdonald, supported by that wing, effected the passage at Nimeguen in boats. On beholding this general movement, Walmoden and his army retrograded. A battle alone could have saved him the ignominy of retreat; but in the state of division and discouragement paralysing the allies, an engagement would have probably led to a more dismal disaster. Walmoden wheeled his front to the rear, and posted onwards to the line of the Yssel, in order to gain Hanover by the upper provinces. Thus conformably to the plan of retreat he had marked out for himself, he abandoned the provinces of Utrecht and Guelderland to the French. The Prince of Orange remained towards the sea, that is to say, at Gorcum. Giving up the case as desperate, he deserted his army, presented himself before the states assembled at the Hague, announced to them he had attempted all in his power for the defence of the country, and declared that nothing more could be done. He urged the representatives to offer no further resistance to the conqueror, in order to avert still greater calamities, and with this exhortation set sail for England.

From that moment, the advance of the invading army became the rush of a torrent. On the 28th Nivose (17th January), Salon's brigade entered Utrecht, and General Vandamme, Arnheim. The states of Holland resolved that all resistance to the French should cease, and commissioners be dispatched to open to them the fortresses they might deem requisite for their security. In every town, the secret committees previously formed manifested their organisation, annulled the established authorities, and spontaneously appointed others in their stead. The French were received with open arms, and as liberators; the food and raiment they so woefully lacked were brought to them with alacrity. At Amsterdam, where their arrival was impatiently expected, an extraordinary ferment reigned. The citizens, incensed against the Orangists, insisted that the garrison should evacuate the town, the regency lay down its authority, and the people be provided with arms. Pichegru, who was rapidly approaching, detached an aide-de-camp to exhort the municipal authorities to maintain tranquillity and prevent disturbances. At length, on the 1st of Pluviose (20th January), Pichegru, accompanied by the representatives Lacoste, Bellegarde, and Joubert, made his entry into Amsterdam. The inhabitants flocked to greet his advent, bearing in triumph the persecuted patriots, and rending the air with cries of "The French republic for ever! Long live Pichegru! Liberty for ever!" They could not sufficiently admire those intrepid men, who, half-naked, had defied the rigour of so unparalleled a winter, and achieved such brilliant actions. The French soldiers gave, on this occasion, an admirable example of order and discipline. Hungry, and scantily clad, exposed to a pitiless storm of snow and hail, in the heart of one of the richest capitals of Europe, they waited patiently for several hours, around their arms, piled in pyramids, until the magistrates had provided for their nourishment and distribution. Whilst the republicans had marched into the city on one side, the Orangists and French emigrants had disappeared by the opposite extremity. The sea was covered with vessels bearing from the shore fugitives and property of every description.

On the same day, 1st Pluviose, Bonnaud's division, which had on the eve captured Gertruydenberg, traversed the frozen Biesbos and entered the town of Dordrecht, where it found six hundred pieces of ordnance, ten thousand muskets, and magazines of provisions and ammunition for an army of 30,000 men. This division subsequently passed through Rotterdam on its way to occupy the Hague, where the states were in session. Thus, the right towards the Yssel, the centre towards Amsterdam, and the left towards the Hague, were successively advancing to the conquest of all the Netherland provinces. Already extraordinary as an operation of war, it was invested with the character of marvellous by a final stroke. A portion of the Dutch fleet lay at anchor near the Texel. Pichegru, unwilling to allow it time to break through the ice and make sail for England, detached some divisions of cavalry and several batteries of light artillery towards Nord-Holland. The Zuyder-Zee was frozen, and the French squadrons scoured at a gallop its icy plain, when the singular spectacle was exhibited of hussars and horse-artillerymen summoning ships of war, embedded in the frozen mass, like a fortified town. The Dutch vessels promptly struck their flags to these novel assailants.

On the left, the only province yet unoccupied was that of Zealand, which is composed of islands placed at the mouths of the Scheldt and the Meuse; and on the right there remained to subjugate the provinces of Over-Yssel, Drenthe, Friesland, and Groningen, which join Holland to Hanover. The province of Zealand, strong in its inaccessible position, proposed a somewhat haughty capitulation, by which it stipulated that garrisons should not be placed in its principal towns; that it should not be subjected to contributions, or be compelled to receive assignats; that its vessels and public and private property should be guaranteed; in a word, that it should undergo none of the inconveniences of war. It likewise demanded, on behalf of the French emigrants, license to depart in peace and safety. The representatives acceded to some of the articles of the capitulation, and abstained from contracting any engagement as to the others, saying they must refer them to the committee of public welfare; and without further explanations they entered the province, happy to avert the dangers of a hostile attack, and to secure the fleet, which might otherwise have been delivered to England. Whilst affairs were thus progressing on the left, the right, crossing the Yssel, drove the English before it and chased them beyond the Ems. The provinces of Friesland, Drenthe, and Groningen, were thus subdued, and the seven United Provinces lay at the mercy of the victorious republic.

This conquest, due to the season, the indefatigable courage of the French soldiers, and their capacity to withstand accumulated sufferings, much more than to the ability of the generals, excited in Europe an astonishment mingled with dread, and in France a boundless exultation. Carnot, having directed the operations of the armies during the campaign in the Low Countries, was the principal and veritable author of the successes. Pichegru, and especially Jourdan, had admirably seconded his views throughout that series of sanguinary conflicts. But after the army had proceeded from Belgium into Holland, all was owing to the soldiers and the frost. Nevertheless, Pichegru, generalissimo of the forces, monopolised the glory of this miraculous conquest, and his name, borne on the wings of fame, circulated through all Europe as that of the greatest French captain.

It was not sufficient, however, to have conquered Holland; the equally difficult task remained to exhibit prudence and policy in its treatment. The first great point was to protect the country from excesses, in order not to indispose the population. Next in importance was the political direction to be impressed on Holland; and here two contrary opinions were to be considered. One party maintained that the conquest should be rendered advantageous to the cause of liberty, by revolutionising Holland; another held that too marked a spirit of proselytism should not be manifested, in order to avoid giving fresh umbrage to Europe, now ready to seal a reconciliation with France.

The earliest care of the representatives was to publish a proclamation, wherein they declared that all private property should be held sacred, excepting that of the stadtholder; that he, the said stadtholder, being the only enemy of the French Republic, his possessions were confiscated to the victors, in satisfaction of the expenses of the war; and that the French had come, as the friends of the Batavian nation, not to impose upon it any creed or form of government whatsoever, but to free it from oppressors, and restore to it the means of expressing its wishes. This proclamation, accompanied by corresponding acts, produced a most favourable impression. The authorities were every where renewed in the French interest. In the states-general, certain members were excluded who owed their introduction solely to the stadtholder's influence; and Peter Paulus, minister of the marine before the overthrow of the republican party in 1787, a man of distinguished talents and strongly attached to his country, was elected president. That assembly likewise abolished the stadtholderate for ever, and proclaimed the sovereignty of the people. These resolutions were formally communicated to the representatives by a deputation of the states, as an acceptable homage to their principles. The assembly subsequently proceeded to frame a constitution, and meanwhile confided the administration of the country to a provisional government. Of the eighty or ninety vessels composing the naval force of Holland, fifty were found to have remained in the harbours, and were saved to the Batavian republic; the residue had been seized by the English. The Dutch army, dispersed since the departure of the Prince of Orange, was appointed to be reorganised upon a different principle, under the orders of General Daendels. Amongst other subjects of interest demanding immediate notice, the affairs of the famous Bank of Amsterdam were investigated, and the mystery in which they had been long enveloped finally dispelled. Whether it had continued solely as a bank of deposit, or had become a bank of discount by affording loans to the East India Company, to the government, and to the provinces, were questions which had long occupied attention, and materially affected the credit of the institution. It was ascertained that it had lent, to the extent of eight or ten millions of florins, on obligations of the East India Company, the Chamber of Debits, the province of Friesland, and the city of Amsterdam. This involved a violation of its charter. At the same time, it was alleged that no real deficit existed, because those obligations represented assured funds. But that the engagements incurred by the bank could be all redeemed in full, depended of course on the solvency of the company, the Chamber of Debits, and the government.

In the interim, whilst the Dutch were engaged in regulating the state of their country, the wants of the destitute French army demanded relief. The representatives addressed a requisition to the provisional government, for cloth, shoes, raiment of all kind, provisions, and munitions, which it undertook to satisfy. This requisition, without being excessive, was sufficient to equip and victual the army. The Dutch government invited the different towns to furnish their respective proportions of this requisition, saying to them with reason that a cheerful acquiescence was due to a generous conqueror, who asked instead of taking, and whose demands were confined within the strict limits of his exigencies. The towns evinced a cordial alacrity in responding to this appeal, and the objects included in the requisition were punctually provided. An arrangement was subsequently concluded touching the circulation of assignats. As the soldiers received their pay in paper alone, it was necessary to make that paper current as money to enable them to discharge such liabilities as they might incur. The Dutch government framed an ordinance on the subject. The shopkeepers and petty dealers were enjoined to accept assignats from the French soldiers, at the rate of nine sous per franc, and to refrain from selling to any one soldier goods to the value of more than ten francs. At the close of each week they were to appear before the municipal authorities, who would retire the assignats at the rate they had taken them in exchange. Owing to these arrangements, the army, which had undergone such lengthened privations, at last found itself amidst abundance, and began to taste the fruit of its victories.

The triumph of France, so complete and astonishing in Holland, was not less signal in Spain. There, the climate, from its mildness, had not obstructed the operations of the army. Dugommier, quitting the Upper Pyrenees, had moved in presence of the hostile lines, and attacked on three points the long chain of positions occupied by General La Union. The gallant leader of the French, Dugommier, was killed by a cannon-ball in the central onslaught. The left wing failed to make any impression; but the right, thanks to the bravery and energy of Augereau, obtained a complete victory. The command-in-chief was conferred on Perignon, who resumed the attack on the 30th Brumaire (20th November), and gained a decisive advantage. The enemy fled in disorder, and abandoned to the French the intrenched camp of Figueras. Consternation seized on the Spaniards; the commandant of Figueras threw open the gates of that town on the 9th Frimaire, and the French entered into possession of one of the finest fortifications in Europe. Such was their position in Catalonia. Towards the Western Pyrenees, they had taken Fontarabia, Saint-Sebastian, and Tolosa, and occupied the whole province of Guipuscoa. Moncey, who succeeded General Muller, had cleared the mountains and advanced even to the gates of Pampeluna. However, deeming his situation too hazardous, he had retraced his steps, and, resting on more secure positions, awaited the return of spring to penetrate into the Castilles.

The winter, therefore, had not been allowed to retard the progress of this immortal campaign, and it only now finally closed amidst the stormy and inclement weather of Pluviose. If the auspicious campaign of 1793 had saved France from the horrors of invasion by the deblockades of Dunkirk, Maubeuge, and Landau, that of 1794 crowned her with the laurel of a conqueror, by subjugating to her sway Belgium, Holland, the districts comprised between the Meuse and the Rhine, the Palatinate, the great barrier of the Alps, the line of the Pyrenees, and several places in Catalonia and Biscay. Hereafter, doubtless, we shall witness still greater marvels; but these two campaigns will hold their place in history as the most decidedly national, legitimate, and honourable, ever undertaken by France.

The coalition could not bear up against such rude and numerous shocks. The English cabinet alone, which, by the aid of the incompetent Duke of York, had merely lost the territories of its allies, and, under pretext of recovering those of the stadtholder, had acquired forty or fifty ships of war, and projected the appropriation, under the like pretence, of the Dutch colonies, could have no urgent reasons for terminating the war; on the contrary, it trembled at the prospect of its conclusion by the rupture of the coalition. But Prussia, which beheld the French on the banks of the Rhine and the Ems, and saw the torrent ready to sweep into her own confines, no longer hesitated. She forthwith dispatched an envoy to Pichegru's head-quarters, empowered to conclude a truce and undertake to open immediate negotiations for peace. The place selected for the conference was Basle, where the French republic maintained an agent who had gained the esteem and consideration of the Swiss by his talents and moderation. The reason alleged for choosing this locality was, that the negotiations might be there conducted with greater secrecy and tranquillity than at Paris, where too many passions still fermented, and foreign intrigues were in dangerous activity: but this was not the real motive. Even whilst making overtures of peace to that republic which she had vowed to annihilate by a single march, Prussia wished to dissemble the confession of her defeat, and preferred seeking peace in a neutral land rather than visit Paris in the character of a suppliant. The committee of public welfare, less arrogant than its predecessor, and feeling withal the importance of detaching Prussia from the coalition, consented to invest its agent at Basle with the requisite powers to treat. Prussia accredited the Baron von Goltz, and the powers were exchanged at Basle on the 3d of Pluviose, year 3 (22d January 1795).

The empire was equally desirous of withdrawing from the coalition as Prussia. The majority of its members, incapable of furnishing the quintuple contingent, and the subsidies voted under the influence of Austria, had been fruitlessly urged, during the whole campaign, to fulfil their engagements. Excepting those who had possessions compromised beyond the Rhine, and who were well aware that France would not restore them unless wrung by force, all wished for peace. Bavaria, Sweden for the duchy of Holstein,* the Elector of Mayence, and several other states of the empire, had maintained in the diet that it was time to put an end, by an acceptable peace, to a ruinous war; that the German empire had engaged in hostilities solely to maintain the stipulations of 1648, and to defend such of the states as adjoined Alsace and Lorraine; that it contemplated its integrity, not its aggrandisement; that its purpose never had been or could be to interfere in the internal government of France; that this conciliatory declaration ought to be published with all promptitude, in order to terminate the evils which afflicted humanity; and that Sweden, as the guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia in 1648, and fortunately a neutral power amidst the universal warfare, might undertake the office of mediator. The majority of the votes had acquiesced in these views. The Elector of Treves, denuded of his territories, and the imperial envoy for Bohemia and Austria, had alone upheld the doctrine that, however desirable peace might be, it was not possible with a country devoid of a government. Eventually, on the 25th December, the diet had promulgated a provisional conclusum favourable to peace, reserving the question of from whom the proposition should emanate. The conclusum in substance set forth that, although making preparations for a fresh campaign, overtures of peace ought, notwithstanding, to be encouraged; and that no doubt France, touched with the evils of humanity, and convinced that no idea of interfering in our internal affairs was entertained, would consent to conditions honourable to both parties.

Thus, many who had committed egregious errors sought to repair them, if there were yet time. But Austria, however exhausted by her efforts, had lost too much in losing the Low Countries to think of laying down her arms. Spain would have willingly receded, but, entangled in the meshes of English intrigue, and moved by a false pride to uphold the cause of the French emigrants, she could not yet summon resolution to solicit peace.

The despondency into which the foreign enemies of the republic had fallen, crept also upon its domestic foes. The Vendéans, distracted and exhausted, were not far distant from peace; to fix their determination, it only needed to be adroitly offered them, and with such evidences as might convince them it was sincerely intended. The forces of Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette, were greatly reduced. By constraint alone were they able to make their peasants march; wearied of carnage, and ruined by the devastations, they would gladly have abandoned so horrible a warfare. Entirely devoted to the chiefs there only remained the men of a purely enterprising character—smugglers, deserters, poachers—to whom conflicts and pillage had become habitual cravings, and the labours of agriculture tiresome and distasteful: but these were few in number. They composed the chosen troop, which was constantly under arms, but altogether insufficient to make head against the republicans. It was with the utmost difficulty the more industrious peasants could be dragged from their fields on days set apart for expeditions. Thus the three Vendéan chiefs were almost devoid of forces. To increase their forlorn condition, discord fell amongst them. We remember that Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette, had concluded a compact at Jalais, which proved a mere postponement of their rivalry and dissension. Stofflet, instigated by the ambitious Abbé Bernier, had speedily manifested an intention of organising his army separately, and of establishing finances, an administration—all, in short, that constitutes a regular authority; and, in furtherance of his object, he commenced to fabricate a paper currency. Charette, who viewed Stofflet with a jealous eye, strongly opposed his designs. Seconded by Sapinaud, whom he swayed, he required Stofflet to renounce his scheme, and to appear before the general council instituted by the convention of Jalais. Stofflet declined to answer, whereupon Charette declared the convention of Jalais annulled. This was tantamount to a repudiation of his title to exercise command, for at Jalais they had mutually acknowledged their respective claims. The rupture, consequently, was complete, and all hope of redeeming their cause by union and concord at an end. It seems strange that, notwithstanding the royalist agents in Paris had instructions to open a correspondence with Charette, and forward to him letters from the regent, no communication had yet reached that chief.

The division of Scépeaux, between the Loire and the Vilaine, presented a like desolate spectacle. In Brittany, however, energy was less relaxed: a prolonged, interminable war had not occurred to depress and wear out the inhabitants. The Chouans pursued a lucrative occupation as banditti, and one by no means severe or fatiguing to those engaged in it; besides, a single chief, of almost unequalled perseverance, was always at hand to rekindle ardour when ready to droop. But this chief, who, as we have mentioned, was only tarrying until he had completed the organisation of Brittany, had recently proceeded to London, for the purpose of holding direct communication with the English cabinet and the French princes. Puisaye had appointed one Sieur Desotteux, calling himself Baron de Cormatin, to succeed him in the central committee, under the designation of major-general. Emigrants, so abundant in the courts of Europe, were very scarce in La Vendée, Brittany, and whereever civil war raged with its dangers and horrors. They affected great disdain for this species of service, and called it Chouannising. On this account the selection was limited, and Puisaye had pitched upon this adventurer, who had lately assumed the title of Baron de Cormatin, because his wife had inherited a small lordship in Burgundy of that name. He had in his chequered life figured alternately as a hot-brained revolutionist, an officer of Bouillé, a knight of the dagger, and, finally, an emigrant, and in every capacity striving to play a part. He was an arrant blusterer,* speaking and gesticulating with extraordinary vivacity, and capable of the most sudden transformations. Such was the man whom Puisaye, without sufficiently fathoming, left behind him in Brittany.

Puisaye had taken care to arrange a correspondence through the island of Jersey; but his absence was protracted, his letters frequently miscarried; Cormatin was utterly incapable of supplying his place and sustaining partisan courage; the chiefs grew impatient or disheartened, and they found rancour and animosity, calmed by the clemency of the convention. vanishing amongst their followers, and the elements of civil war dissolving. The approach of such a general as Hoche was little calculated to encourage them. From all these causes, it resulted that Brittany, though less exhausted than La Vendée, was equally disposed to accept a peace dexterously propounded.

Canclaux and Hoche were both eminently adapted to promote that desirable end. Canclaux, as recorded at the time, had been engaged in the first Vendéan war, and had left in the country a high reputation for moderation and ability. The army now placed under his command was considerably weakened by the reinforcements continually drafted for the Pyrenees and the Rhine, and moreover deplorably disorganised by so long a sojourn in the same locality. As an invariable sequence in civil wars, insubordination had gained ground, and thence had ensued pillage, debauchery, drunkenness, disease. It was the second relapse of that army since the commencement of this fatal war. Of 46,000 men composing it, 15,000 or 18,000 were in hospital; the 30,000 remaining were badly armed, and the moiety garrisoned the towns: consequently, 15,000 were at the utmost disposable. Canclaux procured an augmentation of 20,000 men—14,000 drawn from the army of Brest and 6000 from that of Cherbourg. By the aid of this reinforcement, he doubled all the posts, retook the camp of Sorinières near Nantes, recently stormed by Charette, and moved in force on the Layon, which formed the defensive line of Stofflet in Upper Anjou. After having taken this imposing attitude, he disseminated in profusion copies of the decrees and the proclamation of the convention, and dispatched emissaries over all the land.

Hoche, accustomed to war on a grand scale, and endowed with superior qualifications to conduct it, saw himself, with an emotion of despair, condemned to a civil war, inspiring no generous impulses, presenting no grand combinations, offering no glory. He had at first solicited to be relieved; but he had soon resigned himself to serve his country in a post at once repugnant to his feelings and too obscure for his talents. He was to be rewarded for this resignation by finding, on the very theatre he desired to quit, an opportunity of displaying the qualities of a statesman as well as those of a general. His army was extremely enfeebled by the reinforcements sent to Canclaux; he had scarcely forty thousand men, in defective organisation, to guard a broken, mountainous, and woody country, with more than three hundred and fifty leagues of coast from Cherbourg to Brest. He was promised twelve thousand auxiliaries drawn from the department of the North. He entreated, above all things, the assistance of soldiers inured to discipline; and forthwith applied himself to redeem his own from habits contracted in the infectious atmosphere of civil war. "We must," said he, "put at the head of our columns only disciplined men, who can show themselves moderate as valiant, and be mediators as well as soldiers." He distributed his troops into a multitude of small camps, and exhorted them to range abroad in bands of forty and fifty, seek to obtain a knowledge of localities, habituate themselves to a war of surprises, and contend in artifice with the Chouans; converse with the peasants, associate with them, encourage and cheer them, and gain their good will, if possible their co-operation. "Let us never forget," he wrote to his officers, "that policy must have a great share in this war. Let us employ alternately humanity, probity, virtue, force, guile; and always the dignity befitting republicans." In a short time he had imparted to that army an entirely different aspect and attitude; the order indispensable to his views of pacification was re-established amongst its hitherto disorderly members. Blending towards his soldiers indulgence with severity, he wrote to one of his lieutenants, who complained too virulently of certain bacchanalian excesses, in the following happy strain:—"Ha! my friend, if soldiers were philosophers, they would take care not to fight! Let us correct drunkards, however, if intoxication causes them to neglect their duty." He had formed most just ideas on the country and the mode of pacifying it. "Priests are a necessary want to these peasants," he indited; "then let them have them, since they wish it. Many have undergone much hardship, and sigh for a return to peaceful husbandry; let them have assistance to put their farms in order. As to those who have become fit for nothing but war, it would be inconsiderate to return them to the country; they would disturb it by their idle and restless habits. These ought to be formed into legions, and enrolled in the armies of the republic. They will make excellent soldiers for advanced guards; and their hatred of the coalition, for affording them no succour, assures us of their fidelity. Besides, what does cause signify to them? War is what they want. Remember," he added, "the bands of Du Guesclin marching to dethrone Peter the Cruel, and the regiment levied by Villars in the Cevennes." Such was the young general selected to tranquillise those unfortunate districts.

The decrees of the convention abundantly circulated in La Vendée and Brittany, the liberation of the suspected both at Nantes and at Rennes, the pardon granted to Madame de Bonchamps, who was saved by a decree after sentence of death had been passed upon her, the revocation of all condemnations not executed, the freedom allowed to the exercise of religious worship, the injunctions against injuring churches, the enlargement of the priests, the punishment of Carrier and his accomplices—all these causes, operating conjointly, began to produce the effects in the two provinces which were expected from them, and to dispose the minds of all to embrace the benefits of the general amnesty extended to both chiefs and followers. The intense hatred so long fomented gradually subsided, and with it the courage to bear up against the accumulated evils desolating the land. The representatives on mission at Nantes held interviews with the sister of Charette, and through her agency succeeded in forwarding him a copy of the decree of the convention. He was at this moment reduced to extremity. Albeit gifted with unparalleled obstinacy, some hope was necessary to lure him onwards, and not a ray gleamed from any quarter to cheer his path. The court of Verona, where his name was mentioned in such terms of admiration, as we have heretofore intimated, abstained, nevertheless, from taking any active steps in his behalf. The regent indeed had written him a letter, wherein he nominated him lieutenant-general, and styled him the second founder of the monarchy. But, intrusted to the agents at Paris, this letter, which would have served at all events to gratify his vanity, had never reached him. He had for the first time craved succours from England, and dispatched his young aide-de-camp, La Roberie, to London; but he had heard no tidings of him since his departure. Thus, not a word of recompense or encouragement was vouchsafed him, either from the princes in whose cause he had been so long battling or from the powers whose views he had assisted. He accordingly consented to an interview with Canclaux and the representatives of the people.

At Rennes the desired reconciliation was likewise promoted by a sister of one of the chiefs. Botidoux, one of the principal Chouans of Morbihan, having learnt that his sister, who was at Rennes, had been thrown into prison on his account, was induced to repair thither with the view of obtaining her liberation. The representative Boursault restored him his sister, and otherwise treated him with marked consideration: he succeeded in dispelling the jealous chieftain's doubts as to the intention of the government, and in convincing him of the sincerity wherewith the decree of amnesty had been promulgated. Botidoux undertook to write to Bois-Hardi, a young intrepid Chouan, who commanded the division on the Côtes-du-Nord, and enjoyed the reputation of being the most formidable of the rebels. He consequently addressed him in these terms:—"What are your anticipations? The republican armies are in possession of the Rhine. Prussia solicits peace. You cannot rely on the word of England; you cannot rely on chiefs who merely send you letters from beyond sea, or who have deserted you under pretext of going in quest of succours: for the future you can only carry on a war of assassinations." Bois-Hardi, startled by this letter, and unable to quit the coasts of the North, where active hostilities still required his presence, besought the central committee to visit his quarters, for the purpose of agreeing upon an answer to Botidoux. The committee, with Cormatin as major-general at its head, consented, and accordingly removed to the vicinity of Bois-Hardi.

There was at this time a young general in the republican army, bold, hardy, full of natural readiness, and, above all, of that finesse which is said to be peculiar to the profession he had formerly followed, that of a pimp, by name General Humbert. "He was of the number of those," says Puisaye, "who have only too well proved that one year's practice in war is more than equivalent to all the trainings of the esplanade." He composed a letter, the style and orthography whereof were reprobated before the committee of public welfare, but which was well suited to captivate such men as Bois-Hardi and Cormatin. These parties had a conference. Bois-Hardi displayed the frank acquiescence of a young warrior, devoid of malice or animosity, and inspirited to arms by natural temperament rather than fanaticism; nevertheless, he came under no distinct pledges, and allowed Cormatin to bear the principal part in the interview. The latter, with his habitual instability, flattered at being called to treat with the generals of the puissant French republic, acceded to all the overtures of Humbert, and demanded to be put in communication with the generalissimos Hoche and Canclaux, and with the representatives. Interviews were arranged, the days and places fixed. The central committee reproached Cormatin with evincing over-eagerness. He, joining duplicity to unsteadiness, assured the committee he would not betray its cause; that in holding a conference, he was actuated solely by a desire to observe their common enemies more narrowly, and to judge of their strength and dispositions. He moreover alleged two reasons of great importance, as he represented them. In the first place, they in Brittany had never seen Charette, or been enabled to concert measures with him; in obtaining a meeting with him, under pretext of rendering the negotiation common to La Vendée and Brittany, he would have an opportunity of apprising him of Puisaye's projects, and inducing him to concur in them. Secondly, Puisaye, the companion in boyhood of Canclaux, had written him a letter calculated to have considerable effect upon his mind, and containing the most brilliant offers to gain him over to the cause of the monarchy; this letter Cormatin, under pretence of seeking an interview, would forward to Canclaux, and thus promote the views of Puisaye. In this manner, affecting the part of a skilful diplomatist with his colleagues, Cormatin obtained authority to open a feigned negotiation with the republicans, in order to concert with Charette and seduce Canclaux. He wrote to Puisaye in this vein, and departed upon his mission, full of the most conflicting cogitations; now buoyed with the conceit of deceiving the republicans, intriguing before their eyes, and robbing them of a general; anon inflated with the idea of becoming the mediator between the insurgents and the representatives of the republic; and fitted, amidst this mental bewilderment, to be himself the dupe endeavouring to dupe others. He saw Hoche, and first of all demanded from him a temporary truce, and subsequently permission to visit all the Chouan chiefs in succession, with the view of diffusing pacific sentiments amongst them; and to confer with Canclaux, and especially Charette, in order that he and the latter might act together, as the Bretons would not separate from the Vendéans. Hoche and the representatives granted all his requests; but they gave him Humbert as an associate, to be present at his various interviews. Cormatin, at the summit of his hopes, wrote to the central committee and to Puisaye that his artifices were succeeding; that the republicans were his dupes; that he was starting to confirm the Chouans in their fidelity, explain affairs to Charette, urge him merely to temporise until the grand expedition was prepared, and finally debauch Canclaux. He then set out upon his journey through Brittany, visiting the chiefs in all directions, and astonishing them by exhortations to peace, and by the intimation of this unexpected truce. Unable to comprehend the nicety of his subterfuge, the majority were discouraged and perplexed. The cessation of hostilities that ensued, introduced a love of repose and peace; and, without his intending it, Cormatin materially advanced the pacification. He himself began to incline towards that consummation; and, whilst intent on deceiving the republicans, it chanced that the republicans unconsciously entrapped him.

Meanwhile, a day and place had been fixed for an interview, by Charette. It was to take place near Nantes. Cormatin agreed to repair thither and commence the negotiations. He, becoming daily more entangled in engagements with the republicans, favoured the central committee more rarely with his communications, and the committee, seeing the turn affairs were about to take, wrote a pressing letter to Puisaye, in Nivose, thus couched:—"Return with all speed. Courage is shaken; the republicans are seducing the chiefs. You must come, were it only with twelve thousand men, together with a supply of money, priests, and emigrants. Be here before the end of January (Pluviose)." Thus, whilst the emigrants and foreign powers were building such sanguine hopes on Charette and on Brittany, a negotiation was on the point of tranquillising the two disturbed districts. In Pluviose (January-February), therefore, the republic had opened conferences at Basle with one of the principal members of the coalition, and at Nantes with the royalists who had hitherto denied and combated it.

CHAPTER XL.

REOPENING OF THE THEATRES AND LEARNED SOCIETIES.—ESTABLISHMENT OF SCHOOLS.—DECREES RELATIVE TO COMMERCE, &C.—SCARCITY OF PROVISIONS.—ABOLITION OF THE MAXIMUM AND REQUISITIONS.—REINSTATEMENT OF THE GIRONDIST DEPUTIES.—TUMULTS OCCASIONED BY THE DEARTH.—INSURRECTION OF THE 12TH GERMINAL.—BANISHMENT OF BARRERE, COLLOT-D'HERBOIS, AND BILLAUD-VARENNES.—ARREST OF SEVERAL MOUNTAINEER DEPUTIES.—DISARMING OF THE PATRIOTS.

THE Jacobins were dispersed, the principal agents or leaders of the revolutionary government impeached, Carrier put to death, and several other deputies assailed on account of their missions; moreover, Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, Barrère, and Vadier, were placed under detention, and destined to be speedily arraigned before the tribunal of their colleagues. But whilst France thus sought vengeance upon the men who had exacted from her many painful efforts and condemned her to pass through so terrible an ordeal, she returned with ecstasy to the arts, pursuits, and recreations of civilisation, from which those men had for a time debarred her. We have already seen with what zest preparations were made to enjoy the winter, with what singular and novel taste the women had arrayed themselves, with what eagerness they crowded to the concerts in the Rue Feydeau. Now all the theatres were reopened. The performers of the Comédie Française had been released from prison; Larive, Saint-Pris, Dazincourt, Saint-Phal, Mesdemoiselles Contat and Devienne, had reappeared on the stage. The population flocked to the theatres as if impelled by a mania. All the passages bearing the remotest allusion to terror were vociferously applauded; the air of the Reveil du Peuple was chanted at intervals, and the Marseillais altogether proscribed. In the boxes appeared the beauties of the hour—the wives or friends of the Thermidorians; in the pit "the gilded youth" seemed by their mirth, their attire, and their appreciation, to shame by contrast those sanguinary and uncouth terrorists, who, they alleged, had designed to destroy all civilisation. Balls were attended with the same ardour. One was held where none gained admittance who had not lost a relative in the revolution: it was called the ball of the victims The public buildings consecrated to the arts were likewise reopened. The convention, actuated by great ideas as well as passions, had ordained the formation of a museum, in which were collected not only the pictures already possessed by France, but those also gained by conquest. The masterpieces of the Flemish school, acquired in Belgium, had been transferred to its walls. The Lyceum, in which La Harpe had but recently extolled philosophy and liberty in the red cap—the Lyceum, closed during the reign of terror, was restored to the public through the liberality of the convention, which had voted a contribution to the charges of the establishment, and distributed some hundreds of tickets amongst the young people of each section. There La Harpe was now heard declaiming against anarchy, terror, the degradation of the French language, philosophism, and all that he had formerly vaunted, before the liberty, which he had celebrated without understanding, had terrified his petty mind. The convention also granted pensions to most of the literary and scientific men of the day, without distinction of political principles. It had already decreed the institution of primary schools, wherein the people were to be taught the elements of language spoken and written, the rules of arithmetic, the rudiments of mensuration, and practical ideas upon the principal phenomena of nature; likewise of central schools, intended for higher classes, where youths were to be instructed in mathematics, natural philosophy, chemistry, natural history, botany, mechanics, the art of design, polite literature, the ancient languages, the living tongues most appropriate to the position of localities, general grammar, logic and analysis, history, political economy, the principles of legislation, all in the order best adapted to develop the minds of the pupils; also of a normal school, wherein young professors were to be trained, under the most celebrated literary and scientific characters, and subsequently distributed through France, to diffuse the knowledge acquired in this focus of intelligence; and, lastly, of special schools for medicine, law, and veterinary science.

Besides this vast system of education, destined to disseminate that civilisation which the revolution was so unjustly accused of having banished, the convention offered encouragements to works of all kinds. The establishment of various manufactures was decreed. National domains at Besançon were conferred upon certain Swiss, expatriated by domestic broils, with the view of forming there a clock and watch manufactory. The convention furthermore instructed its committees to digest plans for canals and banks, and a system of advances to certain provinces devastated by the war. It modified sundry laws injurious to agriculture and commerce. A great number of cultivators and artisans had quitted Alsace, when it was evacuated by Wurmser, Lyons during its siege, and the whole south, at the time of the crusade against federalism. These the convention distinguished from emigrants, and passed a decree whereby the peasants and artisans, who had left France since the 1st of May 1793, and were disposed to return before the 1st of Germinal, should not be considered as emigrants. The law of the suspected, the repeal of which had been often urged, was maintained; but it was no longer formidable except to the patriots, who had become the suspected of the era. The revolutionary tribunal was entirely reconstructed, and placed on the footing of the ordinary criminal courts, having judges, jurymen, and advocates. It was not permitted to decide upon written documents and without hearing witnesses. The law allowing silence to be imposed on prisoners, which had been enacted against Danton, was rescinded. The district administrations were henceforth to cease being permanent, excepting in towns of above fifty thousand souls. Finally, the important subject of religion was regulated by a new law. This ordinance recited that, by virtue of the declaration of rights, all creeds were free; but it announced at the same time that the state subsidised none, and forbade all public celebration of rites. Each sect was at liberty to build or hire edifices, and solemnise the services of its religion in the interior of such edifices. As a substitute for the ancient ceremonies of the Catholic faith and for those of Reason, a plan of decadal festivals was devised. It combined music, dancing, and moral exhortations, so as to render the amusements of the people profitable, and leave impressions upon their minds at once beneficial and agreeable. Thus relieved from the absorbing care of defending itself, the revolution discarded the violent forms it had assumed under the pressure of danger, and reverted to its veritable mission, that of encouraging arts, industry, enlightenment, and civilisation.

But whilst the convention was busied in abrogating harsh and cruel laws, and the upper classes were again taking consistence and eagerly treading the paths of pleasure, the lower classes were suffering from a dreadful scarcity, and from an intense cold almost unknown in these latitudes. The winter of the year 3, which had permitted the French to traverse as on dry land the rivers and seas of Holland, revenged that conquest, as it were, by subjecting both the town and rural population to terrible hardships. It was, without doubt, the most rigorous that had occurred during the century, far exceeding that which preceded the opening of the states-general in 1789. Provisions were deficient from various causes. The principal was the insufficiency of the harvest. Although the crops had promised to yield abundantly, a long drought and subsequent dampness had blighted expectation. The thrashing had also been neglected, as in previous years, both from a want of hands and from the unwillingness of the farmers. The assignats falling almost continually, and having at this period sunk to the tenth of their nominal value, the maximum had become proportionably more oppressive, and the repugnance to obey it, the efforts to evade it, grew daily greater. The farmers universally delivered false declarations, and were supported in their prevarications by the municipalities, which, as we are aware, had been all recently renewed. Being now generally composed of moderate men, they complacently winked at infractions of the revolutionary laws; whereby, the springs of authority being relaxed, and the government ceasing to inspire terror, the requisitions for the supply of armies and large towns were no longer heeded. Accordingly, that extraordinary system of drawing supplies, devised as a substitute for the natural operations of trade, was effectually disorganised before trade had resumed its usual channels. The scarcity thence resulting was most sensibly felt in the larger towns, which are at such times difficult to provision. Paris, in particular, was threatened with a famine more inveterate than any that had excited apprehensions during the course of the revolution. With general causes were combined others purely local. By the suppression of the commune, attainted of conspiracy on the 9th Thermidor, the care of alimenting Paris had devolved on the commission for trade and supplies; which change was productive of interruption in the services. Orders had been issued tardily, and then precipitately and without circumspection. The means of carriage lacked deplorably; the horses had all been absorbed; and thus, besides the difficulty of collecting sufficient quantities of corn, there was the equally arduous undertaking of conveying them to Paris. Delays, pillages on the routes, all the unavoidable contingencies of scarcities, foiled the exertions of the commission. Nor was the dearth of food the only evil; the want of fuel entailed equal misery. The canal of Briare had been dry during the whole summer. No coals had arrived, and the charcoal had been all consumed in domestic purposes. The orders to fell timber had been given late in the season, and the contractors for floating wood, molested and harassed by the local authorities, were completely discouraged. Coals and wood, therefore, were deficient; and in this rugged winter, a scarcity of fuel was scarcely less calamitous than one of food.

Thus, fearful distress amongst the lower classes contrasted unhappily with the enjoyments to which the upper classes abandoned themselves. The revolutionists, exasperated against the government, followed the example of all beaten parties, and used the public misfortunes as so many grounds of invective against the actual leaders of the state. They even contributed to aggravate those calamities by thwarting the orders of the administration. "Avoid sending your corn to Paris," they said to the farmers; "the government is counter-revolutionary; it is bringing back the emigrants; it refuses to put the constitution in force; it leaves the grain to moulder in the magazines of the commission for trade; it wishes to starve the people, so as to compel them to throw themselves into the arms of royalty." By such exhortations they induced the holders of grain to keep it back. They quitted the towns in which they had usually resided for the larger cities, where they were unknown and beyond the reach of those they had persecuted, and there instigated commotions. At Marseilles, they had recently subjected the representatives to outrages, and obliged them to suspend the proceedings instituted against the alleged accomplices of the system of terror. It had even been found necessary to declare the city in a state of siege. At Paris, especially, they congregated in great numbers, and manifested the utmost turbulence. They inveighed perpetually on the same topic—the distress of the people, and drew comparisons between it and the luxury of the new leaders of the convention. Madame Tallien was the female of the day whom they chiefly assailed, for at all periods one had been the object of popular odium; upon this perfidious enchantress it was they charged, as formerly upon Madame Roland, and earlier upon Marie-Antoinette, all the sufferings of the people. Her name, frequently mentioned reproachfully in the convention, had not appeared to move Tallien. One day, however, he ascended the tribune to vindicate her from this series of aspersions. He depicted her as a model of constancy and courage, and as one of the victims destined by Robespierre for the scaffold; declaring, moreover, that she had become his wife. Barras, Legendre, and Fréron, supported him; they affirmed, that the time was at length arrived for a definitive explanation, and proceeded to exchange calumnious expressions with members of the Mountain. The convention found it incumbent, as usual, to put an end to the discussion by passing to the order of the day. On another occasion, Duhem told the deputy Clausel, a member of the committee of general safety, that he would assassinate him. A horrible tumult ensued, and the order of the day was again interposed to terminate the disgraceful scene.

The violent and indefatigable Duhem chanced to alight on a publication entitled The Spectator of the Revolution, in which appeared a dialogue on the two governments, republican and monarchical. In this production a decided preference was given to the monarchical government, and it even urged, in terms sufficiently unequivocal, the French people to return to that system. Duhem indignantly denounced the work as one of the symptoms of the royalist conspiracy. The convention, acquiescing in the propriety of this denunciation, sent the author before the revolutionary tribunal; but Duhem, having taken upon himself to assert that royalism and aristocracy were in the ascendant, was committed to the Abbey for three days, as having insulted the assembly.

These scenes agitated all Paris. In the sections addresses were proposed respecting them, which gave rise to fierce contentions as to the terms in which they should be embodied, each party striving to carry them in accordance with its own views. Never had the revolution presented so stormy a spectacle. Formerly, the Jacobins, all powerful over opinion, had encountered no resistance capable of producing a veritable struggle. They had driven all before them, and remained undisputed conquerors; conquerors obstreperous and wrathful, it is true, but sole and supreme. Now, a mighty party had arisen, and, although it was less outrageous, it supplied by numbers what it lacked in violence, and could contend upon equal terms. Addresses were thus framed in opposite senses. Several Jacobins, congregated in the coffee-houses, in the populous quarters of Saint-Denis, the Temple, and Saint-Antoine, held language such as they had used in the worst times. They threatened to attack the new conspirators at the Palais-Royal, the theatres, and even in the convention. On their side, the young men indulged in boisterous clamour in the pits of the theatres. They vowed to perpetrate a galling outrage on the Jacobins. The bust of Marat was planted in all public places, and prominently in those of public amusement. At the theatre Feydeau, some young men sprang up the balcony, and, clambering on each other's shoulders, they pulled down the bust of the saint, broke it to atoms, and replaced it by one of Rousseau. The police used fruitless efforts to prevent this exploit. Universal acclamations greeted the action of these daring youths. Garlands were thrown on the stage wherewith to crown the bust of Rousseau; verses, written for the occasion, were delivered, and the building re-echoed with shouts of "Down with the terrorists! Down with Marat! Down with that bloodthirsty monster who demanded three hundred thousand heads! Long live the author of Emile, the Social Contract, and the New Heloise!" Similar scenes were enacted on the following day in all the theatres and public places. Bands rushed into the market-places, bedaubed the busts of Marat with blood, and then hurled them into the mud. Even boys formed a procession in the quarter of Montmartre, and, after bearing the bust of Marat to the brink of a sewer, cast it amongst the filth. The public detestation was expressed with extreme virulence; disgust and abhorrence of Marat were in all hearts, even amongst the majority of the Mountaineers, for none of them had been able to follow in his aberrations the conceptions of that audacious maniac. But the name of Marat being hallowed—the dagger of Charlotte Corday having exalted him into a species of idol—a dread of touching his shrines had been felt equal to that of desecrating those of liberty itself. We have seen that, during the last Sans-culottides, only four months ago, he had been placed in the Pantheon in lieu of Mirabeau. The committees hastened to profit by this explosion of opinion, and proposed to the convention a decree whereby no individual could be deposited in the Pantheon before a lapse of twenty years, and no bust or portrait of any citizen be exposed in public places. It was adopted, with the addition that every contrary decree was cancelled. In consequence, Marat was ejected from the Pantheon, after an occupation of but four months. Such is the instability of revolutions! Immortality to-day decerned, to-morrow abrogated; and popular odium pursues party leaders even beyond the gates of death! From that moment commenced the long infamy to which Marat has been consigned, and which he has partaken with Robespierre. Both, recently deified by fanaticism, now judged by acerbity, were devoted to permanent execration.

The Jacobins, incensed at this outrage on the memory of one of the most renowned revolutionists, assembled in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, and swore to avenge the fame of Marat. They took his bust, carried it in triumph through all the quarters they swayed, and, armed to the teeth, menaced with death any who should disturb their sinister celebration. The young men debated whether they should assault the procession; they encouraged each other to make the attack, and a battle must have inevitably ensued, if the committees had not caused the club of the Quinze-Vingts to be closed, prohibited processions of this description, and dispersed the crowds. At the sitting of the 20th Nivose (9th January), the busts of Marat and Lepelletier were removed from the convention, as likewise the two fine pictures in which David had represented them dying. The galleries, filled by the opposing partisans, uttered antagonist cries; some raised applauding cheers, others howled in dismal yells. Amongst the latter were those females usually styled "furies of the guillotine:" they were expelled from the building. The majority of the assembly joined in the acclamations, whilst the Mountain, sullen and silent, appeared to behold, in the removal of those celebrated pictures, the portent of the approaching ruin of the revolution and the republic.

The convention, through its committees, had interfered to prevent the two parties from coming to actual conflict on the recent occasion; but the collision was only delayed for a time. Animosities were so deep and bitter, the sufferings of the people so great, that the recurrence of one of those desperate commotions, so common in the annals of the revolution, might be hourly expected. Meanwhile, in all the uncertainty of coming events and issues, the convention discussed the questions forced on its attention by the commercial and financial condition of the country—painful and unhappy questions, which were ever and anon perforce revived, for treatment and solution in the varying modes called for by the fluctuations ideas underwent from time to time.

Two months earlier it had modified the maximum, by rendering the prices of grain variable with reference to local circumstances; it had modified the system of requisitions, by rendering them special, limited, and regular: and it had postponed the inquiry relative to the foreign sequestration, to currency, and to assignats. At the present moment, all respect for revolutionary creations was gone. It was no longer a simple modification that men demanded, but the abolition of the whole coercive system instituted during the terror. The opponents of that system advanced excellent reasons in support of their views. "All values not being assigned," they argued, "the maximum was absurd and iniquitous. The farmer, paying 30 francs for a ploughshare he formerly bought for 50 sous, 700 francs to a servant whom he could have engaged heretofore for 100 francs, and 10 francs to a day-labourer instead of 50 sous, could not sell his produce at the same price as in times past. Raw materials imported from abroad having been recently excepted from the maximum, with the view of restoring some activity to commerce, it was preposterous to subject them, when manufactured, to its operation; for thereby they would bring eight or ten times less than in the raw state. These instances were not the only ones that might be adduced: a thousand others of the same kind could be cited. The maximum thus exposing the merchant, the manufacturer, and the agriculturist, to inevitable losses, they naturally shunned it; the first abandoned his warehouse or his manufactory, the last hoarded his grain or had it consumed in the farm-yard, because he found it more advantageous to sell fatted poultry and pigs. Hence, if it were wished that the market should be supplied, prices must be rendered free, for no one would labour in order to incur certain loss. For the rest," added the adversaries of the revolutionary system, "the maximum had never been practically executed; those who stood in need of articles were actually compelled to pay a remunerative price, and not the legal price. The whole question, therefore, had resolved itself into this alternative —pay dear or want. Vain was the hope of supplying the spontaneous activity of industry and trade by requisitions, that is to say, by the action of the government. A government embarking in commerce was a monstrous absurdity. That commission of supplies, which had boasted so much of its operations, were people aware what quantity of foreign corn it had brought into France? Just enough to feed France for five days. It was indispensable, therefore, to revert to individual activity, that is to say, to free trade, and trust to it alone. When the maximum was abrogated, and the merchant could reimburse himself the charges of freight and insurance, interest upon his capital, and a fair profit, he would bring commodities from all quarters of the globe. The large cities, especially, which were not, like Paris, provisioned at the expense of the state, had trade alone to rely upon, and would be absolutely starved unless the fetters impeding its operations were removed."

In principle, these arguments were sound and just; but it was not the less true that the transition from the coercive system to free trade, at so critical a period as the present, was necessarily hazardous and dangerous. Until the inducement of unfettered prices had revived individual industry and stocked the markets, all articles must undergo an extraordinary enhancement. This might be but a slight inconvenience as to commodities not of primary necessity, producing at the worst a temporary interruption, until, in the ordinary course of things, competition brought down prices; but as it affected articles of subsistence, which would allow of no interruption, the subject was fraught with difficulty. Whilst waiting until the faculty of selling corn at free prices had caused vessels to be dispatched to the Crimea, Poland, Africa, and America, and constrained farmers, by the natural spirit of competition, to bring forward their produce, how were the people in large cities and towns to live, without the maximum and without requisitions? After all, bad bread, scantily obtained by the arduous efforts of the administration, and amidst incredible obstacles, was better than absolute famine. Doubtless it was expedient to get rid of this forced system as soon as possible, but with caution and not impetuous precipitancy.

The reproaches of M. Boissy-d'Anglas against the commission of supplies were equally unjust as preposterous. Its importations, he said, would not have fed France for more than five days. Granting the calculation correct, which was controverted, his objection is valueless. It is only a little a country ever needs in the case of domestic deficiency, otherwise it could not be supplied; but was it not a signal service to have produced that little? Can the desperate condition of a whole country deprived of bread for even five days be imagined? Were such a destitution, indeed, equally borne and distributed, it might prove less mortal; but whilst the rural districts would have had corn in superfluity, the great towns, and especially the metropolis, would have been devoid thereof, not for five days only, but for ten, twenty, fifty, and complete anarchy must have resulted. Besides, the commission for trade and supplies, directed by Lindet, had not simply limited its labours to the importation of produce from abroad, but had likewise superintended the transport of grain, provender, and other agricultural produce in France itself, from the country to the frontiers and to the large towns; and trade would assuredly not have performed those services if left to itself, amidst the terrors of war and political fury. It had been found indispensable to substitute the will of the government for the action of commerce, and the energetic marvellous realisation of that will deserved the gratitude and admiration of France, despite the sneers of those insignificant personages who, during the dangers of the country, had employed their faculties only in concealing themselves from observation.

The question was carried by assault, if it may be so expressed. The convention abolished the maximum and system of requisitions by overruling impulse, in like manner as it had recalled the seventy-three deputies, and passed a decree against Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère. Certain remnants of the system of requisitions were, however, allowed to subsist. Such as had been issued for the purpose of alimenting large towns were to remain in force for one month longer. The government likewise retained the privilege of pre-emption, that is to say, the power of taking commodities by authority at the market value. The famous commission was partly curtailed in its title; it was to be no longer called the commission for trade and supplies, but simply the commission of supplies. Its five directors were reduced to three, and its ten thousand agents to a few hundreds. The system of private enterprise was substituted for that of administrative action, and sundry passing invectives were uttered against Pache for his institution of the committee of contracts. The wainage was surrendered to purveyors. The manufacture of arms at Paris, which had rendered costly but immense services, was discontinued, which could now be done without inconvenience, and the fabrication of arms abandoned to private enterprise. The workmen, aware they would henceforth receive less wages, murmured; instigated by the Jacobins, they even threatened a movement; but they were curbed, and dismissed to their several districts.

The question of sequestration, previously adjourned because fears were entertained that, by restoring the circulation of bills of exchange, remittances would be forwarded to the emigrants and stockjobbing in foreign paper revived, was finally considered, and decided to the advantage of commercial freedom. The sequestration was raised, and the convention thereby surrendered to foreign merchants their confiscated balances, at the hazard of not obtaining a similar restitution in favour of the French. Lastly, the free circulation of specie was re-established, after a warm discussion. It had been heretofore interdicted, with the view of preventing the emigrants from drawing bullion out of France; it was now permitted, on the ground that, the means of exchange being defective, Lyons being no longer able to furnish sixty millions' worth of manufactures, Nismes twenty, and Sedan ten, commercial intercourse would be impracticable, unless license were given to pay in gold or silver for purchases made abroad. Moreover, it was judged that specie being now hoarded and kept back on account of the paper-money, the privilege of reimbursing foreigners for articles imported would have the effect of drawing it forth, and re-introducing it into the currency. At the same time, useless precautions were taken to prevent it being exported for the benefit of emigrants. Whoever transmitted any of the precious metals abroad, was bound to import merchandise of corresponding value.

Finally, the difficult question of assignats came to be solved. There were nearly seven thousand and five or six hundred millions in actual circulation; five or six hundred millions remained in the coffers of the state; consequently the amount fabricated reached eight thousand millions. The hypothec in property of first and second origin, such as forests, lands, palaces, mansions, houses, and moveables, amounted to upwards of fifteen thousand millions, according to the actual valuation in assignats. The pledge, therefore, was amply sufficient. Nevertheless, the assignat was depreciated to nine-tenths or eleven-twelfths of its value, according to the nature of the objects for which it was exchanged. Thus the state, which received the taxes in assignats, the fund-holder, the public functionary, the proprietor of land or houses, the creditor of outstanding capital—all those, in short, who received their appointments, dividends, salaries, or payments, in paper—suffered losses in a perpetually increasing ratio, and the distress thence resulting became daily more afflictive. Cambon had proposed to augment the salaries of public functionaries and the dividends of stockholders. After opposing his suggestion, it had been found necessary to adopt it in behalf of public functionaries, who could no longer exist upon their pittances. But this was a feeble palliative for an evil so immense; it merely relieved one class out of a hundred. To make the relief effectual and general, it was requisite to establish the just proportion between values of all kinds: but how was this to be effected?

The notions in vogue during the preceding year were again fondly indulged; still the cause of the depreciation of assignats, and the means of raising them in value, were the themes of discussion. In the first place, albeit granting that their inordinate quantity was one reason for the discredit into which they had fallen, it was maintained that it was by no means the greatest; and this to vindicate their profuse emission. In corroboration of this statement, it was alleged that, at the period of Dumouriez's defection, the insurrection of La Vendée, and the capture of Valenciennes, the assignats, circulating in far less abundance than subsequent to the deblockades of Dunkirk, Maubeuge, and Landau, nevertheless declined more; which, indeed, was true, and proved unquestionably that defeats and victories materially influenced the standard of the paper-money—an incontestible axiom. But now, in Ventose, year 3 (March 1795), the triumph of the republic was complete on all points, confidence in the sales of national domains was established, those domains had even become the objects of a species of jobbing, numerous speculators purchasing them to profit by their resale or subdivision; and yet the depreciation of assignats was four or five times greater than in the previous year. The huge emission was therefore the veritable cause of the discredit, and its reduction the only mode of enchancing the value.

The sole legitimate means of lessening the amount of assignats in circulation consisted in redeeming them by sales of national property. But how were these sales to be effected?—an eternal question, canvassed every year. The causes which had retarded the purchases of domains in preceding years were repugnance, prejudices, and, above all, want of confidence in the stability of the acquisitions. Now the case was altogether different. Let us consider for a moment how acquisitions of immoveable property are made in the ordinary course of things. The merchant, manufacturer, agriculturist, or capitalist, buys, with the accumulations of his industry, or income, the land of an individual who has become impoverished, or who disposes of his estate to exchange it for another. Lands are thus constantly changing hands, either for others, or for floating capital accumulated by enterprise or thrift. The new purchaser retires to his estate, and the vender seeks to turn the money he has received in payment to account, and succeeds to the industrial occupation of the previous realiser. Such is the insensible operation proceeding with regard to immoveable property. But, on the other hand, let us imagine the third of a vast territory, comprising immense estates unbroken by divisions, parks, palaces, and sumptuous mansions, exposed to sale all at once, and at the very moment that landed proprietors and merchants, all the richest capitalists, were dispersed, and we shall understand why dispositions were impracticable. It was not a few citizens or agriculturists escaped from the proscription, who could attempt such acquisitions or pay for them. It may be objected, doubtless, that the mass of assignats in circulation was sufficient to absorb the domains; but this mass was illusory, when it is remembered that each holder of assignats was obliged to use them in an eight or ten fold proportion beyond their value, to procure such objects as were essential to his comfort or existence.

The difficulty consisted, then, in imparting, not the inclination to purchase, but the ability to pay. Thus all the measures proposed proceeded on a false basis, for they all presupposed this ability. The measures themselves were either of a coercive or voluntary nature. The first contemplated demonetisation, or a forced loan. Demonetisation converted the paper from current money into a mere obligation on the domains. It was tyrannical; for, when it struck the assignat in the hands of the operative, or of the individual who had only wherewithal to live, it transformed his crust of bread into clay, and reduced the unfortunate holder to famine. The mere rumour, in fact, of such a project being entertained with regard to a portion of the assignats, had caused them to decline rapidly, and the convention was constrained to promulgate a decree that it would not demonetise. A forced loan was not less tyrannical; it likewise consisted in changing the assignat from money into a charge upon the national property. The only difference was, that the forced loan bore upon the higher and wealthy classes, and operated the conversion as to them alone; but they had already suffered so much, that it was scarcely possible to make them purchase land without subjecting them to severe embarrassment. Besides, since the reaction, they had begun to defend themselves from any recurrence to revolutionary expedients.

Measures of a voluntary nature, therefore, alone remained feasible. Divers were propounded. Cambon conceived the idea of a lottery, to be composed of four millions of lots, of one thousand francs each; which supposed a contribution of four thousand millions on the part of the public. The state was to add three hundred and ninety-one millions to make up prizes, so that there might be four prizes of 500,000 francs, thirty-six of 250,000, and three hundred and sixty of 100,000. The least fortunate would recover their pristine disbursement of one thousand francs; but all, instead of receiving assignats, would be furnished with bonds on the national domains, bearing three per cent. interest. Thus, it was imagined that the allurement of a considerable prize would tempt the public to compete for this mortgage on the national property, and that four thousand millions of assignats would quit the character of currency to assume that of obligations on land, by means of this premium of three hundred and ninety-one millions. This scheme was still founded on the supposition that the investment could in fact be made. Thirion recommended another mode, that of a tontine. But this plan, well adapted for rendering a small capital productive to a few survivors, was infinitely too slow, and utterly inadequate for an operation affecting so enormous a mass of floating paper. Johannot proposed a species of territorial bank, in which assignats should be deposited for bonds bearing three per cent. interest—bonds convertible at will into assignats. This was only another modification of the project for changing the paper-money into obligations on land, with the difference, that the power of reconverting them into a current form was here secured. It is obvious that none of these schemes overcame the real, substantial obstacle; and that all the plans propounded for withdrawing the paper and enhancing it in value were purely illusory. Nothing was left, therefore, but to pursue indefinitely the same course, emitting assignats ad libitum, until they should reach their lowest point of depression, and the term arrive for a forced solution of all difficulties. It is unfortunate that nations never can discern the necessary sacrifices, and diminish their weight and extent by anticipating the period when they become unavoidable. This foresight and courage have always failed nations in financial crises.

To these abortive projects for redeeming assignats were added others, happily more practical, but lamentably insufficient to meet the evil. The moveables belonging to emigrants, which might be easily realised, amounted in value to two hundred millions. Amicable arrangements for the shares of emigrants in commercial companies might produce one hundred millions; their portion of hereditaments five hundred millions. But, with regard to the first, capital would be withdrawn from commerce; and, with regard to the second, part of the produce must be received in real estate. It was resolved to offer a premium to those who should complete their payments for lands already purchased, whereby it was expected eight hundred millions would be gained. Finally, the large mansions situated in Paris, and not let, were to be disposed of by lottery, which would bring in a thousand millions more. In the event of all anticipations being fulfilled, the expedients just enumerated might return into the exchequer two thousand six hundred millions; but if, from the whole, fifteen hundred millions accrued, the result might be deemed auspicious; and this sum was already destined for immediate outlay. The necessity for this disbursement arose from a considerate and humane measure which had been recently decreed; to wit, the liquidation of the debts of emigrants. It had been originally determined to institute an individual liquidation for each emigrant. As several of them were insolvent, the republic would thus have satisfied claims only so far as the assets permitted on each estate. But this separate investigation threatened interminable delays; an account must have been opened for every individual emigrant, and the produce of his lands and moveables balanced with his liabilities, in the course of which operation, the unfortunate creditors, almost all domestics, artisans, and tradesmen, might have waited twenty or thirty years for payment. Cambon was instrumental in procuring a decree that the creditors of emigrants should be considered creditors of the state, and forthwith paid, excepting those whose debtors were notoriously bankrupt. The republic might thus lose sundry millions; but it alleviated many severe pangs, and conferred a signal boon on the objects of its bounty. The arch-revolutionist Cambon was the author of this beneficent and humane proceeding.

But whilst the convention was engaged in anxious discussion upon these grave and difficult questions, it was perpetually recalled to cares still more emergent, arising from the absolute dearth menacing Paris. Ventose was just elapsing.* The abolition of the maximum had as yet failed to revive trade, and supplies of grain ceased to arrive. Numerous deputies, disseminated around Paris, issued requisitions which were not heeded. Although these were still authorised for the purpose of alimenting large towns, and were to be reimbursed at the market value, the farmers asserted they were abolished, and refused obedience. Nor was this the only or the greatest obstacle. The rivers and canals were completely frozen, and all traffic upon them at an end. The roads, covered with ice, were impracticable; to render wainage possible, it was necessary to strew them with sand for a circuit of twenty leagues. On the way the waggons were plundered by the starving population, whose rage the Jacobins stimulated by inculcating the belief that the government was counter-revolutionary, that it allowed the corn to rot in Paris, and was labouring to re-establish royalty. Whilst supplies diminished, consumption increased, as always happens in similar cases. The apprehension of scarcity induced all who were able to lay in stores for several days. Following the precedent of former times, bread was distributed on the presentation of tickets, but every one exaggerated his necessities. On the entreaties of their laundry and dairy-women, or of the country people who brought them vegetables and fowls, the inhabitants of Paris gave them bread, which they preferred to money, as the famine raged in the environs as cruelly as in Paris. The bakers even sold the unbaked dough to persons from the country; and from fifteen hundred sacks of flour, the consumption had increased to nineteen hundred. The abolition of the maximum had caused the price of all edibles to reach an extraordinary height; to induce a decline, the government had consigned divers articles of primary use to the sausage-venders, grocers, and other shopkeepers, in order that they might retail them at low prices, and thus reduce the general dearness. But the consignees abused their trust, and sold at higher rates than they had undertaken to observe.

The committees were daily harassed with alarm and solicitude lest the nineteen hundred sacks of flour, indispensable for the diurnal consumption, should not be forthcoming. Boissy-d'Anglas, upon whom the burden chiefly lay, presented repeated reports, with the view of tranquillising the public, and inspiring it with a confidence and security not enjoyed by the government itself. In this situation, a constant war of recrimination was waged between the antagonist parties. "Behold," said the Mountain, "the precious consequence of your abolition of the maximum!" "Behold," retorted the right side, "the inevitable effect of your revolutionary measures!" Each urged as the required panacea the accomplishment of its party views, and often demanded measures the most alien to the dolorous subject that stirred the strife. "Punish all the guilty," cried the right side, "redress all injuries, revise all the tyrannical laws, and rescind the law of the suspected." "No," answered the Mountaineers; "remodel your committees of government, reinfuse revolutionary energy into them, and cease to persecute the purest patriots and to resuscitate aristocracy." Such were the ideas propounded by the respective factions for the alleviation of the public calamity.

It is always such moments parties select to press hostilities the most fiercely, and to secure the triumph of their peculiar tenets or desires. The report so long expected on Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, Barrère, and Vadier, was now presented to the assembly. The committee of twenty-one concluded for impeachment, and recommended provisional detention. The arrest was at once voted by an overwhelming majority. With regard to the impeachment, it was decided that the four inculpated deputies should be heard by the assembly, and a solemn deliberation be subsequently held on the merits of their case. Scarcely had this resolution been passed ere a motion was submitted for reinstalling the proscribed deputies, who, two months ago, had been relieved from molestation, but not permitted to resume their seats amidst their former colleagues. Sieyes, who had studied silence for five years—who, since the early months of the Constituent Assembly, had sought to bury in oblivion his reputation and his genius, by crouching amongst the centre, and whom the dictatorship had pardoned as an unsocial idealist, incapable of conspiring, and ceasing to be dangerous when he ceased to write—Sieyes emerged from his long inanition, and observed, that since the reign of the laws appeared to be returning, he would resume the faculty of speech. So long as the outrage perpetrated on the national representation was not redressed, the reign of the laws, in his opinion, was not established. "Your whole history," he said to the convention, "is divided into two epochs: from the 21st September, the day of your inauguration, until the 31st May, oppression of the convention by the deluded people; since the 31st May until the present moment, oppression of the people by the tyrannised convention. From this day forth you will prove you have become free, by recalling your colleagues. Such a measure cannot even be discussed; it is of clear right." The Mountaineers vehemently controverted this manner of presenting the subject. "All that you have done, then, is null!" exclaimed Cambon. "Those vast labours, that multitude of laws, all those decrees which constitute the actual government, are then null! and the salvation of France, worked out by your courage and efforts—all is null!" Sieyes explained that he had been misunderstood. The assembly, despite the protestations of the Mountain, ordained the reinstatement of the deputies who had escaped the scaffold. Those famous outlaws, Isnard, Henri-Larivière, Louvet, Larevellière-Lépaux, Doulcet of Pontecoulant, entered amidst acclamations. "Alas that a cavern was not found sufficiently deep," exclaimed Chénier, "to save from the executioners the eloquence of Vergniaud and the genius of Condorcet!"

The Mountaineers were extremely wroth. Several Thermidorians even, alarmed at the reintegration into the assembly of the leaders of a faction which had opposed so dangerous a resistance to the revolutionary system, returned to the Mountain. Thuriot, that bitter opponent of Robespierre, who had been saved by a miracle from the fate of Philippeaux; Lesage-Sénault, a man of prudent sagacity, but a decided enemy to all counter-revolution; Lecointre, in fine, the determined adversary of Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, who had been pronounced a calumniator five months previously, for having denounced the seven surviving members of the old committees—all resumed their seats on the left side. "You know not what you are doing," said Thuriot to his colleagues; "those men will never forgive you." Lecointre proposed to draw a distinction. "Recall," he said, "the proscribed deputies, but inquire who amongst them have borne arms against their country by inciting the departments, and such admit not into your bosom." All, in fact, had taken up arms. Louvet hesitated not to avow the fact, and even moved a resolution that the departments which had risen in June 1793 had deserved well of the country. Here Tallien started to the tribune, amazed at the audacity of the Girondists, and repelled both propositions—Lecointre's and Louvet's. They were severally negatived. Whilst thus restoring the proscribed Girondists, the convention consigned to examination before the committee of general safety, Pache, Bouchotte, and Garat.

Such indications were not calculated to allay agitation. The scarcity still increasing, at length rendered it imperative to adopt a step which had been deferred for some time, in the hope it might be averted, for it was one certain to inflame exasperation to the highest pitch. This reluctant measure was putting the inhabitants of Paris on rations. Boissy-d'Anglas appeared before the convention on the 25th Ventôse (16th March), and proposed, in order to prevent waste and secure to every one a sufficiency of food, that each individual should be limited to a certain allowance of bread. The number of individuals composing each family, he suggested, should be indicated on the tickets, and no more than one pound of bread delivered per head daily. Under this restriction, he undertook to promise that the city would not lack subsistence. The Mountaineer Romme moved as an amendment that the ration of labouring men should be extended to a pound and a half. The higher classes, he urged, had means of procuring meat, rice, and vegetables; but the populace, being able to purchase bread alone, ought to have an additional quantity. This amendment of Romme was adopted, and the Thermi-dorians regretted they had not themselves originated it, in order thereby to gain the support of the people and withdraw it from the Mountain.

No sooner was the decree passed, than it excited a prodigious ferment in the populous quarters of Paris. The revolutionists applied themselves to exaggerate its consequences, and stigmatised Boissy-d'Anglas with the epithet of Famine-Boissy. On the second day thereafter, 27th Ventôse, when the decree was for the first time put in execution, violent commotions occurred in the Faubourgs Saint-Antoine and Saint-Marceau. For the 636,000 inhabitants of the capital had been distributed 1897 sacks of flour: 324,000 citizens received the additional half-loaf assigned to operatives engaged in manual labour. Nevertheless, it appeared so novel to the people of the faubourgs to be placed upon rations, that they murmured discontentedly. Sundry females, the habitual frequenters of clubs, and always ready to raise their discordant voices, broke into flagrant mutiny in the section of L'Observatoire. The ordinary agitators of the section hastened to join them. The united malecontents proposed to march with a petition to the convention; but in order to frame a petition a meeting of the whole section was requisite, and it was only allowed to assemble on specific days—the decades. Notwithstanding, they surrounded the civil committee, and demanded with menaces the keys of the building in which the section held its sessions; and, on the refusal of that body to surrender them, they insisted that one of its members should be delegated to accompany them to the convention. The committee acceded, and deputed one of its members to regulate the movement and prevent disorders. A similar disturbance was proceeding at the same moment in the section of Le Finistère. A crowd was there gathered, which eventually blended with the muster of L'Observatoire. The two conjoined marched towards the convention. One of the ringleaders undertook the part of orator, and was introduced with several companions to the bar. The residue of the multitude remained at the door, making a fearful clamour. "We are in want of bread," said the orator of the deputation; "we are ready to regret all the sacrifices we have made for the revolution." At these words, the assembly, stirred with indignation, interrupted him, and a number of members arose to rebuke such unseemly language. "Bread! bread!" vociferated the petitioners, striking furiously on the bar. At this insolent demeanour, the assembly prepared to order them from the hall. But the tumult abating, the orator was permitted to finish his harangue: he stated that, until the wants of the people were satisfied, they would never cease the shout of "The republic for ever!" The president replied with firmness to this seditious discourse; and, without inviting the petitioners to the honours of the sitting, dismissed them to their avocations. The committee of general safety, which had meanwhile collected several battalions of the sections, caused the avenues of the convention to be cleared, and dispersed the assemblage.

This occurrence produced a vivid impression on the members of the national representation. The continual threats of the Jacobins scattered amongst the sections of the faubourgs; their inflammatory placards, wherein they announced an insurrection within eight days, unless the patriots were relieved from further prosecution and the constitution of 1793 was put in force; their almost overt conspiracies, hatched in the coffee-houses of the faubourgs; and, lastly, this late attempt to foment a commotion, revealed to the convention the design of another 31st of May. The right side, the restored Girondists, the Thermidorians, all equally menaced, bethought themselves of measures to avert the calamity of a fresh attack upon the national representation. Sieyes, who now appeared prominently on the scene, and had been nominated on the committee of public welfare, submitted to the united committees a species of martial law, framed to prevent new outrages against the convention. This project of law declared seditious every assemblage in which propositions were entertained for assailing public or private property, for re-establishing royalty, for subverting the republic and the constitution of 1793, for resorting to the Temple or to the convention, or for other analogous purposes. Every individual forming part of such an assemblage was liable to transportation. If, after three summonses by the magistrates, the assemblage failed to disperse, force was to be employed; all the adjacent sections, pending the muster of the public force, were to forward their several battalions. An insult committed on a representative of the people was punished with banishment; an outrage, accompanied by violence, with the penalty of death. One bell only was to remain suspended in Paris, and be placed on the tower of L'Unité. If a crowd marched on the convention, this bell was immediately to sound the tocsin. At this signal, all the sections were bound to assemble, and move to the succour of the national representation. If the convention were dissolved or fettered in its liberty, all the members who could escape were enjoined to depart forthwith from Paris, and repair to Châlons-sur-Marne. All those elected as substitutes, and all the deputies on missions or furloughs, were directed to join them. The generals were with all speed to send them troops from the frontier; and this new convention formed at Châlons, concentrating all legitimate authority, was to march on Paris, deliver the oppressed portion of the national representation, and punish the authors of the treason.

The committees hailed this project with rapture. Sieyes was charged to digest the report thereon, and present it without delay to the assembly. On their part, the revolutionists, emboldened by the late demonstration, deriving in the scarcity an opportunity most favourable to their views, perceiving the danger of their party on the increase, and the fatal moment approaching for Billaud, Collot, Barrère, and Vadier, manifested a most resolute spirit, and seriously revolved the expedient of a sedition. The Electoral Club and the popular society of the Quinze-Vingts had been dissolved. Thus deprived of those places of resort, the revolutionists had of late overspread the sections, and filled the assemblies held every decade: they chiefly occupied the Faubourgs Saint-Antoine and Saint-Marceau, the quarters of the Temple, and the City. They met in certain coffee-houses situated in the heart of these localities, and deliberated on a movement, without having, however, any distinct plan or well-defined leaders. Amongst them were several men compromised by former deeds, either in the revolutionary committees or in different employments, who had considerable influence over the multitude, but none of them enjoyed a decided pre-eminence. Being thus poised amongst themselves, their agreement was not altogether harmonious: they held, beyond doubt, no communication with the deputies of the Mountain.

The old popular leaders, always in alliance with Danton, Robespierre, and the chiefs of the government, had heretofore been instrumental in giving the word of command to the populace. But they had perished with their superiors. The new leaders were strangers to the new chiefs of the Mountain: they had in common with them only their dangers and their attachment to the same cause. Moreover, the Mountaineer deputies, forming the minority in the assembly, and incessantly taunted with conspiring to recover their lost power, the general fate of supplanted parties, were reduced to the necessity of daily justifying themselves, and protesting that they were not conspiring. The ordinary effect of such a position is to create a desire that others may rebel, but a repugnance to take the initiative in any preparatory measures. Thus the Mountaineers constantly repeated—"The people will rise—the people must rise;" but they did not venture to concert with them to provoke the outbreak. Certain unguarded expressions of Duhem and Maribon-Montaud in a café were indeed adduced; both were sufficiently devoid of prudence and self-control to have uttered them. Declamatory harangues of Leonard-Bourdon at the sectional society of the Rue du Vert-Bois, were also cited; they were such as might have probably fallen from him. But it was not the less true that not one of them held correspondence with the patriots. As to Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, who were more interested than any others in the result of a movement, they dreaded lest, by taking part therein, they might aggravate the perils of their position, already too precarious.

The patriots, therefore, proceeded alone, devoid of effective combination, as invariably occurs when influential leaders are wanting. They hurried to and fro, passed mottos or tokens from street to street, from ward to ward, and circulated tidings of intended petitions or movements on the part of such and such sections: such their desultory manœuvres. At the commencement of a revolution, when a party is full of pristine vigour, with all its chiefs unscathed, when success and novelty draw the masses in its wake, and it disconcerts its adversaries by the unexpected boldness of its attacks, it supplies the lack of combination and order by enthusiasm: on the other hand, when it is reduced to defend itself, is deprived of all inspiring impulse, and is thoroughly known to its adversaries, then must all its hopes rest upon perfect union and discipline. But this discipline, always extremely difficult, becomes impossible when the commanding spirits have disappeared. This was the position of the patriot party in Ventose, year 3 (end of March): it was no longer the torrent of the 14th July, the 5th and 6th October, the 10th August, the 31st May; simply an amalgamation of men hardened in a lon course of civil discord, seriously compromised, full of energy and determination, but less fitted to vanquish than to combat with the obstinacy of despair.

In accordance with the established custom of preceding every movement by an imperious and yet guarded petition, the sections of Montreuil and the Quinze-Vingts, comprised within the Faubourg St Antoine, composed an address, in strict analogy with all those that had heralded the great insurrections. It was fixed for presentation on the 1st Germinal (21st March). This chanced to be the day on which the committees had resolved to propound the law of high police, the produce of Sieyes' fertile brain. It was arranged amongst the patriots that the deputation appointed to present the petition should be accompanied to the Tuileries by a large concourse: accordingly, on the day prescribed, they repaired thither in vast numbers, and as usual formed into multitudinous groups, crying ever and anon, "The convention for ever! The Jacobins for ever! Down with the aristocrats!" The young men of braided locks and sable collars likewise poured from the Palais-Royal towards the Tuileries, and fell into antagonist bands, shouting "The convention for ever! Down with the terrorists!" The petitioners were introduced to the bar: the language of their address was extremely temperate. They adverted to the sufferings of the people, without any peculiar bitterness; they controverted the charges alleged against the patriots, without recriminating on their adversaries. They merely remarked that in these accusations both the past services of the patriots, and the position in which they had been placed, had been overlooked; at the same time, they confessed that excesses had been committed, but added, that parties, of whatever complexion they might be, were composed of men and not of gods. "The sections of the Quinze-Vingts and Montreuil," they said, "are not here to ask of you, as general measures, either exile or effusion of blood against such or such party—measures which confound simple error with crime; in Frenchmen they behold only brethren, differently organised, it is true, but all members of the same family. They are here to solicit you to employ a resource which is in your own hands, and which can alone be efficacious in terminating our political tempests: it is the constitution of 1793. From this day forth, organise that popular constitution which the French people have accepted and sworn to defend. It will reconcile all interests, tranquillise all anxieties, and conduct you to the goal of your labours."

This artful requisition embodied all the revolutionists contemplated at the moment. They dreamed, in fact, that the constitution, leading to a dissolution of the assembly, would restore themselves and their leaders to preponderance in the legislature, the executive power, and the municipal administrations. In this expectation they erred exceedingly; but such was their hope; and they imagined that, without advancing obnoxious demands, such as the liberation of the patriots under detention, the suspension of all procedures, and the incorporation of a new commune at Paris, they would amply realise it by obtaining the enforcement of the constitution. If the convention refused their request, or evaded it by vague protestations, and failed to fix an early period for its accomplishment, it would thereby evince its repugnance to the constitution of 1793: so they argued. The president Thibaudeau answered them in a firm tone, concluding in these severe and reproachful terms: "The convention has never attributed the insidious petitions which have been brought before it to the hardy and sincere defenders of liberty furnished by the Faubourg St Antoine." When the president had ceased, the deputy Chales hastened to the tribune, and moved that the declaration of rights be exposed in the hall of the convention, as directed by one of the articles of the constitution. Tallien succeeded him in the tribune. "I beg to ask those men," he said, "who now approve themselves such ardent supporters of the constitution, who seem to have borrowed the rallying-cry of a sect which appeared at the close of the Constituent Assembly—'The constitution, nothing but the constitution,' whether they are not the very parties who have shut it up in a box?" Plaudits on one side, murmurs and shouts on the other, interrupted Tallien: he resumed amidst the turmoil. "Nothing," he continued, "will prevent me from expressing my opinion when I am amongst the representatives of the people. We all desire the constitution, with a firm government—with the government it prescribes; and it is to be reprobated that certain members should encourage the people to believe there are members in this assembly who repudiate the constitution. It has now even become imperative to prevent them, by the adoption of distinct measures, from calumniating the pure and estimable majority of the convention." "Yes! yes!" resounded from all quarters. "That constitution," proceeded Tallien, "which they followed up, not by laws fitted to fulfil it and render its execution feasible, but by the revolutionary government; that constitution, I repeat, must be brought into play, and vitality imparted to it. But we will not be so imprudent as to attempt putting it into execution without organic laws, and thereby deliver it up, incomplete and without safeguards, to all the enemies of the republic. Wherefore I move that a report be, with all convenient dispatch, digested on the means of executing the constitution, and that it be decreed, at this present moment, that between the existing and definitive government none other shall intervene."

Tallien descended from the tribune amidst general expressions of approbation, for his reply had tended to relieve the assembly from embarrassment. The necessity of organic laws was a happy device for postponing the promulgation of the constitution, and likewise for modifying it. An opportunity was thereby afforded of instituting a revision, such as that operated on the old constitution of 1791. The deputy Miaulle, a moderate Mountaineer, acquiesced in the opinion of Tallien, and admitted with him that the execution of the constitution ought not to be unduly hurried; but he maintained there could be no inconvenience in giving it publicity, and he proposed that it be engraved on tables of marble, and exposed in all public places. Thibaudeau, alarmed at the consequences of such notoriety to a constitution drawn up in a moment of popular delirium, yielded the chair to Clauzel, and mounted the tribune. "Legislators," he exclaimed, "we ought not to imitate those priests of antiquity who had two modes of expressing themselves, the one secret the other open. It behoves us to avow with courage what we think of this constitution; and should I be doomed to death, as were those who last year ventured to offer observations against it, I will still speak." After protracted interruption, caused by a series of acclamations, Thibaudeau boldly asserted there would be danger in publishing a constitution which was certainly unknown to those who so highly extolled it. "A democratic constitution," he said, "is not that under which the people themselves exercise all powers." "No! no!" responded numerous voices. "It is," resumed Thibaudeau, "one wherein, by a wise distribution of powers, the people enjoy liberty, equality, and repose. Now, I do not perceive these results in a constitution which would rear, by the side of the national representation, an usurping commune or a factious club of Jacobins; which would refuse to the national representation the direction of the armed force in the city where it sits, and thus deprive it of the means of defending itself and vindicating its dignity; which would grant to a fraction of the people the right of partial insurrection, and the privilege of subverting the state. It is idle to tell us an organic law will correct all these inconveniences. A mere law may be changed by the legislature, but dispositions so important as those to be introduced into such organic laws ought to be immutable as the constitution itself. Moreover, organic laws are not made in a fortnight, nor in a month; and, in the interim, I suggest that no publicity be given to the constitution, that fresh vigour be imparted to the government, and that, if need be, additional prerogatives be conferred on the committee of public welfare." Thibaudeau left the tribune amid vehement applause elicited by the hardy frankness of his declaration. It was immediately proposed to close the discussion; the president put the question to the vote, and almost the whole assembly rose to affirm it. The discomfited Mountaineers alleged that time had not been allowed to comprehend the import of the president's words, that they were ignorant of the proposition submitted: they were not heeded, and the subject was disposed of. Legendre then advocated the formation of a committee of eleven members to undertake the task of framing with all speed the organic laws wherewith the constitution was to be accompanied. This suggestion was instantly adopted. At that moment the committees announced that they had an important report to present, and Sieyes ascended the tribune to propound his law of high police.

Whilst these circumstances were proceeding in the interior of the convention, tumult reigned paramount without. The patriots of the faubourg, who had been unable to gain admittance into the hall, had overspread the Carrousel and the garden of the Palais-Royal; they awaited with impatience, uttering their accustomed whoops, tidings of the effect produced by the petition on the convention. Some of their number, descending from the galleries, came to report what was passing to their associates, and, giving a false account, stated that the petitioners had been maltreated. Thereupon they were excited to fury; some hastened to the faubourgs, to proclaim that their delegates were abused at the convention; others overran the garden, driving before them the young men whom they encountered: they even seized three, and threw them into the large reservoir of the Tuileries. The committee of general safety, on learning these disturbances, ordered the call to arms to be beaten in the adjacent sections. The danger, however, was imminent, and before the sections could be convoked and marshalled, much time must necessarily elapse. The committee was surrounded by a multitude of youths, gathered to the number of a thousand or twelve hundred, armed with bamboos, and eager to fall upon the groups of patriots, who had hitherto met with no resistance. It accepted their aid, and authorised them to assume the police of the garden. They immediately rushed upon the groups, vociferating "The Jacobins for ever!" dispersed them after a long struggle, and even chased a portion to the hall of the convention. Several of the fugitive patriots broke into the galleries, and caused by their precipitate arrival considerable confusion. Sieyes had at that identical moment concluded his report upon the law of high police. The Mountain demanded an adjournment, exclaiming, "It is a law of blood! it is a martial law! It purposes the removal of the convention from Paris!" With these shouts was blended the noise of the patriots pouring into the galleries. A scene of hideous commotion ensued. "The royalists are assassinating the patriots!" roared sundry stentorian voices. Tumult was heard at the doors; the president put on his hat. The majority of the assembly arose, and stated that the exigency preconceived by the law of Sieyes had arrived, and that it ought to be instantly voted. "To the vote! to the vote!" echoed through the chamber. The law was accordingly put to the vote, and adopted by an immense majority, amidst the din of uproarious cheering. The members of the left extremity refused to take part in the deliberation. By degrees comparative tranquillity was re-established, and individual voices began to be heard above the clamour. "The convention has been deceived!" exclaimed Duhem. Clauzel, entering the hall, came, so he asserted, to reassure the assembly. "We have no occasion to be reassured," angrily retorted divers members. Clauzel, however, continued, and affirmed that virtuous citizens had congregated to form a rampart with their bodies round the national representation. His intimation was received with applause. "Thou art the man," cried Ruamps, addressing him, "who has instigated these assemblages to get an atrocious law passed." Clauzel essayed to reply, but his intonation was too feeble to rise above the storm. At length energetic remonstrances were advanced against the law which had been voted with such precipitancy. "The law is passed," said the president; "it cannot be reverted to." "There are men here conspiring with those outside," observed Tallien; "no matter, let us re-open the discussion upon the project, and show that the convention can deliberate calmly even amidst the howls of murderers." The suggestion of Tallien was acceded to, and Sieyes' project resubmitted to consideration. The debate was prosecuted with more calmness. Whilst the convention was thus engaged in deliberation, the turmoil beyond its walls subsided. The youths, victorious over the Jacobins, craved permission to appear before the assembly; they were introduced by deputation, and gave assurance of their patriotic intentions, and of their zeal in the cause of the national representation. They then withdrew, rewarded by the applauding acclamations of the deputies. The convention, persisting to discuss the law of police without adjournment, voted it clause by clause, and finally separated at ten in the evening.

This day left upon both parties the conviction that a decisive crisis was at hand. The patriots, contemned by the convention abruptly closing the discussion upon their petition, and soundly beaten by bamboos in the garden of the Tuileries, carried their wrath into the faubourgs, and laboured assiduously to incite the populace to a movement. The assembly saw clearly that it was about to be attacked, and resolved upon calling into requisition the tutelary law it had just enacted.

The following day had been assigned for a proceeding equally grave in character with that of its predecessor in the calendar. Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, Barrère, and Vadier, were to be heard for the first time before the convention. A host of patriots and women had early hurried from their homes in order to fill the galleries. The youths, more prompt, had anticipated them on the scene, and prevented the females from entering. They had even rudely dismissed them, and thence had resulted divers conflicts around the hall. However, numerous patrols, distributed in the environs, had maintained public tranquillity; the galleries were occupied without much disturbance, and from eight in the morning to midday the time had been employed in chanting patriotic airs. By one party was sung Le Reveil du Peuple, by the other La Marseillaise, pending the moment for the deputies to assume their seats. At length the president took the chair, amidst cries of "The convention for ever! The republic for ever!" The defendants were introduced to the bar, and profound stillness reigned through the expectant assemblage.

Robert Lindet first demanded to be heard on a point of order. It was immediately apprehended that he, himself above reproach, and not at all implicated in the accusations directed against the other members of the old committee of public welfare, purposed to defend his former colleagues. It was noble in him to do so, for he had participated even less than Carnot and Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or] in the political measures of that committee. He had accepted the department of supplies and transports only on condition of remaining a stranger to all the operations of his colleagues, of never deliberating with them, and even of occupying a different locality with his offices. He had declined responsibility before any danger threatened; the danger come, he generously claimed it. It was deemed probable that Carnot and Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or] would follow his example; consequently several members on the right side simultaneously protested against Robert Lindet being allowed to address the assembly. "It is for the defendants to speak," urged sundry deputies; "they must be heard before their accusers or defenders." "Yesterday," cried Bourdon [de-l'Oise], "a plot was hatched to save the accused; good citizens foiled it. To-day recourse is had to other means; scruples are suggested to honest men, whom accusation has severed from their colleagues, and influences are used leading them to make common cause with the guilty, in order to retard the course of justice by fresh obstacles." Robert Lindet replied, that it was the entire government now under arraignment; that he had been a member thereof; that, in consequence, he could not consent to be separated from his colleagues; and that he demanded his share of the responsibility. It is hard to withstand a resplendent manifestation of courage and magnanimity. Robert Lindet obtained the leave he sought, and proceeded to retrace with lengthened minuteness the vast labours of the committee of public welfare; he proved its activity, its foresight, its eminent services; he inculcated the persuasion that the excitation of zeal evoked by the prolonged struggle had alone caused the excesses wherewith certain members of that government were reproached.

This discourse, of six hours' duration, was not heard without frequent interruptions. Ingrates, forgetting the services of the men under accusation, found this vindication inordinately tedious; some had even the effrontery to declare that the oration should be printed at the expense of Lindet, as it would be too costly a publication to be undertaken by the republic. The Girondists growled when they heard the federalist insurrection and the evils it had caused averted to. Every one, in fact, found matter of complaint. An adjournment took place until the morrow, all vowing to suffer no more such voluminous depositions in favour of the accused. However, Carnot and Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or] claimed to be heard in their turn; they, too, wished to afford timely and generous aid to their colleagues, and, at the same time, to justify themselves from a variety of charges which could not press upon Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, without implicating them likewise. The signatures of Carnot and Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or] were, in truth, attached to orders the most strenuously objected against the accused. Carnot, with his great reputation, the man of whom it was said in France and in all Europe that he organised victory, and whose courageous contests with Saint-Just and Robespierre were topics of notoriety—Carnot must necessarily command attention if not respect. The tribune was accorded him. "It belongs to me," he said, "to vindicate the committee of public welfare—to me, who first ventured to confront Robespierre and Saint-Just;" and he might have added, "who ventured to attack them when you obeyed their slightest wishes, and decreed at their pleasure all the mandates of death they sought from you." He prefaced his remarks by an explanation of the manner in which his own, and the signatures of his colleagues, non-participant in the political acts of the committee, came to be affixed, notwithstanding, to the most atrocious orders. "Overwhelmed," he said, "by multitudinous toils, having three and four hundred affairs to regulate every day, and often unable to spare time for necessary refreshment, we had agreed to lend each other signatures. We signed a multitude of documents without perusing them. I signed warrants of accusation, and my colleagues signed orders for movements, plans of attack, without either the one or the other having time to seek explanations. The necessities of this prodigious labour had called for such individual dictatorship, and it was reciprocally conceded. Never otherwise could the work have been accomplished. An order to arrest one of my most efficient clerks in the war department—an order on account of which I assailed Robespierre and Saint-Just, and denounced them as usurpers—that order I had myself signed without being aware of it. Thus our signatures prove nothing, and cannot be made evidence of our participation in the acts objected to the late government." Carnot then proceeded to exculpate his accused colleagues. Assuming, without expressly avowing, that they had been of the ruthless and violent in the committee, he asseverated they had first arisen against the triumvirate, and that the indomitable character of Billaud-Varennes, in particular, had been the greatest obstacle Robespierre encountered in his progress. Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or], who, by presiding over the fabrication of arms and munitions, had rendered services equally signal with those of Carnot himself, and who had granted signatures in the same manner, reiterated Carnot's declaration, and demanded, like him and Lindet, to share the responsibility weighing upon the defendants at the bar.

Here the convention again found itself entangled in the embarrassments of a question already several times incidentally started, and which had invariably led to dismal confusion. This example, given by three men enjoying universal consideration, and coming forward to proclaim themselves co-obligants of the old government, was it not a warning, an intimation to it? Did it not import that every one had been more or less the accomplice of the former committees, and that it, the convention, ought itself to solicit arraignment, as Lindet, Carnot, and Prieur? In sooth, it had not attacked the tyranny until after the three men it now sought to punish as the accomplices thereof; and as to their remorseless passions, it had partaken them all; it was even more culpable than they, if it had not been actuated by such passions, for it had sanctioned all the excesses into which they had hurried others.

Thus the discussion became, during the days of the 4th, 5th, and 6th Germinal (24th, 25th, and 26th March), a continued storm. Every moment the name of a member became implicated; he claimed the right of justifying himself; he recriminated in his turn; and protracted and acrimonious digressions ensued, evolving topics most dangerous to handle. It was accordingly ordained that the accused, and the members of the commission of twenty-one, should alone be permitted to discuss the facts, article by article, and that each deputy should be prohibited from endeavouring to exculpate himself if his name were mentioned. It was in vain this order had been pronounced; the discussion became general again almost every instant, and not an act was adduced which was not the immediate occasion of charges and retorts exchanged with frantic violence. The excitement prevailing since the preceding outbreaks was only fanned into greater fury; the faubourgs rang with but one shout—"We must to the convention, to demand bread, the constitution of '93, and the liberty of the patriots!" Unfortunately, the quantity of flour requisite to furnish the eighteen hundred sacks not having arrived at Paris on the 6th, in the morning of the 7th only half-rations were distributed, with promises of the remaining moiety in the after part of the day. The women dwelling in the section of Les Gravilliers, quarter of the Temple, refused the demi-rations offered them, and assembled tumultuously in the Street du Vert-Bois. Some amongst them, alive to the movement in view, strove to form a multitude, and, dragging with them all the females they met, marched towards the convention. Whilst they advanced in that direction, the agitators hastened to the president of the section, violently possessed themselves of his bell and the keys of the public building, and proceeded to constitute an illegal meeting. They appointed a president and secretaries, and read several successive times the clause in the declaration of rights which declared insurrection a right and a duty. The women, meanwhile, had continued their progress to the convention, and created a deafening clamour at the doors. They insisted upon being introduced in a body; twenty only were permitted to enter. One of the number boldly addressed the assembly, and complained of having received only half-a-pound of bread. The president essaying to reply, they drowned his voice with shouts of "Bread! bread!" They interrupted, by similar exclamations, Boissy-d'Anglas, when he attempted to explain the circumstances attending the distribution of the morning. They were eventually ejected, and the discussion touching the accused deputies was resumed. The committee of general safety caused these women to be conveyed back to their settlements by the patrols, and dispatched one of its members to dissolve the meeting illegally convened in the section of Les Gravilliers. Those who composed it declined at first to heed the exhortations of the representative deputed to them; but, seeing the armed force, they ultimately dispersed. During the night, the principal instigators were arrested and lodged in prison.

This was the third attempt at a movement: on the 27th Ventôse, the commotion had originated on account of the system of rations; on the 1st Germinal, from the petition of the Quinze-Vingts; and on the 7th, from an insufficient distribution of bread. A general outbreak was apprehended on the decade, a day of idleness and meeting in the sections. To obviate the dangers of nocturnal congregations, it was decided that the meetings should be held from one to four o'clock. This was but an insignificant precaution, and one utterly inefficient to prevent outrage. The feeling meanwhile gained ground that the chief causes of these disturbances were the impeachment directed against the members of the former committee of public welfare and the incarceration of the patriots. Several deputies proposed to abandon these proceedings, which, however just they might be, were unquestionably dangerous. Rouzet suggested an expedient whereby a judgment upon the accused might be dispensed with, and their lives at the same time spared: namely, an ostracism. He maintained, that when a citizen had rendered his name a subject of discord, he should be banished for a time. His idea was promptly discarded. Merlin [de Thionville] himself, all zealous Thermidorian and intrepid of mind as he was, began to surmise that it would be better perhaps to avoid the struggle. He proposed, therefore, to convoke the primary assemblies, put the constitution forthwith in force, and refer the judgment upon the accused to the subsequent legislature. Merlin of Douay strongly supported this opinion. Guiton-Morveau intimated one of a firmer character. "The process we have instituted," he said, "is a scandal: where are we to stop, if we pursue all those who have made more sanguinary motions than those charged against the accused? It is difficult to say, in truth, whether we are terminating or recommencing the revolution." The convention was justly alarmed at the idea of resigning authority, at such a moment, to a new assembly; neither had it any inclination to give France a constitution so singularly preposterous as that of 1793; it consequently resolved that there was no grounds for deliberating on the proposition of the two Merlins. As to the impeachment already commenced, too many revengeful feelings were enlisted in its prosecution to allow of its cessation. It was merely determined that the assembly, in order to meet other calls upon its attention, should devote alternate days only to the trial of the accused deputies.

This decision was, as may be imagined, far from satisfying the views of the patriots. The whole of the decade (10th Germinal) was spent by them in mutual instigations. The sectional assemblies were extremely tumultuous; but the day elapsed without the dreaded movement occurring. In the section of the Quinze-Vingts, a new petition was framed, bolder in its terms than the last, which it was agreed to present on the morrow. It was read, in fact, at the bar of the convention. "Why," it ran, "is Paris without a municipality? Why are the popular societies closed? What has become of our harvests? Why are assignats daily depressed? Why may the young men of the Palais-Royal alone assemble? Why are patriots alone found in the prisons? The people are at length determined to be free. They know that, when they are oppressed, insurrection is the first of their duties." The petition was heard amidst the murmurs of a majority of the convention, and the acclamations of the Mountain. The president Pelet [de-la-Lozère] sternly rebuked the petitioners, and dismissed them from the bar. The only satisfaction accorded them was the transmission of the list of patriots under detention to the sections, in order that they might judge whether there were any who merited favourable consideration.

The remainder of the 11th was passed in exciting the population of the faubourgs. Men canvassed the various districts, repeating that on the following day the convention must be visited, to again demand from it what had been hitherto withheld. This phrase was circulated from mouth to mouth through all the quarters occupied by the patriots. The ringleaders of each section, without having any definite object, laboured to produce a general rising, and to propel on the convention the entire mass of the people. So successful were their efforts, that in the next morning, 12th Germinal (1st April), the women and boys mustered in the section of the City, and besieged the doors of the bakers, preventing all applicants from receiving their rations, and striving to draw them towards the convention. The chief malecontents meanwhile gave vent to all sorts of rumours: they asserted that the convention was about to depart for Châlons, and abandon the population of Paris to its misery; that the section of the Gravilliers had been disarmed during the night; that the young men were gathered, to the number of thirty thousand, on the Champ de Mars, and that with their assistance it was intended to disarm the patriot sections. They forced the authorities of the section of the City to surrender the drums, which seizing, they carried through all the streets, beating the call to arms. The contagion spread with rapidity; the populace of the Temple and the Faubourg St Antoine arose, and, following the quays and the boulevards, moved towards the Tuileries. This formidable assemblage was composed of women, striplings, and intoxicated men; the latter were armed with clubs, and bore on their hats the words—"Bread and the constitution of '93."

The convention was at this moment listening to a report of Boissy-d'Anglas on the various systems adopted to procure supplies of food. It had merely its ordinary guard around it; the rioters had already reached the doors; they inundated the Carrousel and the Tuileries, and choked all the avenues, insomuch that it was impossible for the numerous patrols scattered through Paris to approach in order to defend the national representation. The crowd pressed into the Saloon of Liberty, the vestibule preceding the hall, and attempted to penetrate into the midst of the assembly. The ushers and guard endeavoured to stop it; several men, armed with clubs, rushed forward, dispersed all who offered resistance, charged precipitately upon the doors, broke them in, and at length all poured like a torrent into the middle of the convention, uttering deafening shouts, waving their hats, and enveloped in a cloud of dust. "Bread! bread! The constitution of '93!" such were the cries vociferated by this blind mob. The deputies retained their seats, and manifested an imposing calmness. Suddenly one of them arose and exclaimed—"The republic for ever!" All imitated him; and the crowd likewise responded to the cry, but added, "Bread! The constitution of '93!" The members of the left side alone deemed it fitting to cheer; and they otherwise betokened that the presence of the populace, in the national sanctuary, occasioned them no feelings of regret or indignation. The multitude, which had started without any specific plan, whose leaders merely purposed by its means to intimidate the convention, spread amongst the deputies and sat down by their side, but without venturing to commit any violence towards them. Legendre mounted the tribune. "If ever malevolence," he commenced —— He was not allowed to continue. "Down! down!" roared the multitude; "we have no bread!" Merlin de Thionville, always prompt to signalise the courage he had displayed at Mayence and in La Vendée, quitted his seat, descended amidst the populace, spoke to several of the men, embraced them, received embraces in return, and urged them to respect the convention. "To thy place!" cried some of those on the Mountain. "My place," retorted Merlin, "is in the midst of the people. These men have just assured me they have no evil intentions; that they have no wish to overawe the convention by their numbers; that, on the contrary, they will defend it, and that they are here only to make known the urgency of their wants." "Yes! yes!" exclaimed voices in the crowd; "we want bread!"

At this moment shouts were heard in the vestibule of Liberty: it was a fresh popular flood surging over the first—a second irruption of men, women, and children, vociferating in chorus—"Bread! bread!" Legendre recommenced the speech he had been waiting impatiently to deliver; he was again interrupted by a volley of "Down! down!"

The Mountaineers perceived that, in the present state of affairs, the convention, invaded, outraged, and overborne, could not enter upon deliberation, since it was impossible for any voice to be heard; and that the only object of the insurrection must fail, as the desired decrees could not be passed. Gaston and Duroi, both members of the left side, arose and complained of the condition to which the assembly had been reduced. Gaston approached the people. "My friends," said he, "you want bread, the liberation of the patriots, and the constitution; but for those purposes we must deliberate, and we cannot do so if you remain here." The noise prevented Gaston from being understood. André Dumont, who had superseded the president on the bench, strove in vain to impress the same reasons on the mob: he was not heeded. The Mountaineer Huguet alone succeeded in making a few words be heard. "The people who are here," he said, pitching his voice to its highest key, "are not in insurrection; they have come to press a just demand—the enlargement of the patriots. People, maintain your rights!" At this instant a man mounted on the bar, forcing his way through the crowd which opened before him: it proved to be Vanec, who commanded the section of the City at the epoch of the 31st May. "Representatives," he said, "you see before you the men of the 14th July, the 10th August, and also of the 31st May." Here the galleries, the populace, and the Mountain, applauded most vociferously. "These men," Vanec continued, "have sworn to live free or die. Your divisions distract the country; it must no longer suffer from your animosities. Restore liberty to the patriots and bread to the people. Give us justice on the army of Fréron—those gentry with canes. And thou, holy Mountain," added the declaimer, turning to the benches on the left—"thou who hast so often combated for the republic—the men of the 14th July, the 10th August, and the 31st May, claim thee in this moment of crisis; thou wilt always find them ready to sustain thee, always ready to shed their blood for the country!" Shouts and cheers accompanied the concluding words of Vanec. One voice in the assembly was thought to be detected in condemnation, but too indistinctly to be traced. An immediate call was made for any one who had a charge to advance against Vanec to come forward and give it utterance. "Yes," cried Duhem, exultingly, "let him speak it aloud!"

The orators of several sections appeared successively at the bar, and in somewhat more measured terms urged the same demands as the leader of the City. The president Dumont replied, with firmness, that the convention would attend to the wishes and wants of the people when it was enabled to resume its labours. "Let it do so at once," cried several voices; "we have no bread!" Thus the tumult continued for several hours. The president was exposed to appeals and reproaches of all kinds. "Royalism is in the chair," said Choudieu addressing him. "Our enemies are exciting the storm," replied Dumont; "they are little aware that the thunder is about to fall on their own heads." "Yes," retorted Ruamps, "the thunder of your Palais-Royal youths." "Bread! bread!" interrupted the women, furiously.
